COOPER v. COOPER.

Appointment—Alleged fraud on power.

When a father agreed to appoint a share of a fund to his daughter, and to secure, by bond, an equal amount to the trustees of her marriage settlement, under which he was to have a contingent reversion to both funds:

Held (in a suit to set aside the appointment), that as the transaction was intended substantially for the benefit of the daughter, and as the father gave a high value for the contingent interest, there was no fraud on the power. There was no bargain on the father's part, which could at all affect the case; he simply protected his family against the marital right.

This was an appeal from the decision of Vice-Chancellor James. By the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Daniell, dated the 8th Sept. 1806, a sum of stock was invested in trustees on trust after the death of the survivor of Mr. and Mrs. Daniell, for sons of the children of the marriage, as they jointly, or the survivor, should appoint, and in default of appointment, for the children of the marriage equally. In 1834, Sophia, one of the daughters, then a minor, was married to Capt. England. In contemplation of this marriage, the parents appointed, subject to their life interest in the fund, one-fourth part of the fund to the daughter, her executors, administrators, and assigns. Mr. Daniell covenanted to execute a bond to the trustees of the daughter's marriage settlement, for payment to them at a future date, of 4000*l.*, with interest. By the marriage settlement, which was of even date with the deed of appointment, the appointed share of the fund and the money payable under the bond, were settled on trusts in favour of Mr. and Mrs. England, with remainder to their issue, but in default of issue, in favour of Mr. Daniell, the father himself, and his executors, administrators, and assigns.

Capt. England died before Mr. Daniell, but left issue by his marriage. By a previous settlement and appointment, in contemplation of the marriage of another daughter, Maria, to Mr. Trevanion, similar arrangements were made with respect to the reservation of a contingent interest to Mr. Daniell, in default of issue of the marriage.

Mr. Daniell was adjudicated a bankrupt in 1835, and in 1849 his assignees in bankruptcy assigned his reversionary interest under Mrs. Trevanion's settlement to the trustees of the Economic Life Assurance Company. Mr. Daniell died in 1866, his wife having died previously. Mr. Trevanion had died without issue in 1832, and Mrs. Trevanion in 1841 married the plaintiff, T. B. Cooper. He instituted the present suit for the purpose of setting aside the appointments to his wife and Mrs. England as frauds on the power, on the ground that it was a corrupt bargain to reserve an ultimate interest in the appointed shares in favour of Mr. Daniell.

James, V.C. having dismissed his bill, the plaintiff appealed. The proceedings in the court below are fully reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197.

Jessel, Q. C., Kay, Q. C., Fischer, and W. C. Druce for the appellants, contended, with respect to the appointment, that the rule of the court was absolute that there must be no bargain between the appointor and appointee. The reservation vitiated the appointment.

Jessel, Q. C. replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—This suit comes before me on appeal under very singular circumstances, but I think it will be necessary to deal mainly or almost exclusively with the case of the settlement of Mrs. England, because, unless something can be drawn from her settlement, there will be nothing for a decree to operate upon. The question arising as to the other fund, especially as to the position of Mrs. Cooper's father as a debtor in respect of the bond, cannot properly be discussed in this suit, for I cannot discuss questions which are not raised by the pleadings. As regards Mrs. England's fund, I find the case is this: She was an infant, and could not therefore enter into a bargain, and there is no pretence for saying that any bargain was made with her. If there were any bargain at all, it must have been made with her husband, and must be deduced from the instruments produced, as there is no other evidence on the subject. Let us see what was the state of circumstances at that time. The facts are shortly these. On the marriage of Mrs. England, a deed poll was executed, which, after reciting the intended marriage, and that it was agreed that an appointment should be made in accordance with the settlement, appointed one-fourth of the fund to Mrs. England. At that time there were five children who might or might not take shares, but one child was, for some reason which does not appear, placed out of the reach of any benefit from this fund; therefore four children remained. One of those children, Mrs. Trevanion, on her marriage had received one-fourth of the fund by appointment and two years afterwards this settlement takes place. This then was the natural division of the fund. The appointment was naturally made on the marriage of the children, and there is nothing whatever to lead to the idea that there was any impropriety in Mr. Daniell thus making a provision for his daughters on their marriage, and the first trusts declared are beyond question reasonable and proper. But it was contended that with those trusts must be coupled the ultimate trust in favour of Mr. Daniell, and that this case thus falls in the cases where it has been held that the donee of the power stipulating for a benefit to himself the whole of the trusts must be treated as void. I should be sorry to say anything to break in upon a rule so well established; and if such a bargain were proved in this case, in my opinion the fact of the bond having been given by Mr. Daniell would make no difference. Here, if there be a bargain, it is with the husband. I must take all parties to have known the law, and in my opinion there was no bargain to take anything from the daughter, but there was an agreement by the husband, who said in effect, "I, the husband, will, in certain events, waive my marital rights, and the funds shall go back to your family." This is the reasonable construction of the deed, a construction I am entitled to make, no other evidence of a bargain having been brought forward. If the test applied by Knight Bruce, L.J., be applied here, and the question asked by him be put here, namely, but for this appointment in favour of the appointee, would the appointment be made at all, the answer must be "Yes." Taking that view of the case, with these documents and nothing else laid before me, it seems to me that this settlement is unimpeachable. It would require a very strong case to say that this deed must be set aside after the lapse of time, and all the dealings with the property that have taken place. True, the right did not accrue until the father's death, still the court, regarding the family arrangement, the enjoyment of the funds by the parties, the subsequent dealings with those funds in marrying daughters and establishing a son in the world; and, finally, the release to the trustees of the settlement of 1806, to which Mr. Cooper was himself a party, requires a strong case to be made out. And here I see nothing to induce the court to say that this appointment must be set aside. It is not simply that it would be a hardship to have this appointment set aside, but I hold that there was no bargain at all on the father's part which could at all affect the case; he simply protected his family against the marital right. This is the natural view to take of the transaction; and, therefore, there is nothing to do in this suit—the only fund being in court, under the Trustee Act, under which the rights of the parties can be settled; but those rights are quite different from those which arise in the present case. The only point that can be suggested is that Mr. Cooper says his rights ought to be declared, which would be, if his contention be correct, to give him the chance of taking one-eighth of the fund by survivorship. This is not a suit to meet with any favour; and it fails in its main purpose, which was to get at Mrs. England's share. I do not think it right to go into the other questions, which can be more satisfactorily settled when the fund comes to be dealt with. The decree of the Vice-Chancellor must be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

MESSEENA v. CARR.

Will—Discretionary power to trustees to purchase annuity—Gift of part of the capital to the annuitant.

A testatrix by her will directed her trustees to invest a certain sum, and to pay the income arising therefrom to J. C. during his life, and after his death in trust for certain other persons; and she gave the trustees a discretionary power to invest the sum in the purchase of an annuity for the benefit of J. C. The trustees did not purchase the annuity, but from time to time made payments to J. C. out of the capital, in the aggregate amounting to more than the half of it.

Held, that the trustees had power to make such payments, and that the remaindermen were only entitled to the balance.

By her will, dated 26th Feb. 1848, Mary Chapelhow, after directing all her just debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses to be paid by her executors, gave, devised, and bequeathed to George Bowness Carr, and Thos. Robinson, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, all and every her real and leasehold estates, and all her goods, chattels, money, and securities for money, debts, and other personal estate and effects of what kind soever upon trust, that her said trustees, or the survivor of them, or the heirs, executors, or administrators of the survivor should, as soon as conveniently might be, call in and convert into money her said personal estate, or such part thereof as should not consist of money, and sell her real and leasehold estates in manner therein mentioned. And the testatrix directed that her said trustees or trustee should stand and be possessed of the moneys to arise from such sale, calling in, and conversion. Upon trust after full payment of all her just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, to pay two-fifth parts of the residue to the persons therein named, and as to the remaining three-fifth parts thereof upon trust to invest the same in the names of her said trustees or trustee in any of the public stocks or funds of Great Britain, or upon Government or real securities, &c. And as to one-fifth part of the annual income of the said last-mentioned trust funds, she thereby directed her said trustees or trustee for the time being, to pay or apply the same, weekly or otherwise, as they or he might deem advisable, unto or for the benefit and advantage of her son, John Chapelhow, for and during the term of his natural life, and after his death she declared that the said trustees and trustee should hold one-fifth part or share of the said last-mentioned principal moneys, stocks, funds, and securities, and the annual income thereof upon trust for her daughter, Grace Messeena and her children, in manner thereafter mentioned. Provided, nevertheless, and she thereby declared, that it should be lawful for her said trustees or trustee, if they or he thought it advisable so to do, by and with such one-fifth part or share of the said last-mentioned principal moneys, to purchase for the benefit of the said John Chapelhow, an irredeemable annuity for his life of such amount as could be thereby obtained.

The one-fifth part of the three-fifths of the residuary estate amounted to about 400l. Only one of the trustees, namely, Robinson, acted, and he did not purchase an annuity for John Chapelhow, but paid him from time to time several sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to 270l., out of the capital of his share.

The present suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of the testatrix; it now came on for further consideration, and the question to be decided was whether the payments to John Chapelhow out of the capital of the shares came within the power to purchase an annuity, or whether Grace Messeena and her children were entitled to the whole share. A question also arose as to whether the one trustee could exercise the power alone, it being a discretionary power.

Southgate, Q.C., and W. Barber, for the plaintiffs, the persons entitled in remainder, contended that the power could not properly be exercised by making payments from time to time, and that it could not be exercised by one of the two trustees alone. They cited

Cowper v. Mantell, 22 Beav. 231;
Brown v. Higgs, 4 Ves. 708; 5 Ves. 495; 8 Ves. 561; 2 Sug. Pow. 176, 6th edit.

Archibald Smith, for Carr, the surviving trustee, contended that the power to purchase an annuity for a person amounted to a power to pay the amount to the person entitled to the annuity, and that if the trustees were entitled to pay him the whole amount, they were entitled to pay him part of it.

Greenside, for the representatives of the deceased trustee, supported the same contention.

Jan. 20.—Lord ROMILLY.—I am of opinion that the trustees had power to pay the whole amount of the one-fifth share to John Chapelhow. They might, no doubt, have bought him an annuity and called it irredeemable, but he could have sold it the next day. That being so, they had power to pay him three-fourths, or any part of the share. I entertained some doubt, as it was a discretionary power to be exercised by two trustees, and one had declined to act, whether the other could exercise the power alone. But the passive trustee did not dissent from what had been done; in fact he approved of it. There has, therefore, been no breach of trust for which the trustees are bound to account.

FINLASON v. TATLOCK.

Will—Construction—Gift of personalty in remainder to children "or their heirs"—Substitution.

A testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust to pay the interest to his wife during her life, and at her decease he directed the principal and interest to be equally divided amongst his children "or their heirs."

One of the children of the testator assigned his share and died in the lifetime of the tenant for life:

Held, that the statutory next of kin of the child took the share by substitution.

By his will John Hardcastle, after directing the payment of his debts, &c., giving certain legacies and appointing executors, gave the residue of his personal estate to his executors "in trust, the interest to be paid to my dear wife Esther Hardcastle during her natural life, and at her decease the principal and interest to be equally divided amongst my children or their heirs."

The testator died in December 1841, leaving him surviving his widow and eight children. The widow died in 1867. One of the children assigned his share and afterwards died in the lifetime of his mother. The present suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate, and the only question to be decided was whether the assignee was entitled to the child's share, or whether it went to the heirs of the child, and, if so, who the "heirs" of the child were.

Jessel, Q. C. (C. Brown with him), for the plaintiff.—A gift to one for life and then to persons "or their heirs," is clearly a case of substitution, and the property being personalty the word "heirs" means next of kin. He cited

Doddy v. Higgins, 9 Hare, App. xxiii.; on appeal, 2 K. & J. 729;

Bristowe, Q. C., for the assignee, contended that the words "or their heirs" were mere words of surplusage, and that the assignee was entitled to the share in question. He cited

Chapman Barber appeared for other persons interested.

Jan. 18.—Lord ROMILLY.—I have gone very carefully through all these cases, and I think they are quite clear, and that the words in the will amount to a substitution. [His Lordship read the words of the will above set out, and continued:] Mr. Bristowe, your interpretation is impossible, without converting "or" into "and;" that was the tendency of the old decisions, but the modern decisions are the other way, and proceed upon the principle of following the natural meaning of the words, without introducing lawyers' refinements. The natural meaning of the words in this will is that the child, if living, or its heirs, if it should have died, should take; otherwise there would be an intestacy, but for the 33rd section of the Wills Act, in the event of the child dying in the testator's lifetime leaving issue. In this case I have no doubt whatever that it was the intention of the testator to give the shares by substitution in the event of any of the children dying in the lifetime of the tenant for life, and that the word "heirs" means statutory next of kin as in many decided cases, and in the recent case of Re Philips' Will (sup.).

M'CREIGHT v. FOSTER.

Vendor and purchaser—Contract for sale of leaseholds Charge by purchaser on contract—Notice to vendor—
Liability of vendor.

F., who was mortgagee, with power of sale, of certain leasehold property, contracted with P. for the sale of the property to him at a certain sum payable by instalments. After having paid about half of the purchase money, P. assigned the benefit of his contract to a banking company to secure a sum owing by him to the company, who gave notice of their charge to F.

Notwithstanding the notice, F. completed the sale to P. without communicating with the company, and P. immediately afterwards sold the property to a purchaser for value without notice of the charge.

Held, that F., having neglected the notice, was liable to make good the loss sustained by the company in consequence of the completion of the contract.

This was a suit instituted by William Henry M'Creight and Edwin Laundy, the official liquidators of the Birmingham Banking Company, to enforce a charge on a certain leasehold and messuage in Leicester-square, known as the Alhambra Palace, under the following circumstances:

In Sept. 1864 Sir William Foster, who was mortgagee with power of sale of the Alhambra Palace, advertised it for sale by public auction, and for the purposes of the sale caused to be prepared certain particulars and conditions of sale. On the 30th Sept. 1864 Sir William Foster contracted with Alexander Gopsell Pooley (who was also a defendant to the present suit) for the sale of the property to him for 22,500*l.*, and a memorandum of agreement, dated the 30th Sept. 1864, was indorsed on the particulars and conditions of sale, and signed by both parties. A deposit of 2000*l.* was paid, and it was by the memorandum agreed that the purchaser should take possession of the property within twenty-one days from the date thereof, and should pay to the vendor the further sum of 5500*l.* on taking possession, and should pay the balance of the purchase money as follows, viz.: 5000*l.* at the expiration of three calendar months from the date thereof, and the remaining 10,000*l.* at the expiration of twelve calendar months from the date thereof.

Pooley paid the sum of 5500*l.* on the 23rd Nov. 1864, and a further sum of 5000*l.* on the 19th Jan. 1865. These sums, together with the deposit of 2000*l.*, made together 12,500*l.*, and left 10,000*l.* due in respect of the purchase.

On the 28th Jan. 1865 Pooley, who was indebted to the Birmingham Banking Company in a large sum of money, secured by bills of exchange, deposited the memorandum of agreement of the 30th Sept. 1864 with the Birmingham Banking Company to secure the payment of the bills; he also executed a deed poll or memorandum of deposit, dated the same 28th Jan. 1865, and addressed to the then trustees of the Birmingham Banking Company, and thereby agreed that he would execute to the said trustees or other the trustees for the time being of the company a valid assignment of his contract with Sir William Foster for the purchase of the Alhambra Palace by way of mortgage for securing the sum of 50,000*l.* (the amount due on the bills) and interest.

On the 3rd July 1865 Mr. Beaumont, the solicitor of the banking company, sent to Sir William Foster notice in duplicate of Pooley's charge on his purchase of the Alhambra Palace in favour of the banking company, requesting Sir William Foster to accept service of the same, and to return one copy of the notice, with a memorandum of his acceptance of it indorsed thereon, which Sir William Foster accordingly did on the following day.

The notice was in the following words:

38, Bennett's Hill, 28th Jan. 1865.

I hereby, on behalf of the Birmingham Banking Company, give you notice that by a deed-poll bearing even date herewith, under the hand and seal of Alexander Gopsell Pooley (and addressed to Messrs. Joseph Ledsam, Thomas Pemberton, and John Pemberton, trustees of the said company), the said Alexander Gopsell Pooley did agree with and to the said trustees that he would at any time thereafter at their request and at his own costs execute to them or other the trustees for the time being of the company a valid assignment of his contract with you, the under-mentioned Sir William Foster, for the purchase of the leasehold premises called the Alhambra Palace, Leicester-square, Middlesex, by way of mortgage for securing the principal and interest moneys therein expressed.

(Signed) J. A. BEAUMONT.

To Sir William Foster.

Notwithstanding this notice Sir W. Foster, on the 21st Nov. 1865, completed the sale to Pooley without communicating with the banking company, and received 10,000*l.*, the balance of the purchase-money. Pooley, immediately after the property was assigned to him, sold it to a purchaser for value without any notice of the rights and interests of the banking company therein.

On discovering that the sale had been completed the banking company at once made application to Sir W. Foster for compensation for the loss which they had sustained by the completion of the sale; but Sir W. Foster refused to entertain the application, and repudiated all liability to make good the loss.

On the 27th July 1866, the banking company was ordered to be wound-up, and the plaintiffs were appointed official liquidators of the company.

The present bill was filed in May 1867; it prayed that an account might be taken of the amount due for principal and interest by Pooley to the banking company, on the security of the memorandum and deposit of the 28th Jan. 1865; that it might be declared that by virtue of the said deposit and memorandum, and the notice thereof given to Sir W. Foster, the banking company became entitled to an equitable charge for such principal and interest on all the estate and interest of Pooley in the said leasehold premises, and all other his rights and interests under the contract of the 30th Sept. 1864; and that it might be declared that the assignment by Sir W. Foster to Pooley of the said leasehold premises was a wrongful act and a breach of trust and of duty on the part of Sir W. Foster, and that Sir W. Foster was liable to make good to the banking company, and to the plaintiffs as official liquidators thereof, the loss occasioned to the banking company by such assignment.

It also prayed that the defendants might pay the costs of the suit, but beyond this no relief was prayed against Pooley.

The defence set up by Sir W. Foster's answer was that, as by the notice of the deposit, the banking company did not come under any liability to him and were not bound to complete or to assist Pooley in completing the purchase, the transaction as a contract was void for want of mutuality, and as a charge it was one which according to the principles of a court of equity he was not bound to regard; that if the banking company had intended to obtain a charge on the property they ought to have obtained a valid assignment of the contract from Pooley to themselves, and given Sir W. Foster formal notice thereof, and tendered or agreed to pay the purchase-money to him; that even if they were entitled to any relief against him their proper remedy was at law, and not in a court of equity; that the banking company having actual or constructive notice of the tenancy and contract of Frederick Strange (whom the answer alleged to have obtained from Pooley a lease of the property, with right of pre-emption prior to the date of the deposit), they refused to take any step to procure an assignment of the property (which from the high rent and heavy covenants reserved by and contained in the lease, and the heavy premium for fire-insurance, was of a highly speculative nature), and in fact repudiated all intention of taking the same; and moreover that Sir Wm. Foster having as far back as April 1866 repudiated all liability in respect of the matter, and the company having so long acquiesced in such repudiation, they could not now enforce their claim, having forfeited it by laches.

Southgate, Q.C., Archibald Smith and J. W. Chitty for the plaintiffs, submitted that they were clearly entitled to the relief prayed by the bill. They cited Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C. and Robinson, for Sir William Foster, contended that the purchaser could not by deposit of the contract deprive the vendor of his rights under it; that the terms of the memorandum of deposit being that the purchaser would assign, if the bank should so request, nothing passed under it until request; that the bank could not set up their charge on the contract for sale as an obstacle to completion; that they should have given notice to the vendor that they would pay the balance of the purchase-money and take an assignment of the lease, and, not having done so, they were entitled to no relief against the vendor. Jessel, Q. C. and Hull, for Pooley, contended that he was not a proper party as no relief was asked against him, and that the bill ought to be dismissed as against him with costs.

Jan. 19.—Lord ROMILLY.—I will not trouble you, Mr. Southgate, upon this case. There is no evidence whatever to induce the court to suspend the ordinary and usual rule. The usual rule of the court, the invariable rule in equity, is not confined to any one species of property or another, but it is this—that any man who enters into a contract may, if he pleases, assign the benefit of that contract to another person; he may charge his contract for the benefit of another person. The person with whom he contracts becomes a trustee for the person in whose favour the charge is given as soon as he has due notice of it. That is not confined to a question of mere sale, but it includes any case of a debt or the like. For instance, a person insures his life in an insurance office; he thinks fit to raise money on the security of the policy after he has been insured for many years. The person who lends him money upon the security of that gives notice to the insurance office not to pay the money to any person other than himself. If the insurance office thinks fit to pay, they must take the consequences, and bear the loss. It is true that it is a chose in action. So if a man agrees to sell an estate, or to buy an estate, he may assign the benefit of that contract to another person, either absolutely or to secure a sum of money, and when the person with whom he contracts has notice of that charge, he becomes a trustee for the person to that extent. There is no difference in that respect between one species of property and another. Now, a sort of distinction was endeavoured yesterday to be taken, which would lead to the most disastrous consequences in my opinion, between the sale of a lease and the sale of any other property. There is no distinction at all. It is not a question between the lessor and the person to whom the contract is assigned; but it is simply this—that a man has made a beneficial contract, has entered into a contract which he considers to be beneficial or which has become beneficial by reason of his having paid part of the purchase-money or the like, and thereupon he raises money upon it and assigns it as a security to another person who gives notice of it to the person with whom the contract was made. Now, what sort of distinction is there between a person who sells Whiteacre to another and a person who sells, as in this case, the Alhambra Palace in Leicester-square? What sort of difference is there between the two? Is there any difference at all? Supposing that instead of being the lessee of the Alhambra Palace he had been the owner in fee simple of the Alhambra Palace, the question would have been exactly the same. It was said, and said with considerable truth, that the situation of a lessee, particularly of a lessee of such a place as the Alhambra Palace in Leicester-square, is a very onerous one, because he had a ground-rent of 910*l.* to pay every year, and was subject to covenants not merely to keep the premises in repair, and in a proper state, but also to insure against fire to which accident places of that description are supposed to be peculiarly liable. No doubt that was so, but he thought fit to enter into the contract himself. The contract which Sir William Foster entered into was this—[His Lordship stated it, and continued:] There was a proviso in the agreement that there should be a forfeiture if it was not completed by that time, and then it was suggested what a severe case it was upon Sir William Foster that he would be retained all this time, and that the contract could not be altered by reason of this assignment. All which is very true; but then Sir William Foster thought fit to enter into the contract, and it was merely the contract, such as it was, the benefit of which was assigned. There was nothing whatever by reason of the assignment of it to the Birmingham Bank, which enabled either the Birmingham Bank or Mr. Pooley to obviate the condition of the contract which made him liable to forfeiture in case the contract was not completed on the 30th Sept., and up to that time he himself had entered into the contract. Those cases which were cited, beginning with Lucas v. Comerford, Moore v. Gregg, and Moore v. Choat (sup.), have no sort of reference whatever to this case; they have not the slightest bearing upon it. There the question was simply whether the lessor had a right to say to the assignee of the lease that he was liable to all the covenants which the lessee was liable to; but that is a perfectly separate and distinct matter. The case unquestionably is an unfortunate one in various respects, but the course which Sir William Foster ought to have taken is as plain as possible. The Birmingham Bank got an assignment of the benefit of the contract. *The contract was obviously a very beneficial one at that time, because 12,500 had been paid, and by paying 10,000*l.* they could have got the whole of the Alhambra Palace conveyed to them, which from various indications in the course of the proceedings seems to be worth about 25,000*l.*, at least I do not reckon it to be worth much less than 25,000*l.*; for at all events it seems to be let to a person who carries on some species of entertainment there who formerly paid a rent for it (he does not now, for I believe he is the owner of the place) of 2750*l.* a year. The course, therefore, which Sir William Foster had to pursue was very simple and very plain. A notice was sent to him that the benefit of the contract had been assigned to the Birmingham Bank. The notice was sent to him in duplicate, and he was asked to return one signed: very properly he did so, and I have not the slightest doubt that he had forgotten all about it. It is very unfortunate, no doubt, but there was the notice and his course was a very simple one. He ought either to have said: "I will have nothing to do with this matter: I cannot accept any notice from you at all;" whether he would have been entitled to say so is another question, but this he could have done, he could have given them notice that he intended to disregard it, and then they might have taken such steps as they thought fit. However, he does nothing of the sort. He accepts the notice, and then in November, nearly two months after the time at which the contract ought to have been completed, he completed the contract with Mr. Pooley and without regarding the Birmingham Bank. I repeat that his course then was quite plain; it was to send word to the Birmingham Bank that Mr. Pooley was about to complete, or that he intended to insist on the forfeiture unless it was completed within a reasonable time. He ought to have given them a reasonable time, say a week or ten days, and to have said, "If you do not complete within that time I shall insist upon the forfeiture." But he does nothing of the sort; he merely assigns the lease to Mr. Pooley, or to his nominee, without the slightest notice to the Birmingham Bank, the consequence of which is that Mr. Pooley's nominee takes it as a purchaser for value without notice, and can hold it as against all the world. Now, observe what the consequence would be if I were to hold otherwise than I am obliged to hold on the present occasion. I say this that, however valuable the contract was which he had entered into, and however important it was for him to borrow a little money to complete it, although he might have paid half the purchase-money, he could not safely assign the benefit of the contract in order to raise the money to pay the remainder, because the person who had received notice might convey away to another person without taking any notice whatever, or without regarding at all the notice he had received. A more unfortunate decision than that, if my decision were of that character, which it will not be, can hardly be conceived, because by that you would prevent a person making use of a very valuable property for the purpose of raising money which might be required. The result is that the only question in the case, and the question on which I was desirous to read the correspondence, is this—Did the Birmingham Bank, after giving that notice, repudiate all the benefit of the contract? Did they give up and abandon the right to the contract? Upon reading the evidence I am of opinion that they did not. This is certain, that in no respect can there be alleged anywhere that there was any notice to Sir William Foster that they had done so, or that any facts came to his knowledge to make him believe so. He is not justified by the proceedings in that respect. What did take place was this, that a letter or a couple of letters were written in July 1865, in which notice was given to the bank of the course of proceeding, and the manager of the bank seems to have told Mr. Pooley that he must get the money himself, and that they did not intend to advance the money. If this had been communicated to Sir William Foster, and had come to his ears, and upon that sincerely believing that they had repudiated the contract, he had sold it to somebody else, although he would still have been in a very equivocal situation, because he might have had it directly from the bank itself, there might be some excuse, there might have been something more to be said for him, but as the matter stands there is no excuse whatever. The various questions that are raised here are very much in the nature of what we used to be in the habit of calling at the bar an undefended cause, that is to say, the reasons that are given are such as cannot properly be put forward by the mouth of a lawyer, but he is obliged to disguise them in some particular manner in order to prevent them appearing in their naked form; or else, as I said to Mr. Robinson in the course of his argument, the law of notice is useless if that doctrine were to prevail. The result is that, I regret to say, I must make a decree against Sir William Foster in the terms of the prayer of the bill, with costs up to the hearing; but I can give the plaintiffs no costs against Mr. Pooley, because they really ask no relief against him; and, under the circumstances, I cannot give him any costs.

WHEATLEY v. THE WESTMINSTER BRYMBO COAL AND COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Mines—Sinking pits—Lease—Dead rent—Obligation to work efficiently.

W. agreed with the W. B. company to grant them a lease of a coal mine adjoining one they already worked, giving them two years to prove the coal, and fixing a dead rent with certain royalties. A lease was then granted, giving liberty to win coal, &c., in the usual terms, and to sink pits, &c., and providing that in case they did so they should within two years of sinking pits pay an increased fixed rent. There was then a covenant to work the mine uninterruptedly, efficiently, regularly, and according to the approved practice, and not to leave one seam ungotten in working the others. The rent was paid, but no pits sunk, and the lessees never worked up to the sleeping rent. Upon bill filed to compel the lessees to work uninterruptedly, &c., according to the covenant, and raising the question of the obligation to sink pits,

Held, that there was no obligation to sink pits, or do anything more than pay the dead rent, and that the remedy was at law, and bill dismissed with costs.

Semle, where there is a covenant in a mining lease to work efficiently and pay a certain dead rent, the lessees are at liberty, so long as they pay the rent, to neglect working altogether, in the absence of a stipulation compelling them to do so specifically.

This bill was filed by Thomas Randall Wheatley, and Moreton John Wheatley, against the Westminster Brymbo Coal and Coke Company (Limited), for a declaration that the defendant company was bound to work the Gwersylt Coal and Ironstone Mine, of which the plaintiffs were the owners, uninterruptedly, efficiently, regularly, and according to the usual and most approved practice adopted in the working of mines of coal and ironstone, according to the provisions of the lease under which the company held the mine; and also that the company was bound to work the "Two-yard," "Brassey," and Main" seams in such a manner as not to get one and leave the others ungotten; for a decree and injunction, in the same terms, from further proceedings with a certain arbitration; and for damages and costs. The plaintiffs, on the 12th Feb. 1859, entered into an agreement with the company to grant them the lease in question, being seised of the Gwersylt Estate in Denbighshire in fee, and of the minerals thereunder, the company being a duly registered company. This contract gave the lessees two years to prove the coal, and otherwise was in substance the same as the contract which followed at the end of that time.

By indenture of lease dated 1st July 1862, made between the plaintiffs of the one part and the defendants of the other part, under the common seal of the company, it was witnessed that in consideration of the rents, royalties, conditions, provisions, and agreements thereafter reserved and contained, the plaintiffs granted, demised, and leased unto the defendants, their successors and assigns, all and every the mines, seams, veins, and beds of coal and balls and bands of ironstone under the Gwersylt Estate, containing 465 acres, in the occupations of various persons, namely, as delineated in the plan forming part of the lease, with full power and licence to the said lessees, their successors and assigns, to enter upon the estate on the usual terms, according to the plan, without restriction, or any other part with the lessors' approval, or that of their agents; in case of difference the site to be fixed by arbitration. To erect or remove buildings, machinery, &c., necessary for setting the coal and iron works on foot, determinable as after mentioned, and, with such approval as aforesaid as to the surface, without restriction (except as thereafter covenanted for regulating the manner of working) to bore and search for coals, and to drive, sink, make, and use any pit or shaft, tunnel, &c., or necessary subterraneous works, and to do all other acts, matters, and things, within, through, over, or on the estate for working the mines and manufacturing ironstone, pig, or wrought iron, and selling and disposing of the coal, ironstone, &c., on the usual terms, by means of pits, shafts, &c.; with provisions for depositing what was gotten. And also generally into and out of the said Gwersylt Estate to work and drive by outstroke, in-stroke, and sub-stroke, for getting and carrying away the produce of the Gwersylt Mines, as well as any other mines, and to connect the works with the Brymbo mineral branch of the Great Western Railway. There was then a proviso with respect to the mansion-house and buildings on the estate; and it was provided that, without prejudice to the last preceding clause, in case at any time within the period of twenty-one years thereby granted the lessees, their successors and assigns, should find it necessary or proper for the working of the mines to sink a pit or shaft, or erect engines, &c., on the actual site of any building, they should make compensation.

There was then the habendum to hold the mines from the 29th Sept. 1860 for twenty-one years, determinable as after mentioned, the lessees paying as follows: For the first year the fixed minimum rent of 500*l.*, for the second year 600*l.*, for the third 700*l.*, and for the fourth and every following year 720*l.*, and so in proportion for less than a year; that in case at any time during the terms the lessees or their successors should sink a pit or shaft, then from and after the expiration of two years they should pay a minimum fixed rent of 1000*l.*; all the minimum rents so fixed to be paid half-yearly. There were then provisions for a royalty of 30*l.* per acre for workable and saleable coal of one foot thick of the several seams called "Two-yard," "Brassey," and "Main Coal," and 20*l.* per acre for coal of inferior quality, and 20*l.* per acre for all other seams. There was then a power to work up to the fixed rents, and that if in any one year they should not do so, the deficiency might be made up in subsequent years. There were then provisions for royalties on the ironstone, with a rent of 100*l.* a year for a way-leave, the rents and royalties to be paid without deduction except property tax. There were then provisions for accounts by the plaintiff's engineer and surveyor, for measurement, &c., to be binding on the lessces unless objected to in six months. There were then covenants by the defendants to pay the rents and royalties, rates and taxes, and repair machinery, and keep proper accounts and plans, and permit inspection of the mines for measurement, diallings, &c., and leave proper pillars; and then followed this covenant: "And also should and would at all times during the continuance of the said term thereby granted work and carry on the said 'mines' of coal and ironstone thereby demised, uninterruptedly, efficiently, and regularly (except in the event of strikes of workmen, accidents, or other casualties), according to the usual and most approved practice adopted and used in the working of mines of coal and ironstone; and should and would get and raise the said seams and beds of coal thereby demised cleared out in regular course; and should work the upper of the said seams or beds respectively called 'The Brassey,' the 'Two-yard,' and the 'Main Coal,' each seam in advance of the seam next before it respectively, so as not to endanger the upper seam or seams by undermining. And in case the said lessees, their successors and assigns, should at any time, by working and getting out a lower seam, undermine the upper seam or seams, and such upper seam or seams should afterwards break down or become unfit for working, or necessarily difficult or expensive or dangerous to work, or difficult or dangerous to inspect or examine, after the rent or rate therein before reserved or made payable in respect of such coal as if the same had been actually gotten and sold, and for the purpose of estimating and ascertaining the amount to be paid for such seam or seams, it should be presumed and taken as a fact that such seam or seams existed in a perfect state, and also that the said lessees, their successors and assigns, should not nor would at any time or times get any one of the said several seams of coal and leave the others or other ungotten."

The lease also contained provisions for opening exhausted pits, keeping drifts, &c., in repair, not to underlet without consent, with powers of entry and distress for non-payment of rents and royalties, and a proviso for cesser in case of bankruptcy. Then followed covenants by the lessors for peaceable enjoyment and for a removal; and in case of exhaustion of the mine during the term power was reserved to the lessees to give up possession at the end of five years, or at any time afterwards on twelve calendar months' notice, with a clause giving power to refer all differences to arbitration, to be pleaded in bar of any legal proceedings. The bill, having set out the lease, alleged that of the three seams of coal and also "The Crank," the "Two-yard" was the uppermost, "The Crank," "Brassey," and "Main" following, with an average of four, two, four, and seven feet odd of workable coal, containing altogether about 9,000,000 tons, dipping from west north-west to east south-east at a fall of one in seven. That the defendant company were lessees of the Brymbo mine under the Marquis of Westminster, and had sunk pits, &c., on his estate, and by means of a down-brow driven into the "Brassey" having proved the Gwersylt coal for 860 yards and proved its quality in 1862, worked that seam without the others, but even that of late in a very trifling way. That in the latter part of 1864 Mr. Isaac Shore, the plaintiffs' agent, called attention to this fact, and the plaintiffs being advised that the working was not in accordance with the lease, Messrs. Coverdale and Co., the plaintiffs' solicitors, wrote to the defendant company on the subject, to which Mr. Napier, the secretary, replied that he could satisfy them that it was. Endeavours had been made to settle this question, but without effect, and this suit was instituted, and the bill several times amended, and several answers put in.

The defendants had given notice of arbitration, and a deed to settle all differences had actually been determined on, but the proposed settlement went off, a long correspondence having taken place. The bill being filed in January 1865, in February the case was argued upon the motion for the injunction before Vice-Chancellor Kindersley (2 Drew & Sm. 352; 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 728), who refused it, making the costs of the defendants costs in the cause: which now came on at the hearing, the bill having been four times amended, and there being a great deal of evidence. The bill charged that the defendants had not worked the mine according to the lease, the workings having been altogether illusory; and from 1862 to 1868 only an acre and three-quarters of the "two-yard" and 18 acres of the "Brassey" having been worked, the "Crank" and "Main" not having been worked at all, and the quantity not exceeding 110,000 tons, and not one quarter of the quantity worked from the Brymbo mine; and if the defendants continued to work as they had done not more than one-twelfth of the coal would be gotten within the term of the lease. That the beds of ironstone were very valuable, and that they had not been virtually worked at all; but that if the defendants had worked the coal and ironstone according to the lease, royalties would have been payable to a very large amount, and, owing to the defendants' neglect and default, the plaintiffs had suffered a great pecuniary loss.

The bill then charged that the defendants were bound to work all the seams, whereas they did not commence working at all until five years after the date of the lease, and nine months after the filing of the original bill, not having been prevented by strikes and casualties. There was then a general charge traversing the terms of the covenant as to working the mines uninterruptedly, &c. The defendants by their answers insisted that they were working the Gwersylt mine precisely as they were working the Brymbo, but that they were at liberty to work one seam and leave the others as they thought convenient. That they had hitherto been unable, from the depressed state of the coal trade, to find a market for a larger quantity of coal than they had worked from the plaintiffs' mine; and that they intended to carry on the works according to the lease, but had not had time. In the evidence the question of sinking pits (none having been sunk) was brought prominently forward, Messrs. Shone, Cadwallader, and Livesey, for the plaintiffs, deposing that pits ought to be sunk, whereas the defendants submitted that, according to the terms of the lease, it was at their option to do so or not as they thought proper; and inasmuch as they had regularly paid the dead rent, that was all that could be required of them. It was in evidence that the defendants had given notice to take a piece of land for the sinking of a pit, but that was all; nothing had been done with respect to it further.

Glasse, Q.C., and Nulder, for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendants were in fact simply keeping the Gwersylt coal and ironstone out of the market. They were working the Brymbo mine, and virtually doing nothing in that of the plaintiffs'. The lease distinctly bound them to work uninterruptedly, efficiently, and regularly, and it was impossible upon the facts to say that they had done either. For the purpose of working properly it was sworn that pits were necessary, and they had not sunk one; and the consequence of allowing lessees of a mine thus entirely to disregard the provisions of their lease would be that they were only bound to pay the dead rent, and might never work or, having worked, shut up the mine. It was a fraud upon the plaintiffs thus to evade the lease; and that was a substantial equity upon which the court would give relief. A reference to chambers would immediately determine the question whether the mine was worked according to the covenant, as the court could call in skilled persons who would give their opinion.

Cotton, Q. C., and Freeling, for the defendants, insisted that the court had no jurisdiction on this question; it was entirely the subject for an action for breach of covenant, assuming that there had been one, which was not admitted. Such a bill as this was without precedent. If, however, the court should think that there was an equity, on the construction of the lease itself, there was no obligation whatever to sink pits; it was entirely optional, and the payment of royalties was only in case the pits should be sunk and the minerals gotten. Assuming, next, that it was not optional, the defendants on the evidence were working as well as the state of the market and the capabilities of the mine would allow them, and not less efficiently than they were working the mine adjoining. Having power by down-brow or in-stroke, it was quite unnecessary to sink pits; and, as to the ironstone, there being no obligation to work it, they had no machinery, blast-furnace, or other means of manufacturing it. The lease was entirely permissive; it gave power simply, without compelling anything but the payment of the rent, and that part had been punctually observed.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This case has been most elaborately and ably argued, everything that learning and ingenuity could suggest having been brought forward on behalf of the plaintiffs. This case raises points of great unimportance, not only to the parties, but also that large class of the community engaged in mining operations. [The V.C. referred to the facts.] The rights of the parties must depend on the legal contract between them; but in considering this it is not unimportant to look at their position and the circumstances leading to the execution of the lease. The father is a gentleman advanced in life, the son a captain of engineers, and probably skilled in his profession, and they were, under a disentailing deed, seized in fee of the Gwersylt Estate. The defendants had for some years worked the Brymbo Mine, adjoining the Gwersylt, apparently with adequate capital, and successfully, the coal measures inclining towards the defendants' mine, which was therefore at a greater depth. In 1859 a contract for a lease was entered into and formed, in some sense, a key to the interpretation of the lease itself. It is obvious that the Brymbo coal had proved good, but that doubts were entertained as to the working condition of the minerals under the Gwersylt estate; whether they were not subject to faults and disturbances, which was principally the cause that the mine had not been worked earlier. If it was without faults it was a most valuable property, for it is clear on the evidence that it would yield not less than 900,000,000 tons, or between 500 and 600 tons per diem, producing a very large income. Of these doubts the contract for a lease is conclusive evidence, for it provides that the lessees shall have two years to prove the existence of the coal. It then proceeded in details as to payment of the royalties, &c., on which there is no question; but the effect was that, whether the lessees found coal or not, they might determine the lease at a time fixed. The coal proved workable, and the rights were finally determined by a lease. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to it]. This lease contains a power which for many years was considered not to be a necessary incident to a mining lease, namely, to work by "in-stroke," but that power the defendants have by this lease. The clause providing that "in case they should sink pits and shafts they should pay a rent of 1000*l.* after two years," is most material. Upon this and the other clauses relating to pits and working the mine, it is contended that there is an obligation to sink pits. No doubt common sense points out that, in the case of an unopened mine not adjoining another, there is no other mode of working it but by pits; but I confess I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion in this case, that the object of the lessors, although their views are now altered, was to discourage the sinking of pits, as clearly appears by the increased rent to be paid in that event. Then follows the liberty to sink pits, &c., and the covenant to work so much relied upon. [The Vice-Chancellor read the covenant]. It is admitted that from the execution of the lease, the rent of 720*l.* was regularly paid, but, considering that in 1862 the existence and nature of the coal was proved, the plaintiffs expected large mining operations, and were disappointed that such was not the result; and that they neither got, nor were likely to get, more than the sleeping or dead rent of 720*l.* a year. It is clear that, in order to work up to this rent, the getting of eighty or ninety tons per day would be necessary; but there was no difficulty, having regard to the acreage, of working 300, which would have given a royalty of 5 guineas, or a very large rent; but it is admitted it was not worked even up to the rent within 2000*l.*, and that the defendants might work, therefore, for some time, without paying anything more. At the same time, the plaintiffs ought to have borne in mind the doubts entertained at the inception of the contract; and hence they ought to have considered that 720*l.* was a large additional rent with the surface of the estate untouched, so that the existence of a mine could not have been suspected. The question, however, is, whether anything took place justifying the institution of this suit? I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' dissatisfaction was not as to the mode but the extent of the working, and if they had been satisfied as to that, I feel certain this bill would never have been filed. In other words, they expected to receive large royalties, and hence the question of sinking pits never occurred to them, and neither party desired that they should be sunk. The original bill raised the question, but it does not allege that the defendants should be required to sink pits; but the evidence is directed to this point, and if the views of Mr. Shone and Mr. Cadwallader are correct, the lessee should have thrown upon the defendants the obligation to sink them. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to the evidence.] I think Mr. Shone's evidence is well founded, and that the mine never will be advantageously worked without pits; but it does not follow that the defendants are required to do so. I think under the lease the plaintiffs have no right to require them to sink pits, although it was no doubt their meaning. This evidence, and the amendments of the bill are all directed to this obligation, and it is contended that it was not contemplated to have the mine worked otherwise than by pits; and that proper and efficient working indicates that mode. As I have already said, no doubt that is the only mode in which a mine can be efficiently worked, and I agree with Mr. Shone and the other witnesses, and with the plaintiffs' counsel's contention in that respect; but the question is not whether the mine can be worked with the greatest possible advantage by pits, but what are the rights of the parties under this lease? That lease does not throw on the defendants the obligation to sink pits, but it does contain a covenant uninterruptedly, efficiently, and regularly to work the mine; what the plaintiffs or the defendants knew about the property signifies nothing. Much stress has been laid on the fact that the defendants have not efficiently worked the mine, and the small quantity of coal raised is relied upon in support of that argument. No doubt, if the rent had been fixed at 3000*l.* instead of 720*l.* a year, the lessors would have cared little what the working was; but the case comes back to the question of what obligation is thrown upon the defendants by the lease. The efficient working as to quantity is not the question, but whether it is a case for the interference of this court. If the parties consider the working insufficient, the remedy is not here, but in a court of law; but, as I must put an interpretation on the covenant, I invited counsel to tell me whether the lessees were, under it, obliged to work beyond the sleeping rent. The case of Green v. Sparrow (sup.) was cited, but it does not go to that point, but simply of a refraining from working expressly for a fraudulent purpose; and Lord Chancellor King decided that it must be regarded as if the condition had been fulfilled and rent paid accordingly; but it does not decide that there is an obligation to go beyond the sleeping rent. How could it be said what is enough to satisfy the covenant? If the object was to secure a large revenue, it was unfortunate that the plaintiffs were not differently advised, and that the lease was not in a different form; for there is nothing in this lease enabling me to say what quantity of coal per day or per annum would satisfy the covenant. Suppose I agreed to the plaintiffs' contention, and referred it to chambers, and called in skilled persons, I should have as many opinions as there were mining agents examined; it is impossible that the court can carry such a contract into execution. I am unable to see that there has been a breach of the covenant, and I am clearly of opinion that this is not the proper tribunal. In granting a reference it would be taking the management of the mine; and although I agree that, if the contract had been not to sink a pit except in a particular place, an injunction could have been granted to restrain sinking anywhere else, it is clear that this court can neither interfere in the construction of a railway, the management of a brewery, or the carrying on a colliery, although it may appoint a receiver. It would be a violation of the principles of this court to make a declaration that this mine was not worked efficiently, as it would involve an interference which Lord Eldon held in The Birmingham Canal Company v. Lloyd (18 Ves. 515) not to be the province of equity, and he refused the injunction. Now, the defendants are not working up to the sleeping rent. Under this lease are they obliged to do more than pay that rent or to work up to or beyond that rent, which is not a small one? I asked for authority on this point; I know of none, and none has been produced, and I assume that none is in existence. In all cases of mining leases, therefore, if the lessors desire to secure the working of a mine beyond the sleeping rent, they must insert a covenant throwing that obligation on the lessee. However inconvenient it may be, my opinion is that, provided the sleeping rent is paid, if there be a covenant to work efficiently, it is in the power of the lessees to keep the mine unworked, there being no obligation on such a covenant to work beyond the sleeping rent. In order to induce lessees to work a higher rent must be fixed. That is the fair construction of this lease, and I think the litigation has miscarried. As to the minor points, the mode in which the veins should be worked was, in fact, decided by Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, who refused the plaintiffs their costs, and therefore considered the working not improper. The defendants have worked both mines in the same way, and there is no suggestion as to an improper working of the Brymbo. As to the ironstone, there are neither furnaces to manufacture it, nor a sale for it if it is gotten, therefore, it is absurd to say that there is an obligation to work it; there is none. The bill must therefore be dismissed; and, considering how nearly the parties came to an arrangement, I consider the suit ought not to have been proceeded with, and, therefore, I must dismiss it with costs.

STEWART v. SANDERSON.

Will—Construction—Direction to appropriate—Insufficient appropriation.

*A testator directed his trustees, out of the proceeds of the sale of his estate, to appropriate 15,000*l.*, and to invest the same, and pay the income thereof to his wife for her life, and after her death he gave the 15,000*l.* in trust for his children equally, and the residue of his estate amongst his children in unequal proportions. The widow and the trustees entered into a written agreement to appropriate certain railway preference stock and other securities of the value at the time of the appropriation of about 15,000*l.* to represent this fund. At the death of the widow the securities comprised in this agreement had considerably fallen in value.*

Held, that the residuary estate must make good the deficiency in the fund thus set apart.

George Gillespie, by his will dated in Jan. 1862, gave all his real and personal estate to certain trustees upon trust for sale, and out of the proceeds to lay out and invest, or continue invested, a sum of 15,000*l.* in or upon Government, real, or personal security, or in such stocks, funds, or shares as they might in their absolute discretion think fit, and to pay the interest, dividends, and annual income thereof to his wife for her life; and subject thereto the testator declared that his executors should stand possessed of the 15,000*l.*, or the securities upon which the same might be invested, upon trust for such of his children as should attain the age of twenty-one, in equal shares. The testator gave the residue of his property in the proportion of three-tenths to each of his sons, and two-tenths to each of his daughters.

The testator died in January 1863. In March 1864, the widow and his executors and trustees entered into a written agreement whereby it was declared that the stocks and shares specified in the schedule thereto being of the estimated value of 14,990*l.* should be considered as set apart for Mrs. Gillespie's benefit in full performance of the trust or direction in the will contained to lay out or invest or to continue invested the sum of 15,000*l.* The schedule comprised preference stocks in different railways. The agreement recited so much of the will as related to the widow's life interest in the 15,000*l.*, and that she had requested the executors and trustees to join with her in setting apart that sum for her benefit. The widow died in January 1869, and the shares and securities had become considerably depreciated in value since the date of the memorandum of agreement. Upon the widow's death a suit was instituted for the administration of the testator's estate. The bill stated that questions had arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendants, being the children of the testator, as to whether the railway preference shares above mentioned were to be deemed and taken to have been absolutely appropriated to answer the said sum of 15,000*l.*, or whether the 15,000*l.* ought now to be set apart and duly invested to answer the trusts of the will. The bill prayed for a declaration that the trustees ought to set apart and invest the sum of 15,000*l.* in or upon Government, real, or personal security, to be held by them upon the trusts of the will. The main question was, whether the agreement was such an appropriation of 15,000*l.* as would bind the children and reversioners, or a mere temporary arrangement between the tenant for life and the trustees. The securities comprised in the agreement were now less in value by 3000*l.* than they were at the time of the appropriation. There was no evidence as to whether the preference shares so set apart were perpetual or redeemable.

Ince, for the plaintiff, one of the daughters of the testator, maintained that the agreement was a temporary arrangement only, made with a view of securing the widow's income.

Bardswell, for other daughters, supported the same view.

C. Hall, for the trustees and residuary legatees, being the sons of the testator, contended that there was a complete and final appropriation of the securities to answer the 15,000*l.* The trustees had no power to postpone the appropriation, and, if they had done so, they would have been guilty of breach of trust.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said there was no valid appropriation. In the absence of evidence to the contrary, he should assume that the shares were liable to be paid off. The doctrine of the court was that an appropriation to be binding must be in securities not liable to be redeemed or reduced in interest. The arrangement was in no way binding on the children, and a sum must be taken from the residue to supply the deficiency. Declare that there has not been a sufficient appropriation of the 15,000*l.*, and that that sum or stocks, funds, or securities, equal in value to such sum, should be set apart or appropriated. Declare that it is for the benefit of the plaintiff and the infant defendants to elect to give effect to the will. Costs of all parties as between solicitor and client out of the residuary estate.

Where a tenant for life was too infirm to make an affidavit of title on a petition for payment to him of the dividends of purchase-money paid into court by a railway company, an affidavit made by his solicitor was held to be sufficient.

This was a petition by a tenant for life for the investment of purchase-money paid into court by a railway company, and for payment to him of the dividends.

The tenant for life was too infirm to make an affidavit of title as required by Cons. Ord. xxxiv, r. 3, which was accordingly made by his solicitor.

W. Pearson, for the petitioner, now asked that an

ISAAC v. HUGHES.

Voluntary settlement—Power of appointment by will, under—Release of power—Resettlement—Will.

A., by a voluntary settlement, made in 1837, settled certain real and personal estates upon himself for his life, then upon his wife for life, and then upon such trusts as he should by will appoint; and in default of such appointments, upon trust for all his children. He had four children by his then wife. She died. The settlor in 1848, by another voluntary instrument, released his power of appointment, surrendered his life estate to the trustees of the settlement of 1837, for the benefit of his four children—whom he named—resettled the property, and covenanted not to defeat the trusts of that settlement. The settlor married a second wife, by whom he had seven children. He made a will devising all his real and personal estate to his widow for life, and after her death to his seven children by her. He died in 1866:

Held (1) that the deed of 1848 was a valid release of the power of appointment by will contained in the settlement of 1837; and (2), that the children of both marriages were cestuis que trusts of the settlement of 1837.

This suit was instituted by the trustees of a voluntary settlement to ascertain the rights and interests of all parties under it. By the settlement which was dated the 25th May 1837, and made between Charles Hughes (hereinafter called the settlor) and Mary Ann his wife of the one part, and the plaintiffs of the other, after reciting inter alia that the settlor had received the sum of 400*l.* of his wife's money since his marriage, and was desirous of settling certain real and personal estates for the benefit of himself, his wife and children upon the trusts thereafter mentioned. It was witnessed that in consideration of the premises the settlor conveyed and assigned to the plaintiffs, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the real and personal estates in the settlement particularly described, to hold the same upon trust during the joint lives of the settlor and his wife for such persons, estates, and interests as the settlor and his wife should, as therein-mentioned, jointly appoint; and in default of and subject to such joint appointment, upon trust for the settlor for his life, and after his death upon trust for his wife for her life, and after the death of the survivor of them "upon trust for such person or persons, and for such estate or estates, interest or interests, absolute or conditional . . . as the said Charles Hughes [the settlor] by his last will and testament in writing, or any codicil thereto . . . should direct, limit, or appoint, and in default of such appointment . . . upon trust for all and every the child and children of the said Charles Hughes [the settlor], if more than one, in equal shares," to be paid to them in such manner and at such times as in the said indenture of settlement was mentioned. Mary Ann Hughes died in 1841 leaving four children, the issue of her marriage with the settlor.

By an indenture of the 26th Nov. 1848, and made between Thomas Hughes of the first part, the settlor of the second part, and the plaintiffs of the third part, after reciting that there were the four children (naming them) of the settlor and his late wife, it was witnessed and agreed that the settlor should, for the consideration then mentioned, and the settlor did thereby surrender his life estate in the aforesaid trust, estates and premises, and released and extinguished the power given to him of disposing of the same by will. The trust estates and premises, as also a sum of 1000*l.* secured on his life, as in the indenture now in statement mentioned, were resettled upon such and the like trusts and powers, for the benefit of his said four therein-named children by his said late wife, as were declared in the firstly-stated indenture. The plaintiffs were also thereby appointed trustees thereof, and by it the settlor covenanted with them that he would not make any will or codicil whereby the aforesaid trusts might be defeated or impeached. In 1848 the settlor married the defendant, by whom he subsequently had seven children.

The settlor by his will, dated the 13th Dec. 1866, devised and bequeathed to the defendant Ann Elizabeth Hughes, all his real and personal estates for her life, and after her decease he directed the same to be sold and the proceeds thereof to be equally divided between the seven children, the issue of his marriage with the defendant, or such of them as should be living at her decease, share and share alike, but in case any of his said children should be then dead leaving issue, then he directed that such issue should be entitled to his or her deceased parent's share. And he appointed his said wife, the defendant, and Katherine Sarah Jones joint executrixes of his said will. The settlor died on the 14th Dec. 1866.

In that state of circumstances the questions were, whether the deed of the 25th Nov. 1848 was a valid release and extinguishment of the power of appointment? whether the children of the first marriage alone were intended to be benefited by the settlement of 1837? or whether it extended to the settlor's children by the subsequent marriage.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and Vincent were for the children of the first marriage.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Lawrance were for the widow.

Karslake, Q. C. and F. Cates were for the children of the second marriage.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion, first, that the deed of the 25th Nov. 1848 was a valid release and extinguishment of the power of appointment; and secondly, that the trusts of the deed of 1837 extended to the children of the second marriage as well as those of the first.

REG. v. PRICE and OTHERS (Bridgewater Commissioners); Ex parte LOVIBOND.

Commissioners for inquiry into corrupt practices at elections—Their decision refusing a certificate to a witness reviewable—Their 'duty in taking evidence—15 & 16 Vict. c. 57—26 Vict. c. 29, s. 7.

Semble, the decision of commissioners of inquiry as to the existence of corrupt practices at elections, refusing a certificate of indemnity to a witness examined before them on the ground that he had not answered questions in the manner provided by sect. 7 of the 26 Vict. c. 29, is reviewable by this court.

Where, therefore, H. L. was examined before such commissioners, who refused to grant him such certificate on the above-mentioned ground, this court, upon an application for a mandamus commanding them to grant it, being satisfied that he had in fact answered so as to be entitled to such certificate, made the rule absolute.

This was a rule calling upon Edwin Plumer Price, Thomas Chisholm Anstey, and Charles Edward Coleridge, Esqrs., the commissioners appointed pursuant to the provisions of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, for the purpose of making inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices in the borough of Bridgewater, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them commanding them to grant to Henry Lovibond a certificate of protection and indemnity pursuant to the statute of the 26 Vict. c. 29, s. 7.

By sect. 8 of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, "An Act to provide for more effectual inquiry into the existence of corrupt practices at elections for members to serve in Parliament," it is enacted that

It shall be lawful for such commissioners by a summons under their hands and seals, or under the hand and seal of any one of them, to require the attendance before them at a place and time to be mentioned in the summons, which time shall be a reasonable time from the date of such summons, of any person whomsoever whose evidence in the judgment of such commissioners or commissioner may be material to the subject-matter of the inquiry to be made by such commissioners, and to require all persons to bring before them such books, papers, deeds, and writings as to such commissioners or commissioner appear necessary for arriving at the truth of the things to be inquired into by them under this Act; all which persons shall attend such commissioners, and shall answer all questions put to them by such commissioners touching the matters to be inquired into by them, and shall produce all books, papers, deeds, and writings required of them, and in their custody and under their control according to the tenor of the summons, provided always, that no statement made by any person in answer to any question put by such commissioner shall, except in cases of indictment for perjury committed in such answers, be admissible in evidence in any proceeding civil or criminal.

By sect. 7 of the 26 Vict. c. 29, "An Act to amend and continue the law relating to corrupt practices at elections of members of Parliament," it is enacted that

No person who is called as a witness before any election committee or any commissioners appointed in pursuance of the Act of the sessions holden in the fifteenth and sixteenth years of the reign of Her present Majesty, chapter fifty-seven, shall be excused from answering any question relating to any corrupt practice at or connected with any election forming the subject of inquiry by such committee or commissioners, on the ground that the answer thereto may criminate or tend to criminate himself. Provided always, that where any witness shall answer every question relating to the matters aforesaid which he shall be required by such committee or commissioners (as the case may be) to answer, and the answer to which may criminate or tend to criminate him, he shall be entitled to receive from the committee under the hand of their clerk, or from the commissioners under their hands (as the case may be) a certificate that such witness was upon his examination required by the said committee or commissioners to answer questions or a question relating to the matters aforesaid, the answer or answers to which criminated or tended to criminate him, and had answered all such questions or such question; and if any information, indictment, or action be at any time thereafter pending in any court against such witness for any offence under the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, or for which he might have been prosecuted or proceeded against under such Acts, committed by him previously to the time of his giving his evidence, and at or relative to the election concerning or in relation to which the witness may have been so examined, the court shall, on production and proof of such certificate, stay the proceedings in such last mentioned information, indictment, or action, and may at its discretion award to such witness such costs as he may have been put to in such information, indictment, or action: provided that no statement made by any person in answer to any question put by or before such election committee or commissioners shall, except in cases of indictments for perjury, be admissible in evidence in any proceedings, civil or criminal.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. P. Collier), the Solicitor-General Sir J. D. Coleridge), and Archibald shewed cause and contended, first, That the answers of Mr. Lovibond were not such as to entitle him to a certificate; secondly, That this court would not review the decision of the commissioners, which therefore must be taken to be final.

The court desired that the argument should in the first instance be confined to the first question, since, should that be decided against the applicant, it would be unnecessary to argue the second question. The argument therefore proceeded upon the first point alone.

H. James, Q.C., and T. W. Saunders were heard upon this point in support of the rule.

The court having intimated that before deciding the first question, they should like to have the opportunity of looking through the whole of the examinations, the rule was enlarged until Hilary Term, when the Lord Chief Justice stated that the court desired to hear the second question argued.

Jan. 20.—The Attorney-General, the Solicitor-General, and Archibald were heard in support of their second ground of objection, namely, that the decision of the commissioners is not reviewable. The commissioners before deciding whether or not they will grant their certificate, have to determine two questions. First, Has the witness answered the questions put to him? Secondly, Did the questions tend to criminate him? If the commissioners had to exercise a judicial jurisdiction, this court will not interfere to force them to exercise it in a particular way. [BLACKBURN, J.—You must contend that in every case the refusal of the commissioners to grant a certificate is final and conclusive.] That is so. The commissioners must have such a power, as it is impossible for this court to form an opinion as to the conduct of a witness. [COCKBURN, C. J.—Suppose the commissioners refuse a certificate when it manifestly ought to be granted? The commissioners can be the only competent judges as to whether or not the certificate should be granted. COCKBURN, C. J.—Suppose that we are of opinion that as a matter of fact the answers are satisfactory; is the decision of the commissioners to be final, when the Act says, “he shall be entitled to receive a certificate?” The certificate is to say that the witness was, upon his examination, required to answer questions the answers to which would criminate him, and that he had answered all such questions. How could the commissioners grant such a certificate when they were of opinion that he had not answered such questions? [BLACKBURN, J.—It turns upon whether the Legislature has not left the ultimate decision to a jury. As the law stood, upon the former statute it would seem that the commissioners had a discretion, but by the late statute it would appear that they have no longer any discretion.] It really comes to this, whether or not there has been any judicial decision. An issue which may be raised upon the mandamus as to whether or not the witness has properly answered the questions, could not be conveniently submitted to a jury. [MELLOR, J.—There may be difficulties, but then the question is, did the Legislature intend that the judgment of the commissioners should be final. COCKBURN, C. J.—The Legislature may well have considered that this court would not interfere with the decision of the commissioners except in cases where they had clearly gone wrong. LUSH, J.—Does not the late Act give the witness in express terms a right to a certificate if he answers the questions? The change in the language in the two Acts would seem to indicate the distinction between the moral and the legal right to the certificate.] But from the nature of the case the commissioners alone can reasonably decide as to whether or not the questions have been answered. This court will not interfere where a discretion is given to a particular body to decide:

Reg. v. Kensington, 12 Q. B. 654;

Ex parte King, 7 East, 91.

The Legislature could not have intended the decision of the commissioners to be subject to be reviewed by this court, for it places their decision upon the same footing as that of a committee of the House of Commons, and clearly in the latter case no mandamus would lie.

H. James, Q. C. and T. W. Saunders in support of the rule.—If the arguments on the other side are well founded, a witness, notwithstanding he had really answered all the questions, might be deprived of his certificate, and so be exposed to very severe penalties, having himself no power to cross-examine a single witness before the commissioners, or adduce any evidence in support of his statements. Where a tribunal has a discretion, there no mandamus will lie. This application, however, is not for the purpose of reviewing a discretion, but to compel the giving of a certificate upon grounds which entitle the party to it. There would be no greater difficulty in trying an issue of whether or not the witness had truly answered, than a charge of perjury. Unless, indeed, the court can review the decision of the commissioners in a case where they have clearly gone wrong, an honest witness would be wholly without remedy.

COCKBURN, C. J.—This rule for a mandamus must be made absolute. Two questions present themselves for our consideration—the first, whether there is reasonable ground to submit for further consideration and decision the question whether Mr. Lovibond has answered the questions put to him so as to entitle himself to the certificate which the Act of Parliament says shall be given in such cases, the second whether, assuming that Mr. Lovibond was entitled to the certificate, this court can interfere by mandamus to compel the commissioners to give him a certificate. I am of opinion that upon both those questions there is quite enough to issue this mandamus, with a view that the matter may be put in train for further adjudication. I will take the legal point first. I quite agree with the learned counsel who has shown cause against this rule, that if the former statute of the 15 & 16 Vict. had still remained in force unaffected by subsequent legislation, this court could not have interfered, because I take the effect of the provisions of that statute to be this—that in inquiries conducted before these tribunals a party is no longer to have the privilege of refusing to answer a question if the effect of the question is to criminate him, but that on the other hand he is to have immunity from further proceedings, criminal or civil, to recover penalties being instituted against him if he answers, or according to that statute "makes discovery" of the facts as to which the inquiry is being held, and so answers to obtain a certificate from the persons who are acting as judges in that inquiry. I think that upon that statute the immunity of the witness depends upon the granting of the certificate, and there being no provision that he shall be entitled to that certificate as of right, it was in the discretion of the commissioners to grant it or not, and if the witness did not get the certificate he had no means of compelling the commissioners to grant it. It is, however, a very different question, as it appears to me when we come to consider the present statute, and I cannot help thinking, that when the Legislature in legislating in pari materia and substituting certain provisions in the more recent Act of Parliament for those which existed in the former, has under these circumstances entirely changed the language of the enactment, it must be taken to have done so with some intention and motive. In the present statute the party who is called upon in one of these inquiries, to answer questions tending to criminate him, and does answer, is by the terms of the statute entitled to have the certificate. It is true, that there are difficulties in the exercise of the jurisdiction of this court, in controlling the decision of the commissioners, or it may be a committee of the House of Commons, or it may be now of an Election Judge. I think, however with regard to an Election Judge, that whereas at the time the statute passed no such jurisdiction existed, we must read the statute with reference to the only two cases which it provided for, namely, a committee of the House of Commons and commissioners appointed to carry on such an inquiry as this. It is very true that there are difficulties, but on the other hand and more especially in the case of the committee of the House of Commons, considering that as soon as the committee have made their report they are functi officio, they cease to exist, and it would therefore be physically impossible to apply the right to a mandamus to such a body as that. On the other hand, as the Act of Parliament distinctly says that the witness who has given answers shall be entitled to a certificate, where we have a body of persons in the shape of commissioners, who are still in existence, and to whom the process of this court may still attach, I do not see my way to the conclusion that because in the one case the exercise of the jurisdiction would be impossible, that therefore it is not to be exercised in the case in which it is possible. On that point, however, there may be some room for doubt, some room for contesting the jurisdiction, but I do not think the doubt upon that question so strong as that we ought to decline to issue the mandamus upon the return of which the question of jurisdiction may be more fully considered and determined, and if necessary taken to error. I think that if in the present case we are satisfied that there is certainly sufficient reason for urging that the party is entitled to ask this court for that, prima facie a case is made out which requires further consideration. In such a case we ought not to hesitate to make the rule absolute for a mandamus upon which the law upon the subject may be hereafter more fully considered.

BLACKBURN, J.—I quite agree in the result that this rule should be made absolute, and I quite agree that there are two questions: first, one of pure law on the construction of the Act of Parliament. I perfectly agree with the learned counsel who argued against this rule, that where there is a discretion, or indeed a discretion of any sort, given to a body of persons who are to exercise it, that though this court can require by mandamus the exercise of that discretion, it never can require its exercise in a particular way. They can order a court of quarter sessions to entertain a case and try whether or not a man is guilty, that would be a case for a jury; or, which is a better illustration, order a magistrate to hear all the evidence brought against a man and determine whether he will commit him for trial or not. The court could not order him to commit, because the magistrate has to make up his mind on that. Therefore, whenever it is a matter of discretion, all we can do is to compel him to do his duty—that is, to take the matter into consideration, and deal with it afterwards. But where the common law or the Legislature has cast on a person the duty in a particular state of facts to do a thing, not to form his opinion or exercise a discretion, or the like, but to do it in a certain state of facts, then no doubt there is a preliminary inquiry whether those facts exist, and no doubt the party called upon to do his duty must to some extent exercise common sense, and see whether the facts do exist. Well, he must do that if the facts exist, and we have then the power on being satisfied that they have been so found, to issue a peremptory mandamus ordering him to do the thing which the law makes it his duty to do. That being so, and it not being disputed by the counsel who argued, and the law being in my opinion well-established by numerous decisions, then comes the question under this statute, does the Legislature enact that the commissioners should exercise a discretion in granting a certificate that the questions had been answered? If so, all that we could do would be to order the commissioners to take the matter into account; or does the enactment mean that if the facts do exist the commissioners shall grant a certificate, in which case, if we are satisfied that the facts do exist, then we should order that a certificate be given? Now comes the question on the statute. The original Act is unrepealed, except as to the 9th and 10th sections, the former of which says, "Every person who gives evidence before the commissioners appointed under this Act to make such inquiry, and who upon such examination makes a true discovery to the best of his knowledge, touching all things to which he is so examined, shall be freed from all penal actions, forfeitures, punishments, disabilities, and incapacities, and all criminal prosecutions to which he may have been or may become liable or subject;" and then it proceeds—not in terms as a proviso, for it is a separate section, but it is in reality a proviso—that where any witness has been so examined he shall not be indemnified unless he receive from such commissioners a certificate under their hands stating that he has made a full disclosure. There is no doubt that the indemnity there was twofold: one, that he had really made a true discovery to the best of his knowledge, which is a pretty extensive phrase, and the other that he should obtain from the commissioners a certificate that he had done so.

I think that the true construction as the statute then stood was, that the commissioners were to exercise a discretion, and that the court could never have compelled them under that statute to do more than take those matters into consideration. But then the Legislature has for some reason, I cannot tell what, repealed those two sections, and instead of them it enacts, and the provision extends not only to commissioners of inquiry but to election committees, that [His Lordship read sect. 7, supra]. Then it is provided that the production of that certificate shall put an end to all proceedings against him. Now, the words that I have read are quite different from those in the former Act. In the first place, instead of leaving it as it was before, applying it only to commissioners, they have been applied to election committees as well, and no doubt there is a point on that which I will presently refer to, and which to some extent bears on the construction of the section. There, instead of providing that it shall be a full disclosure of all he knew about the matters which are being inquired into, it enacts, that if he is asked questions the answers to which tend to criminate himself, and he does answer them, he is to be entitled to a certificate, though he may utterly have refused to answer and endeavour to battle with every matter of the inquiry that did not tend to criminate himself:—as in the case I am suggesting, that a man answers frankly and fully to all questions, such as “Did you commit bribery?” but when he is questioned as a part of the inquiry which may be a very material one indeed, as “Do you not know, or cannot you relate, circumstances which show that the candidates were parties to it, or that bribery was universal?” or other matters of that sort, he may baffle the commissioners completely, and yet be entitled to his certificate of indemnity. I do not think that the Legislature passed the Act thinking of that conclusion, and I only mention it because it is one of the reasons for the Legislature to consider whether the old Act was not better than the new one which has been substituted for it. Then it goes on to say, not that he shall have no indemnity unless he gets his certificate, but it enacts in express terms that he shall be entitled to a certificate. Now it is highly probable that the Legislature were not thinking of the consequences which would follow from entitling him to a certificate absolutely, namely, that a jury might decide and overrule the decision of the Election Committee in one case or the commissioners in the other—they probably were not thinking about that at all; but they have used words which in the ordinary way of legislation would be proper and correct words to express that perfectly legal right to it, provided that the circumstances exist, and I see nothing which militates against it. There are two arguments which I have listened to attentively against giving these words their natural meaning, namely, that if it is to be considered as a positive legal right, the Legislature could not have meant it, because when the witness has truly answered, it must inevitably require some consideration whether the commissioners will let him have a certificate or not, and they cannot be expected by the Legislature to put their hands and seals to a certificate of fact which though a jury under the direction of a judge might think perhaps true, they themselves would think false—that in reality from the very nature of the thing, when any person is required to certify facts which have happened before him, the Legislature must have meant to certify according to his belief—according to his judgment; that he was to tell them what he believed to be true, and that if he made a mistake he was not to be expected to tell what he thought to be a falsehood, because, in reality he did not think it a falsehood. That argument is one which may raise some difficulty, but can hardly, I think, overrule the express words of the Act of Parliament. I quite agree with what my Lord threw out about the substitution of the election judge for the election committee, and that we must look at the fact as if there was an election committee; and everyone who knows the practice of the House of Commons knows that when once the committee had given in their report to the Speaker and had ceased to sit, there could not have been a mandamus calling upon them to review their decision. Then there was an argument that the Legislature could not have intended that its proceedings should be reviewable by mandamus, and could not have intended to make the granting of a certificate a perfectly legal right to be enforced by a mandamus. But I do not think that this argument, upon the whole, is sound. If the Legislature did make it a positive duty, the legal consequences would follow, namely, that it must be enforced where it can be, although they have made it a positive legal duty where the writ could not be granted and enforced. There is strong ground for suspecting that the Legislature did not contemplate this consequence, nevertheless, if they have enacted that a witness is to be entitled to a certificate, then I think a mandamus ought to go, if the facts are established that he really was asked questions tending to criminate himself, and answered every such question. If that is so, I think he would be entitled to a certificate, and a mandamus would go to enforce it. That is the opinion I have formed, and if I had to decide finally, I should decide to that effect. The writ must go, and if it is advisable, the question may be taken to the House of Lords. [His Lordship then reviewed the question whether Mr. Lovibond had answered satisfactorily, and concluded:] As it stands, I quite agree that the rule for the writ should be made absolute.

MELLOR, J.—I am not at all insensible to the inconvenience which must necessarily result from the mode of trying the issues upon a writ of mandamus if it should go, as our rule would authorise it to do; but at the same time, notwithstanding those inconveniences, I confess that I do not regret the change in the language of the present Act of Parliament as compared with the language of the former Act, because, having reference to the extraordinary consequences which follow from the refusal of the certificate, to a person who has been examined before the commissioners, and considering the policy of the law, which is to induce people to come forward and make a full disclosure of the corrupt practices in which they may have taken part, not for the purpose of coming upon them, but for the purpose, as Mr. James truly pointed out, to enable the Legislature to disfranchise and punish boroughs in which those corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, I cannot help thinking it is desirable there should be some means of reviewing the decisions which the commissioners had come to, and I cannot help thinking, at the same time, that the present case affords a sufficient reason for that. Now as to the construction of the statutes, I certainly have come to an opinion very satisfactory to my own mind, that the writ of mandamus is the remedy in this case. When I recollect the distinction in the language between the former Act and the present Act, I cannot help thinking that it must have been made for the purpose of preventing the judgment of the commissioners on the sufficiency of the answers being conclusive. I can only say, if it was not altered without intention, it is a most unfortunate expression—the expression of the present section—because the giving of the certificate is not made in any way to depend upon the answers being to the satisfaction of the commissioners. It is simply a question of fact—did he, or did he not?—and that is the condition upon which the right to the certificate depends. The section does not provide that the witness shall answer every question to the satisfaction of the commissioners, but merely that he shall answer every question relating to the matters aforesaid, which he may be required by the commissioners to answer, and the answer to which may criminate or tend to criminate him. Now that being the state of things, if we are satisfied in point of fact that the inquiries which were made by the commissioners were answered so far as they were entitled to be answered, then the witness is entitled to his certificate; and it appears to me as a matter of right he is entitled to it, and that being so, his true remedy is by mandamus to compel the commissioners to grant it in the event of their declining. Beyond all doubt the main questions were answered fully by Mr. Lovibond, and that being so, I think the commissioners ought to have given him a certificate. I think it is highly politic to encourage witnesses to come forward and give their evidence on full expectation that if they really do state all the facts which are required for the purposes of the inquiry, they ought to be entitled to an indemnity; and I think it would be serious indeed if it should be a prevailing impression that the commissioners may arbitrarily, and without review, refuse to give a witness his certificate.

LUSH, J.—After the elaborate judgments of my learned brethren, I do not think it necessary to say more than that I quite agree in thinking that the writ ought to issue.

SMITH v. SYDNEY AND OTHERS.

Trespass—Right of action where judgment set aside—Judgment regularly signed—Jurisdiction of master at chambers—30 & 31 Vict. c. 98, s. 1.

A judgment which has been regularly and in good faith signed, though for an amount greater than is actually due, although it is afterwards set aside, furnishes a defence to an action of trespass brought against the party who causes the defendant to be arrested under a ca. sa. sued out upon it. Secus if the judgment has been signed irregularly or in bad faith.

In order to determine whether the party who causes the arrest is a wrongdoer, the court will look and see what were the grounds on which the judgment was set aside.

Trespass for false imprisonment. Pleas, not guilty and a justification under a ca. sa. upon a judgment for 34l. 9s. Replication to second plea that the judgment was irregularly signed for 34l. 9s., there being only 16l. 1s. due, as the parties who sued out the ca. sa. well knew, and that for that cause it was set aside by one of the masters of the court, and the money paid in excess of the amount due ordered to be repaid. Rejoinder, that the judgment was regularly signed on the nonappearance of the defendant to a writ specially indorsed, and was not set aside for irregularity.

Held, that the judgment having been regularly signed, and not having been set aside for bad faith, an action could not be maintained against the defendants who had caused the plaintiff to be arrested under the ca. sa. sued out upon it.

This was a demurrer to a rejoinder.

The declaration was for an assault, illegal arrest, and false imprisonment by the defendants, H. M. Sydney, C. L. Hutchings, and Francis Romer.

Pleas (1) not guilty, (2) that before the alleged trespass (to wit) on the 14th June 1869, in the Court of Exchequer of Pleas at Westminster, the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer, by the consideration and judgment of the said court, recovered against the plaintiff 34l. 9s., and thereupon, the said judgment remaining in force and unsatisfied, the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer, by the said H. M. Sydney, their attorney, before the alleged trespasses (to wit) on the 28th June 1869, sued out of the said court a writ of capias ad satisfaciendum, directed to the sheriff of Middlesex, whereby the said sheriff was commanded to take the plaintiff, if he should be found in his bailiwick, and him safely keep, so that he might have his body before the barons of the said Exchequer at Westminster immediately after the execution of the said writ, to satisfy the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer the sum so recovered, with interest upon the same at the rate of 4l. per cent. per annum from the said day on which the said judgment was entered. And the said writ was then delivered by the defendants to the sheriff of the said county to be executed, and thereupon the said sheriff, by virtue of the said writ, and whilst the same was in force and within his said bailiwick, took the plaintiff and safely kept him according to the exigency of the said writ, which are the alleged trespasses in the declaration mentioned.

Replication: First, joining issue on the first plea; secondly, as to the second plea the defendants say that there is not any record of the alleged judgment remaining in the said Court of Exchequer; thirdly, that the said judgment was irregularly signed for the sum of 34l. 9s., there being then only 16l. 1s. due from the plaintiff to the defendants, C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer, as all the defendants then well knew; and before this suit the said judgment was for the cause aforesaid by an order duly made by one of the masters of the said court set aside, and the money paid in excess of 16l. 1s. to the sheriff by the plaintiff was by the said order ordered to be repaid, less the costs of and occasioned by the application to the said master.

Rejoinder, as to the third replication, that the said judgment was regularly signed in an action commenced by writ of summons by the said C. L. Hutchings, and F. Romer against the plaintiff, who then resided within the jurisdiction of the said Court of Exchequer, in which the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer claimed the sum of 34l. 9s. as a debt due to them from the plaintiff, and the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer made upon the said writ of summons, and a copy thereof, a special indorsement of the particulars of their claim in the form contained in the schedule A. to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852 annexed, marked No. 4, and the plaintiff having been duly served with the said writ, and not having appeared thereto, according to the exigency thereof, the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer, on filing an affidavit of personal service of the said writ of summons, signed final judgment in the form contained in the schedule A to the said Act annexed, marked No. 5, for the sum indorsed on the said writ, and costs, which is the said judgment in the said plea mentioned, and afterwards in due time issued the said execution in the said second plea mentioned, and after the issuing of the said execution, and the arrest and imprisonment of the plaintiff thereunder, as in the said plea mentioned, the plaintiff served the defendants with the following judge's summons:

HUTCHINGS AND ANOTHER v. SMITH.—Let the plaintiffs' attorney or agent attend me at my chambers in Rolls-gardens, on Monday next, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, to show cause why the judgment signed herein and all subsequent proceedings thereon should not be set aside, and why the plaintiffs should not be ordered to repay to the defendant the sum of 15l., part of a sum of 30l., and the amount paid by the defendant for costs of action, execution and sheriff's fees, on the ground that the only amount payable by the defendant was 15l. and no more, and that such judgment was signed in absolute bad faith after a promise by the plaintiffs that no proceedings should be taken on the writ, and after full notice to plaintiff's attorney that 15l. only was due.

Dated the 3rd day of July, 1869.

GEO. BRAMWELL.

and made affidavit in support thereof, that at the commencement of the said action, 16l. 1s. only was due from him to the said C. L. Hutchings and F. Romer, and that he had paid to the said sheriff of Middlesex, under the said execution, the full sum recovered by the said judgment; and thereupon Master Johnson, one of the masters of the said court, made the following order:—

HUTCHINGS AND ANOTHER v. SMITH.—Upon hearing counsel

SMITH v. SYDNEY AND OTHERS.

on both sides, and upon reading the two affidavits of Sidney S. Smith, and the affidavit of C. L. Hutchings, I do order that the judgment signed herein be set aside; the money paid in excess of 16l. 1s. to the sheriff to be repaid, less the costs of, and occasioned by, this application.

Dated the 7th July 1869. W. H. JOHNSON, Master.

Which is the order in the said replication mentioned, and so the defendants say that the said judgment was not irregularly signed, and was not set aside for irregularity.

Demurrer to this rejoinder, and joinder in demurrer.

Dixon, in support of the demurrer.—The judgment obtained in the former action having been set aside, and no terms imposed on the defendant in that action not to bring an action, he is entitled to maintain the present action for his arrest and imprisonment. A judgment, when set aside, is no protection for what has been done under it, except in the case where it has been set aside for error. In Prentice v. Harrison, 4 Q. B. 852, which was an action for false imprisonment, to which the defendant pleaded a judgment recovered, and that the plaintiff was arrested under a ca. sa. sued out thereon, a replication averring that the ca. sa., after the issuing thereof and before the commencement of the suit was set aside by a judge's order not averring the grounds of such order, was held bad on special demurrer on the ground that the writ might, under supposable circumstances, have been set aside for reasons which would have been ground of error, and would not therefore have prevented it, until set aside, from being a justification to parties enforcing it, and the replication did not negative the existence of such circumstances. The ratio decidendi of the case is in favour of the present plaintiff's contention. "The plaintiff was bound," said Patterson, J., "to show by his replication that the writ under which the defendants justify was set aside under such circumstances that it must have been illegal when they put it in force. Now, if any case can be suggested in which the writ might be set aside, and yet the party enforcing it not liable, the replication is bad, as we cannot presume that the fact was one way or the other. We held the other day that execution sued out more than a year and a day after judgment, without a sci. fa. was not void, but voidable by writ of error, and also that the writ and proceedings might be set aside on motion. And we constantly do set them aside in that way, though perhaps in strictness we should only set aside the execution. But if the court or a judge can deal with a writ of execution improperly issued without a sci. fa., and the only mode in which it can be so dealt with is by setting it aside, it is not clear that the writ in the present case was not so disposed of; and the replication not excluding that supposition is too uncertain." It is quite clear from the present record that the judgment was not set aside for error. In Collett v. Foster, 2 H. & N., 356, a similar case, judgment had been entered up against the plaintiff, on a warrant of attorney, for 60l. given to the defendant to secure the payment of a debt by instalments, of which less than 20l. were due; and the defendant's attorney caused the plaintiff to be arrested under a ca. sa., endorsed to levy 21l. 10s., an act which the defendant acknowledged that she had authorised; and the writ being afterwards set aside by order of a judge it was held that the defendant was liable in trespass. "To make a distinction," said Martin B., "between writs set aside on the ground of irregularity, and on the ground of their not being warranted by the statute referred to, would introduce difficulties. If the writ issued in course of law and was set aside, I should be prepared to hold the client liable . . . once set aside, the operation of the writ for the protection of the party is at an end." And Bramwell B.

"Upon the question as to the replication, I am inclined to think the material point is whether the writ was set aside or not. As to the case of Prentice v. Harrison, there may be some doubt whether the rule there laid down is correct. It appears to me that the effect of this replication is to traverse the writ by showing that it was quashed and annulled by the court from which it issued." There is nothing now in existence to protect the present defendant; he alleges a judgment recovered, but it appears on the record that there is no judgment in existence. [LUSH J.—The judgment is still on the record of the court in which it was obtained, though there may be a memorandum added to it that it has been set aside by judge's order. Moreover, the writ having been specially endorsed and judgment having been signed on account of the defendant not appearing, we know that it was not irregularly signed.] In King v. Harrison, 15 East, 615, Le Blanc J. asked if there were any case where the party could justify under process which was afterwards vacated; but none was mentioned. [LUSH J.—The judgment only in the present case has been set aside; the writ remains still.] Brooks v. Hodgkinson 4 H. & N., 712, is an authority for the proposition that it is not necessary that the writ should be set aside in order to constitute the party a trespasser, provided the judgment has been set aside. There a defendant was taken in execution under a ca. sa. issued on a judgment for less than 20l. without the order of a judge who tried the cause, and it was held that he could maintain an action of trespass against the plaintiff and his attorney, though the writ had not been set aside.

Brown, Q.C. (with whom was Cassall) for the defendants.—In the first place the master has overstepped his power in setting aside the judgment obtained in the former action. The Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 68, s. 1, enables the majority of the judges to make rules for empowering the masters of the court, "or some one or more of them, to do any such thing, and to transact any such business, and to exercise any such authority and jurisdiction in respect of the same, as by virtue of any statute or custom, or by the rules and practice of the said courts, or any of them respectively, are now done, transacted, or exercised by a judge of the said courts sitting at chambers, and as shall be specified in any such rule;" but adds a restriction, "except in respect of matters relating to the liberty of the subject." Setting aside the judgment on which the plaintiff was arrested was an act which comes within this exception. [LUSH, J.—Then the master can never set aside a judgment; and every step in the cause affects the liberty of the subject if the ultimate result is looked to. MELLOR, J.—I don't think much can be made of this point.] As to the other point; the judgment was regularly obtained, the plaintiff in the former action having specially indorsed the writ, and being entitled to sign judgment on the non-appearance of the defendant. In such a case the judgment is set aside only on an affidavit of merits. "Even a regular judgment," it is said in Chitty's Arch. Practice, p. 988, "may be set aside upon an affidavit of merits, and in ordinary cases it is almost a matter of course to grant the application for this purpose," and nothing is said about the necessity of imposing the condition that no action should be brought. The cases clearly distinguish between proceedings set aside for irregularity or bad faith and those which are set aside on an affidavit of merits, or on the ground of error. In Williams v. Smith, 14 C. B., N. S., 622, Williams, J., says: "If the attachment in this case had been set aside on the ground of irregularity, or that it was issued in bad faith, or in any other way equivalent to irregularity

SMITH v. SYDNEY AND OTHERS.

I should have thought that both the attorney and the client would be liable for any imprisonment which took place under it. But, upon the facts which appeared at the trial, it is not true that the attachment was set aside for irregularity, or on the ground that it was issued in bad faith. The affidavit upon which it issued was sworn by Smith in the ordinary course of justice; and the Master of the Rolls was satisfied that it was a proper one upon which to found an attachment. It was not suggested when the application was made to that learned judge to set aside the attachment that there was any fault in the affidavit, but merely that the issuing of the attachment was not warranted by the circumstances. The Master of the Rolls, however, came to the conclusion that the facts did warrant the attachment. That opinion of the Master of the Rolls was pronounced by the Lords' Justices, upon appeal, to be erroneous. That brings the case within that class of cases where it has been held that the party causing process to be issued is not responsible for anything that is done under it where the process is afterwards set aside, not for irregularity, but for error. It follows, therefore, that the order of the Lords Justices setting aside the attachment in this case does not prevent the parties from being protected against the consequences of what was done under the attachment." And Willes J. said: "It by no means follows that because a writ or an attachment is set aside an action for false imprisonment lies against those who procured it to be issued. If that were so this absurd consequence would follow, that every person concerned in enforcing the execution of a judgment would be held responsible for its correctness. Where an execution is set aside on the ground of an erroneous judgment, the plaintiff or his attorney would be no more liable to an action than the sheriff who executes the process is. When a judgment is set aside for error, the proper course is not to bring an action, but to proceed by writ of restitution or by the course which the modern practice has substituted for it. I entirely agree with what has been laid down by my Lord and my brother Williams, that in order to entitle the party against whom the process issues to maintain an action for any intermediate acts done under it, he must show that the process has been set aside by reason of some misconduct, or at least some irregularity on the part of the person suing it out." [MELLOR, J.—There is certainly no irregularity or bad faith shown in the present case.] The text books state the rule in the same manner. In Lush's Practice (3rd edit.) p., 191, it is said, "Writs irregular in point of form, but not absolutely void, afford a justification so long as they remain in force; but when set aside for the irregularity a right of action arises for anything done under them against the party and against his attorney by whom they are issued." So in 1 Chitty's Arch. Practice, p. 641, "Although the writ be irregular, yet unless it be set aside the party at whose suit it is issued, and his attorney, may justify under it. But after it has been set aside for irregularity they cannot do so; and the latter is liable in trespass as well as the former for an arrest or the like made under it." Philips v. Biron, 1 Strange Rep. 509, was also referred to, where it was said, per curiam, that "in the case of error it is no fault of the party but of the court, and therefore binds till reversed."

Diron in reply.—The report in the case last cited does not state on what grounds the judgment was vacated. In Williams v. Smith, Williams J. was of opinion that, if the attachment had been set aside on the ground of irregularity or bad faith, "or in any other way equivalent to irregularity," an action would lie. It only appears on the present record that the judgment was knowingly signed for too much. [LUSH J.—As to the averment that it was knowingly done, I take that to be mere surplusage, and to be wholly immaterial to the issue.]

MELLOR J.—I think our judgment must be for the defendants. Everything which could be said in favour of the other view of the subject has been said, and the case did no doubt present some difficulty as to the conclusion we should arrive at. It appears upon the record that the plaintiff had issued a writ, specially indorsed, claiming too much, and the defendant, instead of resisting, allowed judgment to go against him by default. There was then a valid subsisting judgment against him at the time of the application to the master. The ground of application to the master was that the plaintiff had recovered more than was due to him, the defendant also alleging that the judgment for the excessive amount had been signed in bad faith, and execution issued for more than the proper amount. But the master, in setting aside the judgment, has confined himself to the one ground, or rather has negatived any imputation of bad faith; and there does not seem to have been any strictly legal irregularity in the proceedings at all. If, then, the master treated the judgment as a valid one, and set it aside, not on the grounds mentioned in the summons, but did so as what may be called a matter of favour to the defendant; in that view, it seems to me we are entitled and bound to look and see what really were the grounds on which it was set aside, and whether the plaintiff was in reality a wrongdoer either in proceeding irregularly or against good faith. The plaintiff in the present action has failed to make out that the former plaintiff was a wrongdoer in either of these ways, and, looking at the record, I can see nothing entitling him to maintain action. This is, I think, the true view of the case, and I think it falls within the rule suggested, though not embodied in an actual decision, by Williams J. in the judgment in Williams v. Smith (ubi sup.) which has been referred to. I am therefore of opinion that the defendant is entitled to judgment.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think it is well established that the mere fact that judgment has been set aside is not of itself sufficient to make the plaintiff in the action a wrongdoer; but that the court, in order to determine whether he is such, must see also the grounds on which the judgment has been set aside, whether for irregularity, bad faith, or on the merits. Now the authorities distinguish between that which is an act of the court and that which is an act of the party; and it is only where the proceedings are set aside for misconduct of the party that he is made a wrongdoer by relation. Now, looking at this record, it is plain that the order of the master was made, not upon the ground of any misconduct on the part of the present defendant, but because the master was satisfied that there was, for some reason or another, a larger sum mentioned in the judgment than was properly due, and he interfered in an equitable manner, and in order to place the parties in their just position towards each other. The rejoinder shows that the plaintiffs in the first action had issued a writ and had specially indorsed upon it the particulars of their claim; that the defendant made default in not appearing; and that the plaintiff, at the expiration of the specified time, signed judgment as he was authorised to do by the Common Law Procedure Act 1852. The judgment so signed was as valid and good by way of protection for anything done under it as if the defendant had appeared and the case had been tried and a verdict had been returned by a jury for the whole amount claimed by the plaintiffs, and the court had given judgment upon that verdict. Where judgment is signed in the case of a writ specially indorsed, on the expiration of a certain time, that judgment is as much the act of the court as judgment upon the verdict I have mentioned would have been. It is simply an act of the court, and it was set aside by way of correcting an erroneous act of the court, and not as being a wrongful act of the defendant. This case, therefore, falls within the established principle that the plaintiff in an action is not made a trespasser by reason of the judgment obtained in the action being set aside on the ground that it was an erroneous act of the court.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear that the mere fact of a judgment being set aside does not deprive the party who has obtained it of the protection which it affords, otherwise it would be sufficient to plead nul tiel record simply; and it is plain upon the authorities that that is not sufficient, but that it is necessary to go further, and show on what grounds the judgment was set aside. The effect of the rejoinder in the present case is to show us what were the real facts, and to establish that this was not a case of irregularity in the signing of judgment, but the contrary. The reason of the rule is that the court may see whether, on examination of the reasons which induced the setting aside of the judgment, the party who signed it was in reality a wrongdoer. If he were a wrongdoer, then the judgment having been set aside would be no shield to him. It seems to me that the defendants in this case were not, in the legal sense of the term, wrongdoers, that they did only what the law authorised them to do when the defendant in the former action did not appear to make his defence; and that the master set aside the judgment, not for irregularity, but only by way of favour to the defaulting defendant, in order to prevent a larger sum being recovered than was due. I am therefore of opinion that our judgment must be for the defendants.

Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 29 and 31, 1870.

COSSEY AND WIFE v. LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Medical reports—Impending litigation—Privileged communications.

The plaintiff's sustained injuries in a railway accident, caused, as alleged, by the defendants' negligence. The plaintiff's made a claim on the company, by letter, for compensation, and a medical officer in the employ of the defendants called upon the plaintiff's and made an investigation of the injuries they had sustained; he afterwards sent written reports to the defendants of the plaintiff's condition, and subsequently this action was commenced for compensation:

Held, on an application by the plaintiff's for inspection of these reports, that they were confidential communications obtained by the defendants with a view to impending litigation, and that they were privileged from inspection within the limitation laid down in Woolley v. The North London Railway Company, L. Rep. 4, C. P. 602; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613.

It appeared from the affidavit of the plaintiff's attorney that this action was brought to recover compensation for injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff's by a collision of trains on the defendants' railway at the New Cross Station of the said railway, on the night of the 23rd June last.

The writ of summons in the action was issued on the 24th Dec. last; declaration in the action was delivered on the 5th Jan. inst., whereby the plaintiff's claimed 5000*l*.

Before the action was commenced the defendants' medical and other officers examined the plaintiff's, to ascertain the nature and extent of their injuries, and the compensation the plaintiff's required.

On or about the 3rd Dec. last the plaintiff's attorneys received from the defendants' attorneys a letter, in which certain reports were referred to, which were believed by the plaintiff's attorneys to be the reports of the defendants' said medical officers.

Application had been made by the plaintiff's attorneys to the defendants' attorneys to inspect and take copies of or extracts from the said reports, and refused.

The plaintiff's were advised that having submitted to be examined by the defendants' said officers, they were entitled to inspect the reports of such examination made by the defendants' said officers; that it was necessary that they, the plaintiff's, should be prepared to prove the said reports as part of their case on the trial of this action, and that they had just grounds to maintain this action.

It appeared from the affidavits of the defendants' attorney, who was acquainted with the arrangements of the defendants' company, and terms upon which the principal officers thereof were employed, that Dr. Duncan Maclachlan Maclure, Bachelor of Medicine of the University of London, member of the College of Physicians, lecturer on physiology at Westminster Hospital, &c., was the regular and permanent medical officer of the said company, and was employed at a salary to attend the servants of the said company, and to examine into and report upon all cases of injuries to passengers on the said railway, with the view of advising thereon and of meeting any claims that might be made on the said company in consequence thereof.

On the 13th July 1869 the said company received from the plaintiff William Cossey a letter of which the following is a copy:

Prince Alfred, Offord-road, Barnsbury-park,
London, July 20th, 1869.

Sir,—I regret to inform you that the effects of the collision at New Cross on the evening of the 23rd June have been much more serious than I had anticipated. I have suffered very much myself, nearly every joint has been affected, and it has been with difficulty and pain that I have been able to do anything. I feel shaken all over, and everything is burdensome.

My wife is more seriously affected. The veins in the legs have been inflamed; the pain in back has been very severe, and the system altogether upset. In addition she is ruptured, and has been compelled to wear a truss. As to all these matters, I beg to refer you to Dr. Ingoldby, surgeon, 11, Finsbury-square.—I remain, yours truly, W. Cossey.

After the receipt of the said letter the said Dr. Maclure, at the request of defendants, visited the said William George Cossey on behalf of the defendants, and as such medical officer as aforesaid, in order to inquire into the nature of their alleged injuries, and with a view of enabling the company's advisers to meet and consider what should be done in reference to the claim for compensation put forward by the said letter; and the said Dr. Maclure made certain reports, dated 7th Oct. 1869, as to the injuries sustained by the plaintiff's respectively, which are the only medical reports made to defendants concerning the matter in dispute in this action, and which are the reports mentioned in the letter from defendants to plaintiff's attorneys.

These reports have been regarded by the defendants as, and are of a strictly private and confidential nature, emanating from an official and agent of the company, and made only for the information and guidance of the directors and their advisers and the said Dr. Maclure has in his said reports spoken of sums of money which, in his opinion, might be paid by the said company as compensation to the plaintiffs for their said injuries.

The said Dr. Maclure would, as was believed, be a necessary and material witness for the defendants on the trial of the said action, and would be called as such witness, and his said reports would form the subject matter of his evidence at such trial.

The defendants were advised and believed that the production of the said medical report to the said plaintiffs, or their attorney, would be prejudicial to the interests of the defendants and to their defence on the trial of this action.

Application had been made by the plaintiffs at chambers to inspect in the presence of witnesses, and take copies of and extracts from, the reports made by the medical officers of the defendants of the injuries sustained by the plaintiffs, and the reports made by the defendant's officers or agents of interviews had with the plaintiffs as to the compensation the plaintiffs required. Willes, J., to whom the application was made, endorsed the summons, "Referred to the court, cause to be shown in the first instance."

Crompton now moved the court for an order accordingly.

Joyce showed cause in the first instance.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—BOVILL, C. J.—This was a motion for a rule to obtain inspection of certain medical reports in the custody of the defendants, and cause was shown in the first instance. The main ground of objection to inspection by the plaintiffs was that the reports were procured by the defendants with a view to impending litigation. There is no doubt about the principle in cases of this kind; it was distinctly laid down in Woolley v. The North London Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 602 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 613. I am there reported to have said: "I am of opinion that where a report is made by an officer of a company to the manager for the purpose of conveying information to him upon the subject to which it relates, it is not privileged, whether made before or after litigation has been commenced or threatened, and whether it contains matters of fact or of mere opinion. . . . If opinions are obtained confidentially with a view to litigation, they are privileged." Amongst other cases upon which that conclusion was based was that of The Chartered Bank of India v. Rich, 4 B. & S. 73. It was an action between the plaintiffs, who carried on business as bankers in various places, and the defendant, who had been their agent at Bombay, upon an agreement between them, of which the plaintiffs alleged the defendant had committed breaches; the documents, for which inspection was asked by the defendant, were all written by or to officers of the plaintiffs with the view of obtaining or furnishing information as to the proceedings to be taken by the plaintiffs against the defendant before the action was commenced. The court held that they were privileged, and ought not to be produced for the inspection of the other side. Cockburn, C. J. said, in his judgment, "If a man writes a private letter to an agent or friend, asking him to obtain information for him on a matter as to which he is about to engage, or has already engaged in litigation, I doubt whether a discovery or inspection of the answer to that letter would be ordered by any of the learned judges in equity to whose decisions reference has been made; and I will not be a party to establishing such a precedent." As we stated in Woolley v. The North London Railway Company, there are many cases where it has been held that information, which may have been obtained in the ordinary course in apprehension of litigation, must be disclosed, as in Coleman v. Truman, 3 H. & N. 871, and in The Chartered Bank of India v. Rich, where Blackburn, J. said, "If I thought that the present case was like Coleman v. Truman, in which there was a question whether there had been fraud committed by the plaintiffs and their agents in India, I might be of a different opinion." The question for us here is what is the nature of the documents in this particular instance? They are reports of the medical officers of the company, written certainly months before this action commenced, and therefore, as the plaintiffs contend, they ought to have inspection of them, on the authority of Baker v. The London and South-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 91. We must see whether the point raised on the affidavits in that case was the same as that here. I think not. The only objection made by the defendants there, in resisting the production of the documents, was that they were confidential communications made to the defendants by their agents or servants in the course of their duty. The action was brought by executors to recover damages for the death of the testator, caused, as alleged, by the negligence of the defendants' company. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and that the deceased had accepted 75*l.* in discharge of all claims connected with the accident, from which it was alleged the death had afterwards resulted. The defendants had sent a clerk in their secretary's office and their medical officer to see the deceased, and ascertain his state, and to negotiate as to the pecuniary compensation to be made him. The court ordered the plaintiff's inspection and copies of the reports made to the defendants by these officers of their interviews with the deceased; and I think they rightly so held, because the case was peculiar, and the reports could not be said to have been made with a view to the litigation which afterwards took place; further, than that, we are informed by one of the counsel in that case of a fact which does not appear in the report, viz., that the accord and satisfaction pleaded by the defendants was resisted on the ground of fraud. If that were so I can clearly understand that no other conclusion was possible. In the judgment Cockburn, C. J. adhered to the decision in the Chartered Bank of India v. Rich, but distinguished it from the case before him, and that distinction may have been based upon something in the affidavits beyond what appears in the report. There is nothing in the affidavits here in any way suggestive of fraud, but they are sufficient to show clearly that the reports related to the compensation to be offered by the company. Dr. Maclure was employed for that purpose in order to avert litigation; and after the accident occurred, upon a complaint being made by the plaintiffs, he went in the course of his employment to investigate their injuries, with a view to the claims for compensation which they had made upon the company. This case seems to me, by its circumstances, to be within the privileged exemption from inspection which is the result of the decisions in the Chartered Bank of India v. Rich, and Woolley v. The North London Railway Company. It is not an exceptional case like that of Baker v. The London and South Western Railway Company, but it must be governed by the rule of protection applicable to confidential documents written with a view to impending litigation. It is not necessary that the litigation should have actually commenced. The rule will be refused.

SMITH, J.—The question in this case is whether the rule concerning the privilege of confidential documents written with a view to impending litigation applies to these medical reports. I think they come within the limitation this court laid down in Woolley v. North London Railway Company upon the authority of previous cases. As I said in that case, "I understand that limitation to be this, that, if the documents are procured for the purpose of assisting the party in an impending litigation, and to obtain advice, they are not to be produced." I agree entirely with our conclusion in that case, and I wish also to refer to a case of Ross v. Gibbs, 39 L. J. 61, Ch., in which Stuart, V.C. said, "The privilege which exempts a communication from production is the privilege of the client, and not of the solicitor; and communications relative to the subject-matter of the suit, and furnished with a view to litigation, are as much protected upon principle, when made by a lay agent to a litigant, as they are when made by a solicitor." It seems to me that those observations are sound, and the limitation laid down by us in Woolley v. North London Railway Company ought to be construed liberally in favour of the litigant in whose possession the documents are. The present case seems to me to be certainly within that limitation; the reports were written after the plaintiffs made claims against the company, and when the company were in fact in immediate peril of an action; they were obtained by the defendants with a view to litigation. We were pressed in the argument by the case of Baker v. London and South-Western Railway Company, in the Queen's Bench. I should be sorry to disagree with that decision, and it is not necessary to do so, for the circumstances of that case differ from those here: in that case it was not contended that the reports there were obtained with a view to the litigation then before the court.

BRETT, J.—I am strongly of opinion that the rule in Woolley v. North London Railway Company is a good working rule with reference to matters of this kind, and it is clear to my mind that the decision in Baker v. London and South-Western Railway Company does not necessarily conflict with it; therefore, the only question is as to the application of the rule to this case. The medical man employed by the company went to examine the plaintiffs merely for the purpose of assisting the defendants in coming to a determination to admit or resist the plaintiffs' claims. Under such circumstances, inspection of the medical reports ought not to be granted.

Rule refused.

CORNISH v. STUBBS.

Landlord and tenant—Reasonable time to remove goods after expiration of tenancy.

Plaintiff occupied a house of the defendant at a weekly tenancy, with the privilege of storing goods on a wharf and in a warehouse of the defendant adjoining; there had been an arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendant's predecessor in title that the plaintiff should be allowed a reasonable time beyond the conclusion of his tenancy by a week's notice, in order to remove his goods; the defendant alleged that he never assented to the plaintiff's use of the warehouse, but the plaintiff continued his occupation and paid rent as before. Defendant refused to allow the plaintiff to remove his goods from the warehouse after the expiration of a week's notice to quit; and the judge directed the jury at the trial of an action upon a breach of the alleged agreement, that if they believed in the existence of the arrangement stated by the plaintiff to have been made between him and the defendant's predecessor in title, the plaintiff had a right to recover:

Held, that this direction was right.

This action was tried at Warwick before Cleasby, B. The plaintiff was a builder and furniture dealer at Birmingham; the defendant was executor to his deceased father, who held on lease a canal wharf and some dwelling-houses abutting thereon. One Howell was sub-lessee of these premises, and on the 20th May, 1861, the plaintiff became a yearly tenant under him of one of these houses, at the annual rent of 35*l.*, including taxes. The plaintiff also had the joint use of some offices, a right of road over the wharf to them, and the privilege of laying timber or other materials on any part of the unused wharf, and in a warehouse thereon. On the 25th March 1864 Howell gave plaintiff a quarter's notice to quit, in order to make him a weekly tenant, and to determine his tenancy at the expiration of the lease from Stubbs. At the conclusion of the period of this notice the plaintiff became a weekly tenant, under an agreement in writing, the tenancy to be determinable at a week's notice by either Howell or the plaintiff. There was also a verbal arrangement at the same time that Howell should not determine the tenancy without giving the plaintiff a sufficient opportunity to remove his cumbrous stock and obtain other premises. On the 29th Sept. 1864, Howell's lease expired, and, according to the plaintiff's evidence, he became tenant on the same terms to the testator, the defendant's father, who died in June 1868. The plaintiff afterwards continued to pay rent to the defendant, and, as he alleged, continued his tenancy on the same terms as before.

On the 16th Jan. 1869, defendant served upon plaintiff notice to quit on the 25th Jan. The plaintiff desiring to make fresh terms with the defendant, took no steps to remove, and on the 27th Jan. he received a letter requiring him to give up possession to the defendant forthwith, requesting him at once to remove all materials from the wharf and warehouse he had been using, demanding compensation for the use of the warehouse, and threatening ejectment.

The plaintiff made proposals for a continuation of his tenancy, which, however, the defendant refused, and the plaintiff advertised a sale by auction of all his goods and materials for the 11th and 12th Feb. 1869.

On the 8th Feb. the plaintiff received a letter, in which the defendant stated that he would not allow the sale to take place unless compensation were first paid for the use of the warehouse in which the defendant alleged the plaintiff had been a trespasser.

The plaintiff declined to pay the compensation claimed, and the defendant prevented the sale by auction from taking place as advertised.

On the 15th Feb. the defendant entered a plaint in the Birmingham County Court for recovery of the possession of the premises, and obtained an order for delivery of possession in a month. The plaintiff then sold his stock by private treaty, at a great sacrifice, and on the 8th April gave up possession of the premises, and paid defendant 2*l.* 14*s.* rent for four weeks to that date.

The plaintiff brought this action to recover compensation for the loss he had suffered in consequence of the defendant's interruption of the sale by auction.

The declaration contained two counts:—First, For that the defendant broke and entered a certain messuage or tenement, warehouse, stable, wharf and premises of the plaintiff, situate and being No. 41, Aston Road, and at Aston Junction Wharf contiguous thereto, in the parish of Aston, in the borough of Birmingham, in the county of Warwick, and excluded the plaintiff therefrom, and kept him so excluded for a long space of time, and prevented him ingress, egress, and regress, for the purpose of holding a sale by auction on the said premises, and stopped and prevented the said sale being held, whereby the plaintiff lost the expenses to which he had been put in advertising and preparing for the said sale and the benefits he would have derived therefrom, and had to sell the goods to be there sold at a great disadvantage and loss, and was and is otherwise much injured. Second, for that the plaintiff was lawfully in the occupation of a certain messuage, shop, warehouse, and appurtenances thereto belonging, situate and being in the Aston-road, Birmingham, and was entitled to the use of certain wharf land thereto contiguous, and was possessed of a right of way on to the said wharf land, and to the said messuage, warehouse, and premises, through a certain gateway or entrance, situate between the said Aston-road and the said wharf land, and entitled to have access, egress, and regress, to and from the said wharf land, warehouse, messuages, and premises for himself, and those whom he should permit to enter or leave the said wharf land, warehouse, messuages, and premises, at all reasonable times for the purpose of business or otherwise, or for attending any sale of the plaintiff's goods, and merchandise, chattels, and effects on the said land and premises; and while the plaintiff was so lawfully in occupation and so entitled as aforesaid, the plaintiff was about to quit the possession and occupation of the said premises, and his interest therein had but a short time to run, and he was desirous of selling by public auction prior to his so quitting the said premises, certain stock, goods, merchandise, and effects of the plaintiff upon the said land and premises, and had for the purpose engaged an auctioneer, and advertised the said sale to the public, and had catalogues of the said goods printed and circulated, and otherwise been at great expense and trouble to make the said sale publicly known, and to render it profitable in all respects, and the said sale was advertised for and intended to be held on a day just prior to the plaintiff so ceasing to have any interest in the said land and premises, and on such a day as if the said goods were then sold, there would be not more than sufficient time to permit the removal thereof from the said land and premises before the plaintiff's interest therein ceased and expired. And the reversion in the said land and premises expectant on the plaintiff's said interest then ceasing was vested in the defendant and others. And the defendant had notice of all the premises hereinbefore alleged. Yet the defendant wrongfully and maliciously shut the said gates, and caused them to be kept closed at the time of the said sale, and blocked up and obstructed the said way, and wholly prevented any use of the said right of way there, and excluded all those who had come to attend the said sale from entering on to the premises, and prevented the auctioneer from entering the said land and premises, and wrongfully and maliciously prevented the said sale from taking place, whereby the plaintiff lost the benefit of the said sale, and lost all benefit of the services of the auctioneer, and lost the money he had expended in paying for the services of the said auctioneer, and in preparing, printing, and distributing the said catalogues, and in advertising and preparing for the said sale, and was forced and obliged to sell his aforesaid goods and chattels at a sacrifice, and greatly under their real value, and has been damaged in his reputation and business, and has been and is otherwise greatly damnified. And the plaintiff claims 500*l*.

The defendant pleaded 1. Not guilty. 2. As to the first count that the messuages, tenement, warehouse, stable, wharf, and premises were not the plaintiff's. 3. As to the said first count, that at the time of the alleged trespass the said messuage, tenement, warehouse, stable, wharf, and premises were the freehold of the defendant, wherefore the defendant in his own right broke and entered the same and excluded the plaintiff therefrom, and kept him excluded therefrom, and prevented him ingress, egress, and regress. 4. As to the second count of the declaration, that the plaintiff was not lawfully in occupation of the said messuage, shop, warehouse, and appurtenances, nor was he entitled to the use of the said wharf land, nor was he possessed of the said right of way.

Replications:—1. Issue. 2. As to the defendant's third plea, that before and at the time of the committing of the acts, grievances, and trespasses to which that plea is pleaded, the plaintiff was possessed of the said messuage, tenement, warehouse, stable, wharf, and premises, and held the same as tenant at a certain demise from the defendant to the plaintiff.

Rejoinders:—1. Issue upon second replication. 2. As to the said second replication, the defendant says that, before the said time when, &c., the said tenancy had been duly determined.

Surrejoinder:—Issue upon second rejoinder.

The judge asked the jury at the trial if they thought there was an actual agreement between the old Mr. Stubbs and the plaintiff, that the latter should not be turned out without having the opportunity afforded of removing his property, that is, reasonable time for removing any materials he might have there. He also said if they were not satisfied of the existence of that agreement, he still thought there was an agreement with Howell that the plaintiff should have the advantage of using this wharf-ground, and that he should not be turned out without having time and ample opportunity allowed him to take his things away; it was for them to say whether this agreement was continued with the consent of Stubbs.

The jury found a verdict of 100*l*. for the plaintiff. The learned judge stayed execution.

On the 8th Nov. A. Wills obtained a rule nisi, calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the verdict found for him should not be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury in telling them that if they thought the alleged conversation between the late Mr. Stubbs and the plaintiff really took place they ought to find for the plaintiff, whereas the judge ought to have told the jury that a tenancy to be determined by a notice to quit of an indefinite duration was unknown to the law. Also on the ground that the verdict was against evidence; or to show cause why the damages should not be reduced.

O'Brien, Serjt. and Beasley now showed cause against this rule.—Here the tenant had a right by agreement with his landlord to retain possession of the demised premises after the end of the term for a particular purpose; and by Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, p. 590, "such right will in effect operate as a prolongation of the term," and it will justify the outgoing tenant in defending an action of trespass at the suit of the incoming tenant, or the outgoing tenant may maintain trespass:

Knight v. Bennett, 3 Bing. 364;

Beaty v. Gibbons, 16 East. 116;

Griffiths v. Puleston, 13 M. & W. 358. :

Wills supported the rule—With the exception of agricultural leases, there must be a certain time at which every tenancy expires. Exceptions have been made to the rule for the benefit of agriculture, as in White v. Sayer, Palmer 211;

Strickland v. Maxwell, 2 C. & M. 539;

Wigglesworth v. Dallison, 1 Doug. 201; 1 Sm. L. C. 539;

Beavan v. Delahay, 1 H. Bl. 5.

At all events, with regard to storing materials upon the wharf and in the warehouse, there was merely a verbal licence revocable at any time; and it was never assented to by the defendant himself. Even if an agreement to allow the tenant time to remove goods were proved, it would be too indefinite to give the plaintiff a cause of action. [WILLES, J.—That is not so; by Co. Litt. 56a, a tenant at will, if put out by the lessor, shall have free entry by reasonable time to take away his goods; and it appears by Lord Coke's note, "reasonableness in these cases belongeth to the knowledge of the law."]

BOVILL, C. J.—I think there is no objection, as a matter of law, to a weekly tenancy, determinable by a week's notice, with a condition attached that the tenant shall have a further reasonable time to remove his goods from the premises. Evidence was adduced on the plaintiff's part that such an arrangement had been entered into, and the jury have found in accordance with that evidence. It has been contended that the plaintiff's privilege to store materials on the wharf and in the warehouse was a mere licence at any time revocable, but it seems to me rather to have been an interest in the nature of an incorporeal hereditament annexed to the tenancy. The right to remove goods or fixtures from premises leased by a tenant after the expiration of his tenancy is well known to the law, as appears from the passage cited by my brother Willes from Co. Litt. Why, then, should not such a right exist by agreement in the present case? Lord Coke speaks of a tenancy purely at will, and says the fixtures may be removed after the lapse of a reasonable time; and it was held in the case of Stansfield v. The Mayor of Portsmouth, 4 C. B., N. S., 120, that a reasonable time for the removal of fixtures was impliedly allowed under a lease which made no express provision to that effect; the action in that case was by assignees in bankruptcy of a shipwright who had leased premises from the defendants; he had erected during his term certain machinery for the purposes of his trade, which by the lease became at the end of the term the property of the defendants; the lease also provided that this last-mentioned stipulation should not apply to machinery or other articles erected or set up for any other purpose than that of a shipwright's trade, "but that it should be lawful for the lessee at any time during the term, or at the expiration thereof, to remove and take away all such last-mentioned machinery, &c., from the said demised premises." The lease further provided that in the event of the lessee becoming bankrupt, the lessors might re-enter and take possession of all machinery, &c., used or employed in the business of a shipbuilder. Upon the bankruptcy of the lessee the lessors re-entered, but it was held that the assignees of the lessee were entitled to enter for the purpose of removing the fixtures other than those set up for the ship-building business, and to a reasonable time for that purpose. The law with regard to farming leases stands on the same principle. It is difficult to distinguish between the application of this principle to premises demised and to a privilege annexed to a tenancy. If, then, the agreement alleged by the plaintiff in this case was made, he had a right to remove his goods from the wharf and warehouse within a reasonable time after the conclusion of his tenancy of the other premises, and if the defendant obstructed him in the exercise of that right, he must be liable for the injury he so caused; the fact of the privilege or licence being affixed to the tenancy at one entire rent places the defendant in the same position as his predecessor in title who entered into the arrangement. The defendant received rent from the plaintiff after the testator's death, and acquiesced in the tenancy. There is nothing to show that he did not acquiesce in the whole of the terms, the verdict was in his favour, and he had a right of action for the breach of the agreement.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The tenant was originally to have a reasonable time for the removal of his goods after the termination of his tenancy, and there was evidence of a new contract between the plaintiff and defendant by which this stipulation was revived. The payment of rent by the plaintiff was continued after the death of the defendant's father; the defendant was at law the devisee of his father, and the stat. 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, gave to lessees the like remedy against the grantees of reversions, which they might have had against their grantors. The executors of a lessee, on the other hand, if they continue to occupy, are certainly bound by the terms of the original agreement: (Buckworth v. Simpson, 1 C. M. & R. 834.) As to the goods in the house rented by the plaintiff, such a stipulation as that reasonable time for removal should be allowed after the conclusion of the term may doubtless be entered into by contract. No authority has been cited against such an arrangement, and provided it is not claimed for any other purpose but that for which it was intended, it seems to me that we ought to recognise it. As to the goods on the wharf and in the warehouse, which were stored there, as is alleged, merely by the licence of the defendant's father, there may be somewhat greater difficulty. The right must be merely an incorporeal hereditament, which could ordinarily only be conveyed by deed; but if, as it seems here, it was annexed to the tenancy, I think we can hold that it might have been created by parol agreement. This seems to have been the view taken by Lord Cranworth in Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 M. & W. 838, when he directed the jury, that assuming the ticket for admission to the land of Lord Eglintoun had been sold by him to the plaintiff, it was lawful for Lord Eglintoun to remove him from the land without returning the money or assigning a cause, after giving him reasonable notice to quit. In the judgment upon that case Alderson B. reviewed with approval the decision of the Queen's Bench in Wood v. Manley, 11 Ad. & E. 34; that was an action of trespass for coming on plaintiff's land to remove hay which defendant had purchased, and for the removal of which plaintiff had given defendant leave to enter as often as he should see fit. The jury were directed that the licence to come from time to time to remove the hay was irrevocable; the court refused a rule on the ground of misdirection, because they said this was a case not of a mere licence, but of a licence coupled with an interest. (See also Lord Bolton v. Tomlin, 5 A. & E. 856.) I have no doubt that the acquiescence of the defendant in the terms upon which the plaintiff had been occupying under the testator involved the licence as well as the tenancy, and the rent was clearly paid for both; it is by no means clear that under the circumstances the defendant could have revoked the licence by itself, at all events without the consent of the plaintiff.

BURROWS v. THE MARCH GAS AND COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[Ex.]

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 15 and 18.

BURROWS v. THE MARCH GAS AND COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Negligence—Accident from gas explosion—Action for injury therefrom—Damages—Contributory negligence—Act of stranger, conjointly with defendants' negligence, causing damage—Liability of both—Breach of contract—Tort—Remote and proximate cause—Measure of damages.

The plaintiff, wishing to have gas laid on upon his shop and premises at M., employed B., a gasfitter, to do the work, and being informed by B. that the gas company (the defendants) always supplied and fixed the service pipe, leading from their main in the street to the meter upon the consumer's premises, he thereupon requested B. to arrange with the company, on his plaintiff's behalf, for the supply and fixing such service pipe accordingly, B. himself supplying all the other necessary pipes and fittings. B. arranged with the defendants' manager, and the service pipe was duly supplied and laid down by the defendants, and communication was thereby effected between their main in the street and the plaintiff's meter, situated under the stairs on the ground floor of his premises, some distance in from the outer wall. That being done, the gas was turned on by the defendants from their main, prior to the usual time of gas-lighting, on the afternoon in question, for the purpose, as the defendants alleged, in accordance with their custom in such cases, of testing the new work, but no workman or other person on their behalf was present on the premises when the gas was so turned on. A strong smell of gas being apparent to the plaintiff's servants, immediately after the gas had been so turned on, they requested a gasfitter in the employ of B., named S., who happened to be at work on another part of the premises, to ascertain the cause of it, which he accordingly proceeded to do, with a lighted candle in his hand. The consequence was that, upon entering the plaintiff's shop, the explosion took place which caused the injury complained of in this action. It was proved that the gas escaped through a slit or hole in the service pipe supplied and laid down by the defendants. The jury found that the escape was caused by a defect in the pipe, and that the defect was in the pipe when supplied; and they further found that there was negligence in S. in using a lighted candle:

Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Martin, Channell, and Pigott, BB.) that the defendants were liable to the plaintiff in substantial damages for negligent breach of contract in not having supplied a proper and sufficient service pipe, or, at all events, for not having left it in a perfect state; and that the fact of the explosion being due to the two conjoint causes of the defendants' negligence in supplying a defective pipe, and of the negligence of S. (a stranger to the plaintiff so far as this action was concerned), did not exonerate the defendants from liability for the result of their negligence in the performance of their contract.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff against the March Gas and Coke Company, to recover damages from them as a compensation for loss and injury accruing to the plaintiff from an explosion of gas on his premises, which it was alleged on his part arose from and was due to the negligence of the company in laying down upon his said premises a service pipe which proved to be unsound and defective, for the conveyance of gas from the company's main in the public street to the gas meter in the plaintiff's house.

The plaintiff, by his declaration, alleged that the defendants were a company making and selling gas for profit and reward, and that it was agreed between him and the defendants that the latter should provide, and well and sufficiently lay, a proper and sufficient communication, and proper and sufficient service pipes, from the main of the defendants to a certain gas meter within the premises of the plaintiff, for the purpose of furnishing, and so as to furnish, the plaintiff with a supply of gas, to be used in and on the said premises, for rates and reward to be therefor paid by the plaintiff to the defendants; yet the defendants did not provide and properly lay a proper and sufficient communication, and proper and sufficient service pipes, for the purpose aforesaid, but so negligently and improperly conducted themselves in and in relation to the providing and laying a communicating service pipe for the purposes aforesaid, that the pipes provided and used by the defendants for that purpose were not proper and sufficient, and the same were not well and sufficiently laid by the defendants, and by reason thereof, after gas had been turned on through the same by the defendants for the purpose of supplying the plaintiff therewith, to be used on the said premises as aforesaid, large quantities of the said gas leaked and escaped from the said communication and pipes, and caught fire, and exploded, and blew out the front of the plaintiff's shop, being a part of the said premises, and blew away and destroyed the floorings, counters, and fixtures of and in the said shop, and greatly cracked and injured the walls and other parts of the said premises, and greatly injured the stock-in-trade and the goods of the plaintiff then being on the said premises, whereby the plaintiff sustained great damage, and had to incur great expense in and about repairing the said damage, so done as aforesaid in and to the said premises, and lost and was deprived of the value of the said stock-in-trade and goods so injured as aforesaid, and was for a long time deprived of the use of his said shop for the purposes of his trade and business therein, and was much injured in his said trade and business and otherwise.

Pleas. 1. A denial of the agreement as alleged. 2. Not guilty. And, upon these pleas issue was joined.

At the trial at the last summer assizes at Cambridge, before Cockburn, C. J., and a special jury, the facts of the case appeared in evidence to be the following:—

The plaintiff was a draper, grocer, and commission agent, carrying on business at March, in the county of Cambridge, and the defendants were a gas company there incorporated and registered under the Companies Act 1862. The plaintiff, having made extensive alterations and additions to his premises, was desirous of increasing the supply of gas which had hitherto sufficed for his purposes, and of having gas laid on in the new and additional parts of his premises, and he accordingly employed a gas fitter in the town named Bates to do this work, and to supply the new and additional internal gas fittings which would be required. Upon being informed by Bates, that it was the custom and practice of the gas company themselves to supply and fix the service pipe, leading from their main pipe in the public street to the gas meter on the consumer's premises, the plaintiff requested Bates to arrange as to such pipe with the company, and Bates accordingly saw the defendants' manager, and arranged with him on the plaintiff's behalf for the company's providing and furnishing requisite service pipe from the main to the meter, and the necessary supply of gas, Bates himself supplying and fitting the pipes leading from the meter to the various other parts of the plaintiff's premises, and all the other gas fittings. The service pipe in question was accordingly furnished by the defendants, and was laid down by a workman of their own, and extended from their main in the road outside the house, through the outer wall of which it passed, to the meter within, which was situated under the staircase on the ground floor of the plaintiff's premises, at some little distance in from the outer wall. The pipe having been so laid down and fixed, and communication between the main and the meter having been thereby effected, the defendants, in accordance with their usual practice in such cases, turned on the gas from their main at an earlier hour in the afternoon of the day in question than the usual time of gas lighting, for the purpose, as a matter of precaution, of testing the new work.

There was some discrepancy and conflict in the evidence, as to whether or not the defendants informed the plaintiff of their being about to test their work by turning on the gas. The defendants' workman stated that he told Bates that "the gas was about to be turned on for that purpose, but Bates, on the other hand, said he had no recollection of anything of the kind having been told him. Be that, however, as it may, Bates was not present when it was turned on, and sent no one to be there for him, nor did the defendants send anyone on their part to test the new work. Soon after the gas had been turned on as above mentioned, a strong smell of gas pervading the whole premises became apparent to the servants of the plaintiff who were there; and a workman in the employ of Bates, of the name of Sharrott, happening to be on the spot at the time for the purpose of testing his own work in other parts of the plaintiff's premises, was informed of the smell, and requested to ascertain where the escape was taking place. Thereupon Sharrott took a lighted candle into the shop, and, having tried about the pipes and joints on both sides of the counters, and found nothing there, he took up a portion of the flooring near the door, but failed to perceive any smell of gas. He then went to the meter, and upon examining it found that the index finger stood at zero, thus clearly demonstrating that no gas had passed from the defendants' new service pipe into the meter, and that the escape was therefore taking place in some part of that pipe between the meter and the outer wall. Presently after this, seeing a young woman going out from the shop in the direction of the spot where he had taken up the flooring, he ran forward to the place with the lighted candle in his hand, in order to prevent her from tumbling into the hole in the floor, and, on his coming there, the explosion of gas immediately occurred, which blew him into the street, where he was picked up in an insensible state, and which caused the injury to the plaintiff's premises and property, to recover compensation for which in damages the present action was brought. There was a conflict of evidence also as to the state of the service pipe supplied by the defendants; the plaintiff's case being that there was originally a slit or chink in the pipe itself, arising from an imperfect "weld." The defendants' case, on the other hand, being that the damage to the pipe arose, not from any defect in its original construction but, from the rough and improper handling which it underwent on the part of the plaintiff's men in laying it down. There was also conflicting evidence as to whether this laying down was done by the company's workmen alone, or whether Sharrott, Bates's man, took any part in that job. Evidence was also given, on the part of the defendants, that the proper way to search for an escape of gas, especially when it was evident that it was escaping under a flooring, was to use the sense of smell, or to listen for the sound of the gas escaping, or to pass the hand along and feel for the escape, which would be notified by the difference of temperature between the gas and the atmospheric air. Sharrott, on the other hand, maintained that the ordinary and the only way, to try for an escape of gas at a joint in a pipe, was to use a light, and that an explosion could not occur at a joint.

The Lord Chief Justice left the following questions to the jury:—First, was the escape of gas occasioned by a defective pipe? secondly, if so, was the defect in the pipe at the time it was supplied by the company, or was it caused by the rough and improper handling of it when it was being laid down, and, if so, then; thirdly, was the rough handling done by the defendants' servants, or by Sharrott, the workman of Bates the agent of the plaintiff? and fourthly and lastly, was there negligence and an absence of reasonable care in Sharrott in using a lighted candle under the circumstances?

The jury found:—That the escape of gas was occasioned by a defect in the pipe, and that defect was in the pipe when supplied. They also said: "We find that Sharrott was deficient in prudence on the occasion in using a lighted candle, although there is no evidence that he had reason to suppose that there was a dangerous escape of gas at the time. We do not think there was culpable neglect, only a common want of prudence on the part of Sharrott."

In answer to a further question by his Lordship, whether there was a want of reasonable prudence under the circumstances, the foreman replied, "There was a degree of carelessness, but not wilful neglect." Upon being desired by the learned judge to give a specific answer, if possible, to the question whether there was an absence of reasonable and proper prudence and caution, without troubling themselves as to culpable negligence in what Sharrott did, the jury again retired, and on their return handed in the following finding on paper. "The jury find that there was negligence on the part of Sharrott in using a lighted candle." The foreman then said: "They wish to add, with your Lordship's consent, to their decision that the company also were negligent in not sending their own foreman to test the new pipes." Whereupon his Lordship said, he thought that that latter finding as to the negligence of the company was ultra vires altogether. The damages were assessed by the jury at 404*l.*, for which amount the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, leave being reserved by the learned judge to the defendants to enter the verdict for them, or to reduce the damages.

A rule was accordingly obtained by O'Malley, Q. C., in Michaelmas Term last, on the part of the defendants, to set aside the verdict found for the plaintiff and to enter it for the defendants, on the ground that, upon the evidence, the verdict ought to have been entered for them: or to reduce the damages to nominal damages, on the ground that the damage resulted from the negligence of Sharrott, and not from the defendants' breach of contract. Against that rule, Keane, Q. C., and C. G. Merewether, for the plaintiffs, now showed cause. The accident would not have happened had the defendants faithfully performed their contract, and the damage done was the natural and consequential result of their breach of contract. It is not too remote, nor does it relieve them from responsibility, or disentitle the plaintiff to recover, as against them, that a third person (Sharrott), who was not a servant of the plaintiff, or at all connected with him, was also guilty of negligence which conduced to the explosion which, had the defendants' work been properly done, could not have occurred. [They were here stopped by the court, who called on]

O'Malley, Q. C. and W. Graham, for the defendants, to support their rule. Here negligence was found by the jury on the part of Sharrott, the workman of Bates, who represented the plaintiff, and undertook to see the work properly done. It is clear that, but for the conduct of Bates or his man, the alleged negligence of the company would not have produced the accident; and the established rule, therefore, must prevail, that the plaintiff, having been by his servant or agent contributory to the accident, cannot recover. But if that is not so, the damage here is, nevertheless, not a damage arising from the negligence of the defendants. The injury here was the result of the negligent and wrongful conduct of Sharrott, a third party, who used the lighted candle, he being, too, a skilled person, and who must be supposed to be cognisant of the nature of gas, and the work to be done, and of the danger attendant on using a candle under such circumstances. In the present case, moreover, there was no contract, express or implied, to provide a perfect pipe, but only a pipe which was to be made perfect at a future time, by testing. In gas and water works allowance is always made for a large percentage of escape by inevitable leakage. This pipe was to be tested with a view to being made perfect, and the accident arose in the course of the testing, because that operation was unskilfully done by a stranger to the defendants, for which they are not answerable. They were not bound to supply an absolutely perfect pipe. But, even assuming a contract, and a breach of it, then it is contended that the damage is not such as flowed proximately or directly therefrom. The defendants had no control over Sharrott, whose act it was, and who was rightfully on the premises on the plaintiff's work. On that point the case in the Common Pleas of Ward v. Weeks, 7 Bing. 211; 9 L. J. 6, C. P.; 4 M. & P. 797, was applicable, in which the original utterer of the slander was held not liable for damage done by its repetition by a third person to whom he had spoken it, and over whom he had no control. In Holden v. The Liverpool New Gas Company, also, 3 C. B. 1; 15 L. J. N. S. 301, C. P., Tindal, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the court says, "It appears to us that the injury sustained by the plaintiff is not solely imputable to the want of due care on the part of the defendants, but that the plaintiff has by his own voluntary act been contributory to it himself. The plaintiff knew that the pipe which brought the gas into the house still remained, as before, with the stop-cock in the inside of the house, which would prevent the gas being supplied to the house if properly turned, and the house, being without a tenant, was under his own charge and care. We think, therefore, that the plaintiff was himself wanting in the ordinary care of seeing that the stop-cock in the inside was closed, which would have effectually prevented the gas from escaping." Those observations show that a plaintiff ought to look after the gas in his own house, and be careful. Again, in Wilson v. The Newport Dock Company, in this court, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 230; L. Rep. 1 Ex. 177; 35 L. J. 97, Ex., Martin, B. thought the defendants had a right to a bona fide and reasonably sound judgment being exercised, as to what course the captain there was to adopt, for the safety of the vessel under circumstances of danger, and that it was a question for the jury, who, in that case, found that the captain did the best he could, and was not guilty of negligence. Now, in the present case, the jury found that the best was not done under the circumstances. If anything, therefore, could have been done to prevent the accident, the defendants are not liable. Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East. 1; 2 Sm. L. C. 5th edit. 461, is also in point, as to remoteness of damage. It is submitted, 1st. That there was contributory negligence in the plaintiff by his agent or servant; 2nd. If not, that there was no negligence in the defendants, but in a person introduced by the plaintiff, and who improperly dealt with the pipe; 3rd. There was no contract to supply an absolutely perfect pipe at first, and the contract declared on was not proved.

KELLY, C. B.—The plaintiff in this action claims damages in respect of injuries sustained to his property by reason of an explosion of gas, which took place upon his premises. The action is said to be in contract; but when we look to the declaration, we find that, though in truth it sounds in contract, the contract is stated by way of inducement only, and it is in form and in substance an action for negligence in the performance of a contract. Now, the contract was, undoubtedly, that the defendants should supply and lay down a pipe from their main to the meter within the plaintiff's premises. It appeared that it was unusual for the company to carry pipes supplied by them, or fixed or laid down by them, beyond the outer wall of the premises of the consumer, but this case was proved to have been exceptional in that respect, for the pipe which the defendants contracted to, and did, lay down, extended from their main, through the outer wall, to the meter which was situated some distance in from the outer wall, and under the staircase in the plaintiff's premises. It appeared that the mischief arose in this way. The pipe having been laid down, and the work so far completed that it only required to be tested, the company some little time afterwards turned on the gas, which thereupon flowed into the pipe that led from the main to the meter. It does not appear that the plaintiff had any notice that this was about to be done. The gas having been so turned on, on the afternoon in question, it seems that a man named Sharrott, a workman in the employ of a Mr. Bates, a gasfitter who had been employed by the plaintiff to superintend and fix the fittings in other parts of the premises, but not employed by the plaintiff to interfere at all with the gas pipe in question, happened to be upon the premises, not for the purpose of testing the pipe laid down by the defendants, but for the purpose of looking after his own work, that is, the work done by Bates, and being there he is told that there is an escape of gas. Thereupon he proceeds to the spot, unfortunately with a lighted candle in his hand, for the purpose of ascertaining where the escape is taking place, and, either while he was proceeding to the spot where the gas was escaping, or having left the candle upon the counter in some part of the shop, where it could be reached by or come in contact with the gas which had escaped, it did by some means come in contact with the gas, and an immediate explosion took place, and the injury was done which is complained of in this action. The question is whether the defendants are liable in damages for this injury. Now it is quite clear that the injury did not arise from the mere act of the defendants alone in having furnished an insufficient and defective pipe, and from the consequent escape of gas therefrom; but, a quantity of gas having escaped through the defective pipe, and Sharrott having brought a lighted candle to the spot, the explosion occurred from the two conjoint acts or causes of the escape of the gas and the application to it of the lighted candle by Sharrott. That being so, if Sharrott had been the servant of the plaintiff for this particular work, and had thus contributed to the injury, which the plaintiff has sustained, by his negligence in doing such work, and in the performance of his duty to the plaintiff, that would have been contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, by or through his servant, and then, upon the well-known principle of law applicable to these cases, the plaintiff could not have maintained this action. But, when we come to look at the facts, we find that Sharrott is a mere stranger as regards the plaintiff. He was not the plaintiff's servant in any sense in which that term can be used. He was the servant of Bates, who was employed by the plaintiff, in the same way as the gas company had been employed by the plaintiff, to do certain work on the premises. The question is, whether the plaintiff and Bates, and Sharrott, the servant of Bates, can be identified with the plaintiff for the purposes of this cause, for upon that depends the maintenance of this action. If that were so, then if a person employs several contractors, as carpenters, bricklayers, painters, and such like, to do work upon his house, and if an injury be done to his property by their conjoint negligence, each of them might say "this damage would never have occurred but for the negligence of the others," and the consequence would be that the owner would have his property destroyed by the negligence of two or three distinct persons employed by him to do work for hire and reward, and yet would not be able to maintain an action for compensation. I am of opinion that such is not the law. If the owner of property sustain an injury to his premises through the conjoint negligence of two or more contractors, or tradesmen, whom he has employed to do certain work upon his property—one being, let us suppose, as in this case, a gas company, employed to lay down a gas pipe, from the defective nature of which gas pipe injury is in fact sustained, and another person being employed to do work in other parts of the premises, and in the execution of that work such person be guilty of negligence, which, coupled with the negligence of the gas company, occasions an explosion, by which the employer's property is injured, I am of opinion that he can maintain an action against both; and as there can be no plea in abatement of such a case, if he sues one or the other, each is liable to the action. Under these circumstances the question remains to be considered, whether the facts here are such as to present the question to the court in the way which I have stated. It is contended that the defendants were not bound to at once supply a complete and perfect gas pipe, but only a gas pipe to be afterwards made perfect by testing. That argument cannot, I think, avail the defendants here. Here the defendants are charged with negligence in the performance of their contract to lay down a gas pipe, and the negligence on their part consists in this, that they had laid down an imperfect and defective pipe, and having laid it down, it was for them to make it perfect. They turned on the gas without, as is alleged by the plaintiff, any notice to him of their being about to do so, and they sent no workman of their own to superintend the testing, and took no precautions to prevent an escape of the gas. Consequently the gas did escape. The question is, whether their negligence thus far is not complete? Even if from an accident some servant of the house, unconscious that gas was escaping, and therefore unconscious of any danger which might exist, had proceeded to the spot with the candle, and so an explosion had been caused, it would be the defendants' negligence that would have caused it. Without any negligence on the part of any other person their negligence is complete. Then comes the question whether it really was the defendants and not Bates (who is said by the defendants to be identified with the plaintiff), or anyone in his employ, who was to test the pipe in question. Now the evidence is clear. Bates himself proves, through Sharrott, that he, Sharrott, went to test his own work, and not the company's; and there is no evidence to contradict that. It is clear, therefore, so far as regards testing the defendants' work, or looking to it at all for any purpose whatever, Sharrott is an entire stranger. It is an accident only that he happened to be employed upon the gas fittings in other parts of the premises. Being a gasfitter, or the workman of a gasfitter, it was natural that he should be applied to, and called in to advise and assist when it was supposed that there was an escape of gas. The negligence on the part of the defendants being thus complete, the only remaining question is, whether Sharrott is identical with Bates, and Bates with the plaintiff. I have already observed that neither Bates nor Sharrott were the servants of the plaintiff, or in any way under his control in respect of this particular work. This man Sharrott was, in the contemplation of the law, a stranger, so far as regards his conduct with respect to this explosion, and cannot be identified in any way with the plaintiff so as to make the plaintiff, in contemplation of the law, a contributory to the accident. Under these circumstances, the jury found that this escape of gas was occasioned by a defective pipe, and that the defect existed when the pipe was supplied by the company; and they also found, though the question was not left to them, that the company were negligent in their duty in not sending their own foreman to test the new gas pipes. Taking these together, it is clear that the defendants were guilty of negligence; and the plaintiff not being identified with Sharrott, whose negligence and imprudence in carrying a candle to the spot, no doubt contributed to the explosion, and so to the injury complained of, and being in no way responsible for his act, I am of opinion that the action is maintainable against these defendants, and that this verdict ought not to be disturbed. The defendants' rule, therefore, will be discharged.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. This rule was obtained on two grounds: First, that the verdict ought to be entered for the defendants, which can only be on the ground that there was no evidence for the Chief Justice to leave to the jury. Now I am clearly of opinion that there was evidence which that learned judge was bound to leave to the jury, and that, if he had not left it, he would have been guilty of misdirection. Secondly, that the damages were excessive, and that they ought to be nominal only. But I apprehend that when the facts are looked at that will be found not to be so. Upon the two grounds, therefore, upon which this rule was obtained, I think it ought to be discharged. But I own my impression is that this declaration is in contract and not in tort. However, that is immaterial, because I propose to give my judgment upon the real facts and substance of the case. The facts were these: The plaintiff desired to have gas introduced into his premises, for which purpose new pipes and a new meter were required. He accordingly went to a Mr. Bates, who was a gasfitter in the town, and Bates told him that the defendants, the March Gas Company, would supply the meter, and connect the meter with their own works, thus having complete control of the meter and of the communication of gas to it. All that Bates or the plaintiff did was to convey the pipes from the meter into the interior of the premises. That information having been communicated by Bates to the plaintiff, the latter requested Bates to take the necessary steps for the purpose, which Bates said he would do. Bates then applied to the managing man of the defendants, and it is perfectly clear to my mind that thereupon a contract was made by the defendants with Bates on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendants were to furnish a meter and a supply pipe for the purpose of communication from their gas main to this meter in the plaintiff's premises. Now that seems to me to be the exact contract stated in this declaration, thus: "It was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the defendants should provide and well and sufficiently lay a proper and sufficient communication, with proper and sufficient service pipes, from the main of the defendants to the gas meter within the premises of the plaintiffs." The declaration then goes on to aver "that the defendants did not provide and properly lay a proper and sufficient communication and proper and sufficient service pipes for the purpose aforesaid." Now it seems to me, if the declaration had stopped there, that that made a perfect contract; what follows is a mere statement which we now very often find in actions upon contracts. The defendants begin by pleading non assumpsit, that is, denying the contract. Then they say, "We are not guilty of negligence." Now, what occurred? The defendants, having entered into this contract, proceeded to execute it, and a pipe, which communicated from their works to the plaintiff's meter, had a hole in it, of three inches long, so that immediately upon the gas being admitted into it the gas escaped into the plaintiff's premises. It is as clear therefore, that there was a breach of contract as anything can be; and if the Lord Chief Justice had refused to leave that to the jury, I apprehend he would have been in the wrong. He was bound to leave it. Consequently, I think there is no ground for either a nonsuit or for entering a verdict for the defendants, as proposed by this rule. Upon that ground, therefore, I am clearly of opinion that the defendants entirely fail. Then comes the second point of reduction of damages. Now it would be a new point to me that, as has been contended to-day, if a man entered into a contract with another, and was guilty of breach of contract, and, from the negligence of a servant of the party with whom the contract was made, conjointly with such breach of contract an injury occurred, the person who broke the contract was thereby relieved from liability to damages. It may be so; but so far as I am aware, it is only in cases where there has been contributory negligence. It is said, that, in this case, nominal damages only, if any, are recoverable. I do not think so. There is not the slightest pretence for calling this man Sharrott a servant of the plaintiff, so as to make the latter liable, or responsible, for contributory negligence. My Lord has stated, and stated correctly, what the circumstances were. This gas escaped in consequence of a breach of contract on the part of the defendants. The gas having escaped, this man Sharrott, naturally did what any man would endeavour to do, he tried to find out where the escape was taking place, and in doing that he used a lighted candle, which it seems was an improper mode of investigating the matter; in consequence of that, the gas which had been allowed to escape by reason of the defendants' breach of contract, exploded; and I am clearly of opinion that the doctrine of contributory negligence does not apply to this case, and that there was no such relation between the plaintiff and Sharrott as to deprive the plaintiff of his right to damages, by reason of the gas having exploded in consequence of the candle held by Sharrott.

BURROWS v. THE MARCH GAS AND COKE COMPANY (LIMITED).

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. I agree in the view of the facts, upon the evidence, taken by my Lord and my brother Martin. It does not appear to me, according to my view of this case, to be very important whether this action be considered as founded on contract or founded upon a duty; but whether it be a contract on the part of the defendants, or whether it be a duty, I rather incline to the opinion that the contract, if a contract, or the duty, if a duty, was not one which imposed upon the defendants the necessity of taking upon the premises pipes that were at the time absolutely perfect. These pipes are connected by screws, they act as a conduit for the passage of gas, and the very nature of the materials used is such as to give rise, in the great majority of cases, to a reasonable expectation of leakage at first; but I think the obligation on the part of the defendants was this, that they should leave the pipes when they had connected them together and tested them, in a perfect state. So far, I agree with Mr. O'Malley. But then it appears to me that that does not relieve the defendants from responsibility, or limit their responsibility to nominal damages. The defendants were bound to leave the pipes, when connected, in a perfect state. They did not do that, and therefore they are guilty of negligence and responsible in this action. But if, on the other hand, the testing was left by them to be accomplished, not by Bates himself, but by Sharrott, who was Bates's servant, it seems to me that that would leave the defendants in this dilemma, that the act complained of and by which the explosion took place, was the act of the defendants, and was caused by their default in that respect. On these grounds I think the plaintiff is entitled to his verdict.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion, and I found my judgment, not upon the form of the pleadings, but upon the facts of the case. I cannot see that the form of the pleadings can make any difference in the right of the plaintiff to recover in a case like this, where the count really might be taken to be either in contract or in tort. If it states a contract, it also states a duty arising out of that contract, and then it states negligence as the breach of contract, and out of that negligence mischief arises to the plaintiff for which he is entitled to recover damages. That throws us, therefore, upon the consideration of the facts, in order to see whether, either in the one form or the other, on this count the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Now the facts have been stated by the court, and you do not propose to repeat them. We must take it to be found by the jury, and to be the fact, that the negligent conduct of the defendants, in performing their contracts, resulted in this mischief. Whether it was proximate or remote may be an arguable matter, considering the question of contract; but the mere fact that there is another cause brought in, without which the damage would not have occurred, does not make the first and chief cause a remote cause of the damage that occurs. It could only disentitle the plaintiff to recover upon the ground that he has contributed to that, without which the damage would not have occurred. It seems to me that, in any way of looking at it, the escape of gas was the proximate cause of the damage of which the plaintiff complains. If that be so, although there is another cause, a causa sine qua non, without which the explosion would not have occurred, that does not disentitle the plaintiff to recover. Then comes the question, is he disentitled to recover because he is responsible for contributing to the damage? I agree with my Lord that what we have to determine is, is the plaintiff responsible for the act of Sharrott? It seems to me that he is not. As my Lord has put it, there were two independent tradesmen employed by the plaintiff to do a work conjointly upon his premises. Both are guilty of negligence by which the plaintiff sustains considerable damage. Is he to be disentitled to complain of the negligence of one tradesman because another contributes to the damage? It seems to me that he ought to be entitled to complain of both, and to recover against both. Because he is entitled to recover against one, that cannot disentitle him to recover against the other. I think, however, in another aspect of the case, it might be well argued that in truth these defendants did turn on the gas for the purpose of letting Bates test it, leaving their own work to be tested by Bates. If that is the true view of the facts, they are responsible for the negligence of Bates's workman, Sharrott, and in that way would be clearly liable. I do not, however, rest my judgment so much upon that, inasmuch as the evidence leading to that result is not so clear upon the notes. I agree, on the whole, with the judgment that has been given by the rest of the court. I think the plaintiff is entitled to retain his verdict, and that this rule should be discharged.

Evidence—Copy policy—Admissibility of—Secondary evidence—Admissibility depending on question of fact—Whether such question for judge or jury.

The issue in an action on a policy, being the execution of the policy, the plaintiffs, having given defendants notice to produce the policy, tendered in evidence a document which he had received from defendants purporting to be a copy of the policy. The defendants' counsel then tendered evidence to show that no such policy had ever been executed, and asked the learned judge to decide whether that were so or not, as a necessary preliminary to the admissibility of the copy. The judge refused to do so, and admitted the copy, leaving the question whether the policy had ever been executed ultimately to the jury:

Held, that he was right in so doing.

Declaration by shipowners against an underwriter upon a policy of insurance upon freight.

First plea that the defendant did not become an insurer of the plaintiffs as alleged. Issue.

The trial took place at the Liverpool summer assizes, before Hayes, J.

It was proved by one of the plaintiffs' witnesses that the course of business in Liverpool with reference to insurances is that upon acceptance of the proposals for an insurance by the underwriters, a slip is signed, and subsequently a stamped policy is executed in accordance with the slip, of which a copy is sent to the assured, the original remaining in the hands of the underwriter until payment of the premiums, which is made upon the 10th day of the following month, when the original is handed over to the assured. It was proved that proposals for an insurance on freight of the ship Oaklands had been made by the plaintiffs to defendant and accepted, and a slip signed, and that subsequently the plaintiff had received a document from defendants purporting to be a copy policy.

The plaintiffs had given the defendant notice to produce the original policy, and upon his not doing so the plaintiffs' counsel proposed to prove the policy by putting in the copy. The counsel for the defendant then tendered evidence to show that notwithstanding the delivery of the copy no such policy had ever been executed, and asked the learned judge to hear such evidence and decide before admitting the copy in evidence whether any duly stamped original policy had ever existed. The learned judge refused to hear the evidence thus tendered at this stage of the cause, and ultimately left the question of the existence of a duly stamped policy to the jury. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiffs.

A rule nisi had been obtained for a new trial on Vol. XXII., N.S., No. 538*.

the ground that the admissibility in evidence of the alleged copy policy was a question for the decision of the judge, and not for the jury, and ought to have been decided by the judge when the evidence was tendered.

Butt, Q.C. and Trevelyan showed cause. It will be contended on the other side, that where you offer a copy as secondary evidence of a document you must show that there is an original of which it is a copy, and that such original is lost, or, being in the hands of the other side is not produced upon notice, and that if evidence be tendered on the other side to show that there is no original the judge is bound to hear it and decide as a preliminary to the admissibility of the secondary evidence, the question whether there is such an original. Now we contend that this copy was admissible as primary evidence as a distinct statement or admission from the other side without any question as to the existence of an original:

Slatterie v. Pooley, 6 M. & W. 684; 10 L. J. 8, Ex.; Reg. v. Basingstoke, 14 Q. B. 611; 19 L. J. 87, M. C. By the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 33, s. 15, a penalty is imposed on any broker who issues a copy without a duly stamped policy being in existence. The presumption is, therefore, that there was a duly stamped policy. The judge was right in leaving the question to the jury. The distinction is this: Where the issue upon which the admissibility of the evidence depends is collateral to the cause, it is for the judge to decide it; but where it is the main question in issue in the cause, it must be left to the jury. Then the question whether a policy existed is the very question at issue. This is not a mere stamp objection.

Quain, Q. C., and Dr. Commins, supported the rule.—The judge was bound to hear the evidence tendered, and decide the question whether there was an original policy duly stamped. In Bartlett v. Smith, 11 M. & W. 483; 12 L. J. 287, Exch., when the admissibility of a bill of exchange, purporting to be a foreign bill, and stamped accordingly, was objected to on the ground that though it purported to be drawn abroad, it was in fact an inland bill drawn in London, and evidence was tendered to prove that fact, it was held that the judge ought to have received the evidence in that stage of the cause, and decided upon the admissibility of the instrument, and not to have received the evidence afterwards as part of the defendant's case, and submitted it to the jury. In Boyle v. Wiseman, 11 Exch. 360; 24 L. J. 160, Exch., an action of libel, the plaintiff in order to prove the publication of the libel tendered secondary evidence of the contents of a letter written by the defendant. On the part of the defendant a document was produced as the original, and it was held that the judge was bound at that stage of the cause to hear the evidence on both sides, and to decide whether the document offered was the original or not, and that if it was, the secondary evidence was inadmissible. In Doe v. Davies, 10 Q. B. 314, the question ultimately raised in an action of ejectment being whether E. S., deceased, was legitimate or not, a certificate of the marriage of E. S.'s alleged father, T. D. to her mother was produced by a witness who said he received it from E. S. The question was then put whether E. S. made at that time any statement respecting her mother's marriage: Held, that this question was admissible, it having been proved before to the satisfaction of the judge that E. S. was a member of the family, and it not appearing that any dispute was known at that time to exist; and that it made no difference as to the admissibility of the answer, that the question whether E. S. was a member of the family was, in fact, identical with the issue on which the opinion of the jury would be ultimately taken. It is laid down in Taylor on Evidence, 5th edit., pp. 35-37, that all questions of the admissibility of evidence are for the judge, and he must determine all the facts upon which they depend. It is contended for the plaintiffs that this copy having been delivered by the defendant was an admission, and therefore not secondary evidence; and that therefore no preliminary question of the existence of an original arose as to its admissibility. But it is clear that a copy cannot be evidence if no original exists. They also cited

Doe d. Whitcomb, 6 Ex. 601; 20 L. J. 297, Ex.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 9.—BRAMWELL, B.—This was an action on a policy, and in proof of the policy the plaintiffs produced a document which had been delivered to them by the defendant, purporting to be a copy of a policy showing that the same had been duly executed and stamped. It was shown that by the custom the actual policy was not delivered to the assured until payment of the premium, but, in the mean time, a copy was delivered, and it was contended that by this means the copy was evidence of the existence, in the hands of the defendant, of a duly stamped policy. For this policy the plaintiffs called, but it was not produced. It was then said that upon such nonproduction, the copy became evidence. The defendant's counsel then stated that he was in a condition to displace the effect of this evidence by showing that no policy had ever been executed, and he called on the judge to hear evidence on the interlocutory question. The judge refused, and the question is, whether he was right in such refusal. We think that he was. If the objection had merely been that there was a policy, but it was not duly stamped, upon the authorities the contention might have been well founded. But here the objection was that there was no policy at all. The objection went to the ground of the action; it went to show, not only that there was not secondary evidence, but not even primary evidence of the document. If the judge had acceded to it, there could have been no proof given for the plaintiff at all. The difference between this case and Boyle v. Wiseman is this: If the judge there had received the evidence, and come to the conclusion that the document produced by the defendant was the original, the plaintiff might have given the original in evidence. The judge would only have decided what was the proper mode of proof, but here the judge would have decided that there was no case to prove at all. Take the case of an action for libel, and suppose that a witness had said that he had received a letter containing the libel, and that he had destroyed it, and thereupon a copy was tendered, the defendant could adduce evidence to show that the letter was not destroyed, perhaps, but could he produce evidence to show none had ever been written, and ask the judge to reject the copy on that ground. The distinction is between cases where the objection to the evidence is an objection to it as a piece of evidence conceding that primary evidence exists, and cases where the objection is that the very ground of the case fails; in the former cases the question is for the judge to decide, but in the latter he must let the question go to the jury. Some attempt was made to show that this was a stamp objection, but the true objection was that there was no policy at all in which the stamp objection was, as it were, merged.

MARTIN, B.—The only doubt I had was whether the defendant was not entitled to have the opinion of the judge on the question of the policy's being stamped; but I have come to the same conclusion on the point as my brother Bramwell.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion; indeed, I should be inclined to go further, and hold that the copy was not only secondary, but primary, evidence.

HART v. THE FRONTINO AND BOLIVIA SOUTH-AMERICAN GOLD MINING COMPANY (LIMITED.)

Joint-stock company—Shares—Register—Removal of name from—Estoppel.

The plaintiff purchased and received a transfer of certain shares in a joint-stock company from one P. It appeared that P.'s name was not then on the register of shareholders, but he was subsequently registered, and was called on by the company to pay calls, which he did. He then called on the plaintiff to repay him the amount of such calls, which plaintiff declined to do until he became registered owner of the shares. The company, upon receipt of the transfer to him from P., registered him as holder of the shares, and he thereupon paid to P. the amount of the calls paid by P. upon the shares. Subsequently one F. claimed to be the rightful owner of the shares, they having been sold and transferred to him by the holder of them previously to their pretended transfer to P. The company having investigated the case, came to the conclusion that F.'s title was good, and therefore removed plaintiff's name from the register of shareholders, and inserted that of F. Plaintiff thereupon brought an action against them to recover for the loss of his shares:

Held, that the company had by their acts estopped themselves from denying that plaintiff was entitled to the shares, and he was therefore entitled to recover.

This was an action brought to recover damages for the wrongful removal of the plaintiff's name from the register of the defendants' company as holder of 200 shares therein.

The declaration stated that the defendants are a company registered under and according to the Companies Act 1862, and having a capital divided into shares; and that whilst the plaintiff was the proprietor of 200 shares in the said company, and after he had agreed to become a member of the said company in respect of the said 200 shares under the said Act, and whilst his name was entered in the register of members of the said company, kept under the said Act, as a member of the said company, with the addition therein to his name of a statement of the said shares so held by him as aforesaid according to the said Act, the said company wrongfully and without authority, and against the will of the plaintiff, ceased to keep the name of the plaintiff entered on the said register as a member of the said company in respect of the said shares, and entered in the said register the name of another person as the holder and proprietor of the said 200 shares, and as a member of the said company in respect thereof instead of the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff's title to the said shares was injured and he lost the said shares, and was deprived of the power of selling or otherwise disposing of the same, and lost all the profits, dividends, and advantages, which would otherwise have accrued to him from such shares and from being the registered holder thereof.

Second count for money had and received.

Pleas to first count: 1. Not guilty; 2. Denial that plaintiff was proprietor of the shares, and a member of the company; 3. That although the defendants had caused the plaintiff's name to be entered on the said register as the holder and proprietor of the said shares, and as a member of the said company in respect thereof, as in the said first count alleged as aforesaid, they did so at his request, under a mistaken supposition and belief that he had become holder and proprietor of the said shares, and that he was a member of the said company in respect thereof, when in truth and in fact he did not become and was not such holder or proprietor or member, and one George Fitzgerald having become the proprietor of the said shares and a member of the said company in respect thereof, and having been such at the time of the plaintiff's name being so entered, and the said George Fitzgerald having requested the said company to enter his name on the said register as a holder of the said shares and as a member of the said company in respect thereof, they did accordingly, in order to correct the said mistake and give the said George Fitzgerald his rights in that behalf, cease to keep the name of the plaintiff entered on the said register as a member of the said company, with the addition of the statement of the said shares as held by him, and removed and omitted the plaintiff's name from the said register as a shareholder or member of the said company in respect of the said shares, and entered on the said register the name of the said George Fitzgerald as the holder and proprietor of the said 200 shares and as a member of the said company in respect thereof, instead of the plaintiff, and as they lawfully might, for the cause aforesaid, and which are the acts complained of in the said first count; 4. To the second count, never indebted.

Issues thereon.

The cause came on to be tried before Martin, B., at the sittings in London after Trinity Term 1869, when, by consent of the parties, a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 500*l.* damages, and 40*s.* costs, subject to the following

CASE.

The defendants are a company limited by shares incorporated and registered with memorandum and articles of association under the provisions of the Companies Act 1862, the capital of the company being 100,000*l.*, in 50,000 shares of 2*l.* each. On the 20th Sept. 1866 the plaintiff purchased, through his brokers, Messrs. McNeill and Long, 200 shares in the company, at the price of 116*l.* 5*s.* On the 2nd Oct. 1866 the plaintiff paid to the said Messrs. McNeill and Long the said purchase-money for the said shares, and received from them a transfer of the said shares, executed by one Charles Powell, together with the certificates of the said shares, being forty certificates of five shares each. The said shares were in the said certificates and transfer numbered from 48,101 to 48,300, both inclusive. The said certificates, which were signed by two of the directors and countersigned by the secretary of the company, were in the following form:

Certificate of share.—The Frontino and Bolivia South American Gold Mining Company (Limited), incorporated under the Companies Act 1862. Capital 100,000*l.* in 50,000 shares of 2*l.* each. This is to certify that the person named in the register of shareholders is the proprietor of five shares numbered 48,101 to 48,105, both inclusive, in the Frontino, &c., Company, subject to the articles and memorandum of association of the above company. Given under the common seal of the said company the 30th May 1864.

P. J. VANDER BYE, } Directors.
G. NOAKES, }

W. G. POWNING, Secretary.

In the month of Dec. 1866, a call of 2*s.* 6*d.* per share was made by the company, and was paid to the company by the said Chas. Powell in respect of the said 200 shares, which were so purchased by the plaintiff as aforesaid, but of which the said Chas. Powell was and remained the registered proprietor upon the books of the company at the time when the said call was made and paid, and thenceforward until the plaintiff's name was entered on the register as hereinafter mentioned. The company gave to the said Charles Powell a receipt dated the 15th Jan. 1869, for his said payment in respect of the said call. The said Chas. Powell applied to the plaintiff to recoup him in respect of the call so paid by him, but the plaintiff declined to do so until he should have become the registered holder of the said 200 shares.

In the month of April 1867 the plaintiff lodged the said transfer of the said 200 shares at the office of the company, in order to be entered as the holder thereof on the register of the company. The said Chas. Powell thereupon wrote to Mr. Phillips, the managing director of the company, objecting to the registration of the plaintiff in respect of the said shares. But the said Mr. Phillips replied to the effect that the calls having been paid, and the transfer lodged, the directors had no alternative but to pass and register the same. The plaintiff was accordingly accepted by the company as proprietor of the said shares, and his name was entered upon the share and transfer ledger, and upon the register of transfer, and upon the numerical register of the company, as transferee of the said shares, Nos. 48,101 to 48,300, both inclusive, under date the 2nd May 1867, as appears by the said books. The plaintiff also received from the company the following certificate, signed by the managing director of the company:

No. 1087. I hereby certify that B. W. Hart, Esq., of 37, Moorgate-street, E.C., is the registered holder of 200 shares, Nos. 48,101 to 48,300 in the Frontino, &c., Co., on which 32*s.* 6*d.* per share has been paid.

HENRY L. PHILLIPS, Managing Director.

Dated, 2nd May, 1869.

Share certificates have been issued for every five shares, and are to be handed over on a transfer being made. The certificate not being required when shares are transferred is no evidence of the shares being held by the person named therein.

After and upon the faith of such registration as aforesaid, and the delivering of the aforesaid certificate, the plaintiff repaid to the said Chas. Powell the amount of the call which he had paid as aforesaid in respect of the said shares, and the plaintiff was treated by the company as the holder of the said shares, and remained on the register in respect thereof until Jan. 30, 1868.

The market price of the shares of the company at the time when the plaintiff purchased his said shares was 11*s.* 6*d.* per share, on the 2nd May 1867 it was 7*s.* 8*d.* per share, and on or about the 30th Jan. 1868 it was 17*s.* 6*d.* per share, and at the commencement of this action was 15*s.* per share. On the 30th Jan. 1868 the plaintiff's name was, by the order of the directors of the company without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, removed from the said numerical registry and from the said share and transfer ledger, but not from the said register of transfers. The company have ever since the said 30th Jan. 1868 refused to replace the plaintiff's name on the register, or to treat or consider him as a shareholder.

The circumstances under which the plaintiff's name was removed were as follows:

On or about the 14th Sept. 1866, Col. George Fitzgerald, then of Imperial-square, Cheltenham, and who is the said George Fitzgerald mentioned in the defendants' third plea, purchased through a London broker named James Law 200 shares of and in the said company, numbered 48,101 to 48,300, both inclusive, for the sum of 102*l.* 10*s.*, and of which shares the then secretary of the company, Mr. W. G. Powning, was the beneficial owner and registered proprietor, and the said Col. Fitzgerald employed his solicitor, Mr. W. Compton Smith, of Lincoln's-inn-fields, to pay for the said shares and act for him in the transaction. The said W. C. Smith was also then and ever since solicitor of the said company. On the 28th Sept. 1866, the said W. C. Smith accordingly paid to the said James Law the said purchase-money by his cheque for the sum of 102*l.* 10*s.* drawn on the Bloomsbury branch of the London and Westminster Bank, and made payable to the order of the said W. G. Powning. The said James Law acted in the said sale as the broker of the said W. G. Powning, and on the same 28th Sept. 1866, the said W. G. Powning executed and sent to W. C. Smith a deed of transfer of the said shares for the execution of the said Col. Fitzgerald as the transferee thereof, and the said transfer was inclosed in a letter of which the following is a copy:

My dear Colonel,—I send you enclosed the requested form of transfer of the said shares (48,101 to 48,300) in the Frontino and Bolivia, which please execute, in the presence of, and have it attested by, a witness. You can then return it to the office, 192, Gresham House, E.C., direct for registration, whereupon the shares, certificates, and registration certificate will be handed to me or you on application.

The said W. C. Smith on the same day forwarded the said transfer by post to the said Col. Fitzgerald, and on the 27th Sept. 1866, the said Col. Fitzgerald forwarded the said transfer duly executed by him to the officer of the said company for registration.

On the 15th Nov. 1866, the said W. G. Powning absconded, and the aforesaid transfer of the said 200 shares from him to Fitzgerald was never found by the said company, or by anyone, and, in ignorance of the execution or existence of the said transfer, the said company allowed the plaintiff to be registered as a proprietor of the said shares, and issued to him on the 2nd May 1867, the certificate of that date.

In the said month of May 1867, after the said 2nd thereof, Col. Fitzgerald sent the company the following letter:

Dear Sir.—I beg to bring to your notice that in September last I purchased of Mr. Lane, stockbroker, 200 shares 48,101 to 48,300 in Frontino and Bolivia, which were paid for in cash by my friend Mr. Compton Smith, the certificates &c., being handed to the office for formal registration. The said shares, it would appear, were sold by the late secretary to Mr. Powell, stockbroker, to whose possession they have been traced. I have Mr. Lane's receipt for my payment somewhere, but, in the confusion of changing my residence, cannot, at this moment, put my hand upon it. I trust that by the fraudulent act of the secretary of the company I shall not be permitted to be a sufferer.

Thereupon the company entered into an investigation, not giving any notice to the plaintiff, who never at any time, till his name was struck off as aforesaid, had any notice of there being another claimant of the shares. On such investigation, the books of the company were examined, and also Mr. W. C. Smith, whereupon a report was made by the directors to the effect that the name of the said Mr. Hart should be removed from the said register and that of the said Col. George Fitzgerald be inserted instead, which report was conditional on a statutory declaration being made, and which statutory declaration setting out the purchase by the said Col. Fitzgerald of the said shares as aforesaid was made by the said Col. Fitzgerald and the said W. C. Smith jointly. The result was plaintiff's name was struck off as aforesaid, and that of the said George Fitzgerald substituted, up to which time it had not been on the register in respect of the said shares.

A notice of what had been done was sent to the plaintiff, which stated that the company thenceforth would hold Fitzgerald liable to pay all calls, and that any calls paid by Powell or Hart would be and the same were thereby offered to be returned.

As, amongst other points in dispute, the parties differ as to what constituted the register, it is agreed that the books called the share and transfer ledger, register of transfers, and numerical register, should form part of the case. Until Powning absconded all the books of the company were managed by Powning or his clerks, none of the directors ever looking at the same. By the said books it appears that the said Powning and James Harris were the holders of a large number of shares, besides those in question. The said shares in question appear by the said books to have been transferred from the said Powning to the said James Harris, but there is no evidence one way or the other of any transfer to the said J. Harris, nor can such be found. Harris absconded with Powning. By the said books the said shares appear to have been transferred by the said James Harris to the said Charles Powell, and by the said Charles Powell to the plaintiff, and such transfers were respectively proved and were both dated 28th Sept. 1866. The name James Harris in the said books appearing as the transferee of the said shares, was written in after Powning absconded at the office of Mr. Moate, the accountant, to whose office they were sent by the directors because of the confused state in which they were at some time during the six months next after the absconding of Powning, viz., Nov. 1866, by a person named Moss, who did so at the dictation of some one in the office. None of the transferees in this case mentioned searched the register before accepting their respective transfers, nor is it usual to do so. The court was to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact, and the question for them was whether under the above circumstances the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages from defendants in respect of the premises. If the court was of opinion in the affirmative judgment to be entered for plaintiff for such such sum as it should think proper and costs of suit.

Brown, Q. C. (with him Cohen), for the plaintiff. The defendants are estopped from disputing the plaintiff's title to these shares after recognising him as a member of the company in respect of them. Re Bahia and San Francisco Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 585; 18 L. T. Rep. N.S. 467, is in point. [They were then stopped by the court, who called on]

Bush Cooper (with him Hawkins, Q.C.), for the defendants. The case cited is distinguishable. In that case it was held that the giving of the certificate by the company amounted to a statement by them, intended to be acted upon by purchasers of shares in the market, and a purchaser having acted upon it and altered his position, the company were estopped from denying it. There the company armed the purchaser with the means of going into the market and deceiving the public. That, on the principle laid down by the cases of Pickard v. Sears, 6 A. & E. 469 and Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Ex. 654, amounted to an estoppel. But the present case is different. Here the only certificates ever given were those given to Powell and that given to plaintiff. The first were certificates under the common seal of the company no doubt, and therefore certificates such as are contemplated by the 31st section of the Companies Act 1862, and which might, if acted upon by a purchaser, have constituted an estoppel, but it must be observed that they only stated the person on the register to be the owner of the shares. They could, therefore, only work an estoppel quoad persons who searched the register, and thus were misled by them; but here none of the transferees ever searched the register, and so those certificates may be put out of consideration altogether. Then the certificate given to plaintiff was only signed by the managing directors, and therefore is not within the Companies Act at all, and moreover it contains a provision that it is not to be evidence for this purpose. The plaintiff's title, if any, must be either by a regular

TOLEMAN v. PORTBURY AND OTHERS.

chain of transfers or by estoppel. Now it is clear from the case that he has no title by transfer. Harris, who conveyed to Powell, never had a title. There is no trace of any transfer to him. Mere registration gives no real title any more than registration in the register of Middlesex could give a title to land without a conveyance. The case, on the other hand, shows a good transfer to Fitzgerald. It must be taken then that the plaintiff can have no title unless by estoppel. If he had a really good title his remedy would be by an application at chambers under the 35th section of the Companies Act to get the register rectified by the substitution of his name for that of Fitzgerald. Then we contend there was no estoppel. The certificates were none for the reasons above stated, inasmuch as the plaintiff was never misled by them, not having searched the register; and if the register had been searched at the time of the sale to plaintiff, neither Powell's nor Harris's name would have been found on the register, for Powning was the registered owner. The plaintiff got a certificate of ownership, and if he had taken it in the market and sold, there would have been a perfect case against us on the part of any purchaser from him; but he himself was never misled. Until the books are looked at the statement in these certificates is a mere soliloquy, and therefore cannot be an estoppel. With respect to the payment of the calls by the plaintiff, they were paid by virtue of his agreement with Powell, and not of any inducement held out by the company. The plaintiff is in this dilemma: if he has a good title to the shares in any way, striking him off the register does not destroy that title, and his remedy is to get himself put on again; he is not deprived of his shares; if ever they were his they are as much his now. The plaintiffs cannot exclude him by any act of theirs; the utmost he is entitled to recover is the probable costs of any proceeding to get himself reinstated.

Brown, Q.C. in reply.—There is clearly an estoppel as to Powell and the plaintiff. The company made a call on Powell and received the amount from him. The plaintiff claims under Powell. Then again when Powell called on plaintiff for an indemnity against those calls, plaintiff declined to pay them until registered, and on the faith of such registration he ultimately paid. Plaintiff would clearly have been rendered liable to creditors of the company; for it has long been held that a person holding shares cannot afterwards repudiate. According to the contention of the other side a purchaser can never be safe unless he investigate the whole train of previous transfers. The practice with respect to shares in such companies is, that you never investigate the title of your immediate transferor if the company recognise him as a member. The company have recognised Powell as a member of their partnership. It is quite clear that if a contest arose between the plaintiff and Fitzgerald on the question who is now entitled to be placed on the register the plaintiff would fail, and that shows that he really has lost the value of his shares by the fault of the defendants.

MARTIN, B.—The facts of this case are shortly these:—The plaintiff bonâ fide bought these shares in open market, and he received a transfer from Powell. At the date of this transfer it appears Powell's name was not on the register, but in the following November the defendants adopted Powell as holder of the shares, and received calls from him. Powell applied to the plaintiff for repayment of those calls, and the plaintiff says that he will not repay them until his name is put on the register. The name was thereupon entered on the register; the defendants chose to adopt Powell as the holder, and the plaintiff being called on to indemnify him against the calls does so, and the defendants give a certificate that he is the registered holder. No authority seems to me necessary to show that if the company throughout a transaction treat a man as the owner of shares they cannot afterwards turn round and deny his ownership.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Cooper appears to me to be probably right in contending that the true title to these shares was in Fitzgerald; but the plaintiff, in my opinion, has a good title as against defendants by estoppel. The plaintiff was registered by them; perhaps he could not have compelled them to register him, though, probably, he could, inasmuch as it would seem Powell could. It may, perhaps, be contended Powell could not; in any case, it is for them to say whether they will do it; but, if they do it, they cannot undo it. The plaintiff is entitled to say "You have accepted me as a shareholder, and cannot now repudiate me." This doctrine is no novelty. Take the case of a negotiable instrument paid by a banker; the banker cannot recover the money back on the ground that it is a forgery. Here suppose the plaintiff had sold the shares and handed over the certificates; clearly the vendee would have a good title. Then could the defendants have come to plaintiff and said, "We must have a remedy over against you inasmuch as you have put us in this position?" Clearly not, and the result would be to show that the plaintiff would be in a better position by selling than by remaining owner. I can see no reason for this. Then, again, would the plaintiff have had any answer if sued by the defendants for calls? I think not. Then why should one party be bound and the other not? My only difficulty has been that the judges of the Queen's Bench in the case that was cited seem to rely on the certificates but not on the registration. I think, however, the same principle is applicable to both. I suppose the damages will be the value of the shares when the company removed the plaintiff's name from the register, as in the case in the Queen's Bench which has been cited. (a) Judgment for plaintiff.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

TOLEMAN v. PORTBURY AND OTHERS.

Ejectment—Forfeiture—Covenant not to "permit" a sale on the premises without licence—Onus probandi.

C., the lessee of a certain dwelling house, under covenant not to permit a sale by auction on the demised premises, without the consent in writing of the lessor, sublet the house, with the consent of the lessor, to R., and subsequently made an assignment, by bill of sale, of all his goods and chattels upon the demised premises to three other persons who sold the goods and chattels by public auction on the premises. In an action of ejectment for a forfeiture by breach of the covenant, the above facts only having been proved, and the plaintiff having been nonsuited at the trial:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench), that the nonsuit was right; per Kelly, C. B., Martin and

(a) Upon the court's giving judgment as above, it was stated by the defendants' counsel, in answer to a question from the bench, that the measure of damages must be taken as being the value of the shares, and judgment accordingly passed for an amount estimated on that basis.

TOLEMAN v. PORTBURY AND OTHERS.

[Ex. CH.]

Pigott, BB., because there was no evidence that the sale by auction took place with the permission of the defendant; per Willes and Brett, JJ. and Cleasby, B., because the plaintiff was bound to give evidence of the non-existence of a licence in writing; per Channell, B., for both reasons.

This was an action of ejectment commenced the 7th Dec. 1867, by writ directed to the defendants and all persons entitled to defend the possession of all that messuage or tenement, situate and being No. 7, Westbourne-grove, late No. 4, Sussex-terrace, Westbourne-grove, Bayswater, together with all ways, paths, passages, &c., thereto belonging or usually held or enjoyed therewith, in the Parish of Paddington, in the county of Middlesex, to the possession whereof Eliza Toleman claimed to be entitled and to eject all other persons therefrom.

The defendant, Peter Clarkson Reed, on the 30th Dec. 1867, appeared to the writ; and the defendants, Jas. Wm. C. Aylett, George Frank Reed, and Thos. Carr Artaud, on the 31st Dec., appeared to the writ and defended for the whole of the messuage, tenement, and premises therein mentioned; but no appearance was entered or defence made by Wm. Portbury or Robt. Wm. Candler.

The following are the particulars of breach of covenant for which ejectment was brought, delivered pursuant to the order of Mellor, J., viz., the permitting a sale by public auction to take place on the premises, late 4, Sussex-terrace, Westbourne-grove, now 7, Westbourne-grove, Bayswater, on the 25th May 1867, without the consent in writing of the plaintiff first had and obtained contrary to the covenant contained in the lease made between the plaintiff of the one part, and Robert William Candler of the other part, which lease is dated the 23rd March 1860.

The cause came on for trial before Mellor, J. at Westminster Hall on the 17th April 1868, when the following facts were proved:

By indenture of lease dated 23rd March 1860, made between the plaintiff of the one part, and the defendant Robert William Candler of the other part, the premises described in the aforesaid writ of ejectment were demised by the plaintiff to Robert William Candler, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for twenty-one years from the 25th March 1860, at the yearly rent of 122*l.* 5*s.* payable quarterly. By the indenture of lease the defendant Robert William Candler for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, covenanted with the plaintiff that he would not permit any sale by public auction to take place on the premises without the consent in writing of the plaintiff, Eliza Toleman, her executors, administrators, and assigns. The lease also contained a covenant on the part of the defendant Robert William Candler, not to assign or underlet the premises without the consent of the plaintiff, and also the usual proviso for re-entry on non-payment of rent, and in case of the breach or non-observance of any of the covenants on the lessee's part contained.

On the 2nd April 1867, the plaintiff by licence under her hand of that date gave and granted her consent to the defendant Robert William Candler, to demise and lease or underlet to the defendant Peter Clarkson Reed, his executors, administrators, and assigns, the premises comprised in, and demised by the indenture of lease, for the term of fourteen years from the 25th March 1867, less three days.

On the 23rd April 1867 the defendant Robert William Candler, pursuant to the licence, demised by way of underlease the premises to the defendant Peter Clarkson Reed, by way of mortgage, to secure the sum of 300*l.* which is still unpaid; the lease being worth at a low estimate from 500*l.* to 600*l.*

On the 30th April 1867 the defendant Robert

William Candler duly executed an assignment of all his goods, chattels, and effects in and upon the premises to the defendants, James William Clements Aylett, George Frank Reed, and Thomas Cave Artaud. The other defendant William Portbury was the occupier of a portion of the premises.

On the 23rd May 1867 one James Edgeby, in partnership with the defendant J. W. C. Aylett as auctioneers and estate agents, sold by public auction in and upon the premises all the goods, chattels, and effects, by the direction of the defendants, J. W. C. Aylett, G. F. Reed, and T. C. Artaud, the trustees; and previously to the sale bills announcing the same had been posted on the premises.

At the trial the respective counsel for the defendant, Peter Clarkson Reed, and for the defendants, James W. C. Aylett, G. F. Reed, and T. C. Artaud, submitted to the judge that the plaintiff should be nonsuited on the ground that she ought to have been examined as a witness to prove that she had not assented to the sale by public auction, and that there was no evidence of such sale having taken place without her consent, or that the defendant Peter Clarkson Reed or the lessee knew of or permitted the sale.

The judge directed a nonsuit to be entered, and reserved leave to the plaintiff to move to set aside the nonsuit and enter a verdict for the plaintiff, with liberty to the court to draw inferences.

Within the time in that behalf allowed by the rules and practice of the court, namely, on the 20th April 1868, the plaintiff, in pursuance of the leave reserved, applied for and obtained a rule to show cause why the nonsuit should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the plaintiff.

Afterwards, on the 5th May 1869, the Court of Queen's Bench discharged the rule to show cause.

Against this the plaintiff now appealed, pursuant to the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854.

By an order of Mellor, J., dated the 24th Aug. 1869, the names of the defendants J. W. C. Aylett, G. F. Reed, and T. C. Artaud were directed to be struck out of the writ and all subsequent proceedings, without costs on either side as between them and the plaintiff; and the names of those defendants were retained in this case only to show the course of proceedings taken in the question.

The question for the opinion of the court of appeal was, whether the rule of the 20th April 1868 ought to have been discharged, or ought to have been made absolute on the ground therein stated.

Brown, Q.C. for the plaintiff. There are two points involved in this case. (1) whether it was incumbent on the plaintiff to give evidence of the non-existence of a licence in writing to have the sale on the premises, and (2), whether, if the onus of giving such evidence lay upon the plaintiff, there was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury. As to the first point, if any written licence was given by the plaintiff it must have been in the possession of the defendant, and he was the proper party to give evidence of it. The onus probandi should be held to lie on the defendant on the general ground that the plaintiff is not called upon to prove a negative. Morton v. Copeland (16 C. B. 517), is undistinguishable in principle from the present case. There it was held that in an action for penalties imposed by the Dramatic Copyright Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15 s. 2), for representing the composition of authors without their consent in writing, the onus of proving the consent of the author or proprietor lies upon the defendant. "The general rule" says Starkie on Evidence (4th edit.) p. 585, "is in conformity with the suggestions of natural reason and a principle of obvious convenience; that the party who alleges the affirmative of any proposition shall prove it; for a negative does not admit of the simple and direct proof of which an affirmative is capable. And this is conformable with the maxim of the civil law, Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit, non qui negat." In the Apothecaries' Co. v. Bentley, Ry. & M. 159, which was an action for a penalty on the statute, 55 Geo. 3, c. 194, for practising as an apothecary without having obtained the certificate required by that Act, it was held that the onus probandi that the defendant had obtained his certificate lay with him and not with the plaintiffs. "I am of opinion," said Abbott, C. J., "that the affirmative must be proved by the defendant. I think that it being a negative the plaintiffs are not bound to prove it; but that it rests with the defendant to establish his having a certificate." In Rex v. Turner, 5 M. & S. 206, upon a conviction under 5 Anne, c. 14, s. 2, against a carrier for having game in his possession, it was held sufficient if in the information and adjudication the qualifications mentioned in 22 & 23 Car. c. 25, s. 3, be negatived, without negating them in the evidence. "Does not common sense show," said Lord Ellenborough, C. J., "that the burden of proof ought to be cast on the person who, by establishing any one of the qualifications, will be well defended?" and he cites Spieres v. Parker, 1 T. R. 144, where Lord Mansfield laid down the rule that in actions upon the game laws the plaintiff must negative the exceptions in the enacting clause, though he throw the burden of proof on the other side. "The same," said his lordship, "was said by Heath, J. in Jelfe v. Ballard, 1 B. & P. 468; and such, I believe, has been the prevailing opinion of the Profession and the practice." On these authorities it is submitted that the onus of proving that he had a licence in writing to permit the sale on his premises, lay upon the defendant in this case. [WILLES, J. referred to Doe v. Whitehead, 8 A. & El. 571, where it was held in an action of ejectment by landlord against tenant, on an alleged forfeiture by a breach of covenant to insure in some office in or near London, that the omission to insure must be proved by the plaintiff. MARTIN, B.—Candler with the consent of the plaintiff passed the possession of the premises out of himself to Reid, and therefore it seems to me that the state of things in which the condition would operate did not exist at all. KELLY, C. B.—For all that appears Candler might have actually refused to allow the auction to take place on the premises. Whether that would amount to a sufficient defence in point of law, I do not say.] He was bound by his covenant to prevent the auction taking place. In Doe v. Whitehead, the covenant was to do a particular thing, and it lay upon the plaintiff in an action for a forfeiture to prove that it had not been done; in the present case the covenant is not to do a particular thing without a licence, and the plaintiff had proved that the thing has been done, and it is submitted that on the authorities the burden of proving the existence of the licence lay upon the defendant. Taylor on Evidence, 5th edit., p. 379, mentions a second exception to the general rule that the burden of proof lies on the party who substantially alleges the affirmative, viz., that "where the subject-matter of the allegation lies peculiarly within the knowledge of one of the parties, that party must prove it, whether it be of an affirmative or negative character, and even though there be a presumption of law in his favour. This exception equally prevails in all civil or criminal proceedings instituted against parties for doing acts which they are not permitted to do unless duly qualified. The same rule is recognised in the Ecclesiastical Courts; and therefore, if proceedings be there instituted against a clergyman for non-residence without licence or exemption, the promoter of the suit need neither allege nor prove that the defendant had not a licence, or was not resident on another benefice," for which Bluck v. Rackman, 5 Moo. P. C. R. 305, 314, is cited. [WILLES, J.—I observe that Mr. Best in his Book on Evidence, 4th edit. p. 376, says of the ruling of the court in Doe v. Whitehead, "This ruling seems upheld by subsequent cases," and refers in the note to Wedgwood v. Hart, 2 Jur. N. S. 288; Price v. Worwood, 4 H. & N. 512.] Taylor on Evidence, pp. 371, 372, cites it to illustrate an exception to the general rule as to the onus lying on the party affirming, viz., that "if a disputable presumption of law in favour of an affirmative allegation, the party who supports the negative must call witnesses to rebut this presumption . . . because the law in favour of the party in possession will presume that he has satisfied the terms of the covenant, and had the landlord wished to have been relieved from the necessity of establishing this negative proof, he might easily have inserted a clause to that effect in the lease." [BRETT, J. referred to Doe v. Robson, 2 Car. & Pay. 245, where it was held that to support an ejectment on a forfeiture of a lease by non-performance of a covenant, if the covenant be to do an act, the plaintiff must give some evidence of the omission of the act.] The covenant was here not to do an act, and proof has been given of the act having been done.

Baylis for the defendant.—The plaintiff in the present case seeks to divest an estate created by his own act; he must then prove his case strictly, even though he have to prove a negative. The plaintiff was held bound to prove an omission on the part of the defendant to insure the demised premises in Doe v. Whitehead, 8 Ad. & El. 571. "There was no direct proof of non-insurance," said Lord Denman, "but the defendant, when called upon at the trial to produce a policy after notice did not do so. I think that quite insufficient. Then it is said that the fact of insurance ought to have been proved by the defendant. I am not of that opinion. The estate was vested in him; and his title could be got rid of only by proving a forfeiture. I do not dispute the cases on the game laws which have been cited; but there the defendant is in the first instance shown to have done an act which was unlawful unless he was qualified; and then the proof of qualification is thrown upon the defendant. Here the plaintiff relies on something done or permitted by the lessee, and therefore takes upon himself the burden of proving that fact. The proof may be difficult where the matter is peculiarly within the defendant's knowledge, but that does not vary the rule of law. And the landlord might have had a covenant inserted in the lease to insure at a particular office, or to produce a policy when called for, on pain of forfeiture. If he will make the conditions of his lease such as render the proof of a breach very difficult, the court cannot assist him." The same observations apply to this case. It is said that the existence of the licence in writing was a fact peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant, but the plaintiff can now produce evidence on that subject by means of interrogatories administered to the defendant. The cases cited relating to actions for penalties are all distinguishable from the present on the grounds mentioned by Lord Denman in Doe v. Whitehead. Further, the defendant's covenant in the present case is that he will not "permit" a sale to take place on the demised premises. Now by permission must be understood lawful persuasion. Nothing that is done contrary to the covenant without the defendant's authority or consent can amount to a breach of this covenant. Where a covenant was that defendant had not done, nor "permitted nor suffered" to be done any act whereby an estate was encumbered, it was held that assenting to an act which the covenanter could not prevent, was not a breach of the covenant (Hobson v. Middleton, 6 B. & Cress. 295), and the word "suffer" was in that case and not in the present. Bayley, J. said "the words 'permitting and suffering', do not bear the same meaning as 'knowing of and being privy to'; the meaning of them is that the defendant should not concur in any act over which he had a control . . . if 'permitting and suffering' applies only to that which he could prevent, it is clear that his consent in this case was not a breach of the covenant." What the lessee did in the present case was to give a bill of sale after the mortgage, when he had no legal estate at all, and no power to permit or suffer any act to be done on the premises. Lastly it is submitted that there was no evidence which should have been left to the jury. Not only was there no evidence of the non-existence of a licence in writing, or of a permission of the sale by Candler, but there was no evidence of either Candler or the mortgagee being in possession of the premises at the time. Candler was in fact at the time a mere stranger.

Brown, Q. C., in reply.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed. Sitting here in a court of error, I must not be supposed to hold that if the covenant in the present case had been that no sale should take place upon the demised premises without the licence in writing of the lessor, there was no evidence to leave to the jury upon which the plaintiff would be entitled to recover a verdict. I express no opinion whatever upon that point; because I do not admit, taking the view that I do of the case upon the whole of the facts, that we are necessarily called on to pronounce an opinion on that point; and also because I am by no means satisfied that the Court of Queen's Bench gave judgment against the plaintiff in discharging his rule upon that point. I pass over, therefore, the question whether, where an action of ejectment is brought for a forfeiture said to be incurred by the breach of a covenant of this nature—not to permit a sale to take place upon the premises without the licence in writing of the lessor, it is incumbent upon the lessor, that is, the plaintiff, and not upon the defendant, the lessee or one claiming under him, to show by evidence that there was or was not a licence in writing. Looking at the covenant in the present case, we find it in these terms:—that the defendant would not permit any sale by public auction to take place on the premises without the consent in writing of the plaintiff. Now, whether there was or was not sufficient evidence to go to the jury of the want of a consent in writing on the part of the lessor, it is quite clear to my mind that it is an essential part of such a covenant that an unlicensed sale on the premises, in order to constitute a breach of the covenant, must have been one which took place with the permission of the lessee; and looking to the whole of the facts of this case, I am of opinion that there was no evidence to go to the jury that the sale on the premises did take place by his permission. I might, perhaps, have entertained that opinion also, in the case of an action of covenant, but this being an action for a forfeiture, which we must regard strictly, we must be satisfied that there was clear evidence to go to the jury that there had been a forfeiture, and I think the evidence in the case was insufficient for that purpose, and, therefore, that the judge, if the point was made at the trial, was quite right in nonsuiting the plaintiff. What are the circumstances of the case as they were proved at the trial? No actual permission of the sale on the part of the lessee was proved de facto. Nor was any particle of evidence adduced tending to such a conclusion, or anything from which we can imply it. How stands it then on the presumptive evidence? It appears that Candler was the lessee, but it also appears that he had underlet the premises to one Reed, and subsequently had assigned the furniture and effects on the premises to three persons, and it seems doubtful whether he remained in actual possession of the premises. But assuming that Candler was in actual possession of the premises, and continued to dwell there, it appears that he had assigned away the furniture and effects to be sold, and the question arises whether, under the circumstances, he permitted the sale to take place on the premises, or whether it took place under his authority. In the first place he had no legal right to interfere with the sale or with the assignees, or with the property sold. He had, in fact, no legal right to be on the premises at all. I do not, however, say that he was necessarily a trespasser, as he might be there with the licence of the under tenant. If, therefore, he had actually endeavoured to prevent the sale on the premises, and had forbidden it to the assignees and the auctioneers, there was no obligation upon them to attend in any way to his prohibition; and it is quite consistent with the evidence that he not only did not permit the sale on the premises, but actually opposed it. But it is not necessary that we should go so far. It is enough to say that there is no evidence that he authorised the sale in any way; and when we look at the words of the covenant we see that the sale in order to constitute a forfeiture, must not only be without the licence of the lessor, but that the lessee must "permit" the sale, his covenant being that he would not permit a sale to take place on the premises without the plaintiff's consent. There is certainly no evidence that he did in fact, directly or indirectly, permit it. On this ground, therefore—viz., that the act of sale was done by persons over whom the lessee had no control—the plaintiff was rightly held not entitled to recover. I am aware, from our attention having been called to it by my brother Willes, that there is a case in 1 Taunton, 183, Attersoll v. Stevens, which seems to point another way. In that case, according to the marginal note, J. T. demised land to the plaintiff at an annual rent for 21 years, with liberty to dig half an acre of brick earth annually; the lessee covenanted that he would not dig more, or, if he did, that he would pay an increased rent at the same rate that the whole brick earth was sold at. A stranger having dug and taken away brick earth, the lessee recovered against him the full value of it, and he was held entitled to retain the whole damages, Mansfield, C. J., saying: "The consequence of this taking by a stranger, and of this action against the stranger, is, that as between the lessee and the lessor it must be taken to have been dug by the lessee; if this and what himself had dug did not together exceed the half acre per annum, there is nothing to pay; but if it exceeds that quantity, the lessee must pay the stipulated rent for the surplus." That, however, turned upon the construction of the covenant in that case, and not upon the question on whom the onus probandi lay. Further, that was not a case of forfeiture, but only of a breach of covenant. That case, therefore, is quite consistent with the judgment which I am now pronouncing. Mansfield, C. J., at p. 202, cites from Coke thus: "Lord Coke, 2 Inst. 303, says, the lessee shall answer for the waste done by any stranger; for he in the reversion cannot have any remedy but against the tenant, and the tenant shall have his remedy against the wrongdoer, and recover all in damages against him, and by this means the loss at last shall light upon the wrongdoer. If the lessee gave permission to a stranger to dig, no doubt it would be the act of the lessee, and he would be bound to pay the lessor

THE DUERO.

the stipulated price. Then what is the difference between his agreeing to it, and his standing by while the stranger takes it?" But this, again, does not point to a case of forfeiture. Therefore I distinguish that case in Taunton's Reports from the present, which is a case of forfeiture which we are bound to regard strictly. Looking at the whole of this case, I do not hesitate to say that there was no evidence which the judge could properly have left to the jury of a permission by the defendant of the sale which took place on the demised premises.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion.

WILLES, J.—I rather concur in the judgment in favour of the defendant on the other ground. I do not wish to say that I dissent in any way from the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron, but I prefer to rest my opinion on the foundation laid under the auspices of my lord when at the bar, in the case of Doe v. Whitehead, 8 Ad. & El. 571, where it was held that in an action of ejectment for a forfeiture for not insuring according to covenant, the omission to insure must be proved by the plaintiff; and where Littledale, J., that most accurate lawyer, whose mind was imbued with ancient learning, pointed out the distinction between the case of The Apothecaries' Company v. Bentley (ubi sup.), relied on by Mr. Brown, and such a case as the present. "In the cases cited as to game," he said, "the defendant had to bring himself within the protection of the statutes which prohibited any person from using an engine to destroy game, or from having it in his possession, unless properly qualified or authorised. A like observation applies to The Apothecaries' Company v. Bentley. But here, where a landlord brings an action to defeat the estate granted to a lessee, the onus of proof ought to lie on the plaintiff. It is true that if the action had been in covenant the onus would have lain on the defendant; but that does not show that it will so lie in a different form of action." In order to show that the estate which he has granted has become divested out of the tenant, the lessor must show the act on which he relies as constituting a forfeiture to have been done under the circumstances necessary to constitute a forfeiture; and he does not show that in the present case by showing a sale by auction on the demised premises, without showing also the additional circumstance that it was done without the tenant's having obtained his landlord's permission. Without that the argument for the forfeiture is incomplete, and the estate remains vested until circumstances are shown to have occurred by which it is divested; and it is not sufficient to show the existence of circumstances which probably might divest it.

CHANNELL, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench should be affirmed. There may be an allegation in language which is negative in its character; and if that allegation is traversed, there are cases to show that the party traversing the negative allegation has thrown upon him the burden of proof, as in replevin where riens in arrear is pleaded. But I think that that does not apply to the present case, and that where an estate is vested by the act of the plaintiff it is upon him to show that it has become divested; and when he relies on a forfeiture he must prove everything which is necessary to show that the forfeiture has taken place. I think, therefore, that the rule deduced from actions for penalties does not apply to actions of ejectment for forfeitures. But, even if it were otherwise, I am clearly of opinion that there is no evidence in the present case to show that the act relied on as constituting a forfeiture took place with the permission of the defendant.

PIGOTT, B.—I agree that the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed. If it were necessary to determine the first point, I should wish to consider the matter further before I gave an opinion upon it.

BRETT, J.—I also agree, on the ground that the plaintiff was bound to give some evidence of the negative proposition, that the sale took place without any licence from him in writing.

CLEASBY, B.—The covenant in the present case is not to permit a sale on the demised premises without a licence in writing from the lessor. The breach of that involves two things, one positive—viz., the permitting the sale to take place on the premises; the other negative—viz., the non-existence of a licence in writing from the lessor. Evidence of the positive part must be given by the lessor to establish a forfeiture. So also I am of opinion that evidence must be given by him of the negative part; and as he has not done that, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

July 24 and 31, 1869.

THE DUERO.

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Exemption from liability.

Where a bill of lading exempted a shipowner from liability for the negligence of his master and crew, and a suit was instituted for damages to cargo sustained in consequence of their negligence:

Held, the shipowner was not liable for the damage.

This was a special case, the facts of which were as follows. On or about the 10th July 1868, Messrs. Carey Brothers and Co., of Tarragona, in Spain, as agents for Samuel Hanson and Reginald Hanson, trading under the name or style of Samuel Hanson and Son, of No. 47, Botolph-lane, in the city of London, fruit merchants, the plaintiffs in this cause, delivered to Messrs. P. M. Tintare, of Barcelona, in Spain, the owners of the Duero, 180 bags of Barcelona nuts, the property of the plaintiffs, to be carried from Tarragona to London on board the above-named steamship Duero, then lying in the port of Tarragona, for reward to the defendants in that behalf, upon the terms of a bill of lading. The said goods were, when shipped as aforesaid, in good order and condition. The said steamship subsequently proceeded on her voyage to London, where she arrived on or about the 6th August 1868, when the said goods were delivered to the plaintiffs. The said goods were delivered to the plaintiffs as aforesaid in a damaged condition, such damaged condition having been occasioned by the negligence and default of the master and mariners of the said vessel in and about stowing the goods on board of her.

The question for the opinion of the court on this special case was, whether the defendants were protected from liability by the terms of the bill of lading.

If the court should be of opinion that the defendants were protected from liability, then judgment should be entered for the defendants, and the plaintiffs condemned in the costs of all the proceedings in this cause. If the court should be of the contrary opinion, then the defendants should be condemned in such amount of damages as might be agreed to by the parties, or should be ascertained by the registrar and merchants in case the parties could not agree to either, with the costs of all the proceedings in the cause. The exceptions in the bill of lading the alleged detention of the cargo was a detention by third parties claiming by title of possession in derelict, and not a detention by the master or his agent; and in support of this objection, the cases of the Tigris and the Norway were cited to show the utmost extent to which the court had gone, and the Santa Anna (32 L. J. 211 Adm.; Lush. 198), as marking the limit which the court had set to its jurisdiction in cases of "breach of duty or contract" under the statute. But to these cases were added in the reply, and it may be convenient to mention them now, the Danzig, Bro. & Lush. 102, in which the court exercises jurisdiction over a claim for short delivery of cargo as per bill of lading in a British port, though the goods not delivered were not in fact carried into port. The Bahia, Bro. & Lush. 61, in which the plaintiffs were the owners of certain corn which was laden on board the Bahia at New York under a bill of lading to be delivered at Dunkirk, in France; that on the voyage the master put into Ramsgate, and landed the cargo, and refused either to carry on to Dunkirk or to give delivery at Ramsgate; the Wilhelm, in which the plaintiff complained that the master delayed the prosecution of his voyage, and that, owing to his negligence, the cargo did not reach the port of destination until an unduly late period, and in which the court pronounced for the damage, and made the usual order of reference to the registrar and merchants (July 25, 1865) this case has not been reported. The Felix, L. Rep. 2 Adm. 273, decided by myself, in which the plaintiffs obtained damages because the master did not obey the order of the consignee to discharge his cargo in a particular dock. A second objection to these articles is that the matters pleaded in them amount to a charge of felony, and that a court of civil judicature must refuse to entertain such a cause until a criminal court has adjudicated that a felony cannot be the foundation of a civil action; thereupon, and for this position, reliance was placed upon Cox v. Paxton, 17 Ves. 329, and Stone v. Marsh, 6 Barn. & Cress. 564, and Deacon's Bank Rep. Ex parte Elliot, 194, and the statute 24 & 25 Vict., c. 97 s. 43, re-enacting sect. 6 of Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 89 (repealed by 24 & 25 Vict., c. 95), was cited to show that the charges contained in the articles were bartrous and felonious. The third and last objection was that this being a proceeding in rem and not in pœnam, the ship or res was not liable for acts of the master done without the scope of his duty (Davies' Amer. Rep., p. 164), and that this position was not affected by the fact that the master was (as pleaded in the second article) the sole owner, and that this court had refused to allow a cargo to be arrested in a case in which the same person was owner of the ship and of the cargo: (The Victor, Lush. 72, 76.) It was also urged that innocent liens on the ship not at present opposed might be injured by these proceedings against the ship. These various points in the case have been well argued on both sides, but inasmuch as I am about to say why I think the articles are substantially admissible in their present form, it is not necessary to state the arguments in reply to which I in great measure accede, as fully as, in a case somewhat novel, I have thought it right to state the objections. The real ground of action in this suit is stated in the 12th article of the petition, which is as follows: "The said cargo was never delivered by the defendant to the plaintiffs in accordance with the terms of the said bill of lading, although such non-delivery was not occasioned by any of the perils in the said bill of lading excepted." Assuming, as I am bound to do at present, the facts to be correctly stated in the other article, there is no doubt that the averment contained in this article is true. The owners J have gotten their goods at a port other than that specified in the contract, and not from the master, but from third parties, namely, the salvors. Here, then, is a breach of contract relating to the goods whereby the owners have been damnified. I am of opinion that it is not necessary that the damage should be actual in order to found the jurisdiction of the court. It may be of that constructive character resulting from wrong or improper delivery or detention, or the like causes; and in this opinion I am fortified as well by the precedents to which I have referred as by the natural construction of the language of the statute; and it appears from the articles objected to that, although the detention of the cargo was not immediately the act of the master, inasmuch as it had passed out of his hands into those of third parties, who had a lien upon it; yet that the detention was the consequence of previous misconduct on the part of the master, through which it passed into the possession of these third parties. The articles which plead these facts are admissible according to the rules of this court, as showing the history of the transaction and the continuing liability of the master. I will now deal with the objection that the action ought to have been in personam, and not in rem, that the master acted beyond the scope of his duty, and that in condemning the res I may be injuring innocent liens which do not appear. I am of opinion that the petitioners have a right under the statute to institute this suit in rem, and that the owner of the ship is responsible to the shipper for the loss or damage alleged in this case. I do not think that the objection that the act of the master did not bind the owner as in the case of the Waldo, which is well deserving of study, affects this proposition. The master, in that case, had been made by the shipper the consignee of the cargo. The case of the Ida was of a more peculiar character; the judgment in it was founded on a want of jurisdiction in the court, and in the judgments no reference is made to the argument that the owner was not liable because the master exceeded the scope of his duty; as to the possible existence of secret liens on this ship, the answer is that, if there be such, the possessor of them is apprised by the forms of this court that he may come in and defend his interest and obtain for his claims their due priority. With respect to the objection that they contain a charge of felony in which the action for the civil wrong is merged, I felt at first some difficulty upon this point, and I am certainly not inclined unnecessarily to entangle myself in this question of merger, which is perhaps not in principle always very satisfactorily explained, or in practice always very consistently applied, by the authorities at common law. It is true that although the master be sole owner, the acts alleged would probably render a British subject guilty of felony under the statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, and it has been suggested that although the vessel be a foreign vessel and the master a foreigner, yet, as the offence was committed super altum mare, this court of maritime international law ought to hold itself less fettered as to criminal jurisdiction in this matter than a common law court, which would in these circumstances be competent to take cognisance of the offence (Reg. v. Serva and others, 1 Den. C. C. 104; Reg. v. Anderson, 1 Cr. Cas. Res. 161). I must not be understood as assenting to this argument, but I shall direct the word "fraudulently" to be struck out in both the articles; it is not necessary for the case of the petitioner in this court, it introduces an issue which might unnecessarily complicate and increase the costs of the suit. With this alteration I admit the petition.

CLARKSON AND OTHERS v. YOUNG.

Marine insurance—Concealment of material fact—Deck cargo.

In an action upon a policy of insurance the defendants pleaded that the fact that the ship insured was to carry a deck cargo was not disclosed, and on their behalf it was contended that such concealment avoided the policy. But it was Held, that it would not avoid the policy entirely, but only as regarded the cargo carried on deck.

This was an action brought by a firm of ship-brokers in the City, to recover 900*l.* on a policy of insurance effected by them to secure them the freight and disbursements on the voyage of the ship Annette, chartered by them on behalf of the owner. The claim being made on the policy, was resisted on various grounds, as that it was not communicated to all the underwriters that the vessel was missing, and that it had a deck cargo, &c.

The plea containing the defence with reference to the deck cargo was the eighth, and was as follows:—That the said policy was made in London, and that before and at the time of the making of the said policy there was at London and elsewhere in England, a well-known and approved usage and custom of trade among shippers, merchants, and underwriters in the trade of carrying goods in ships on the said insured voyage, that a policy of insurance on freight and on advances on freight in the ordinary form, such as the said policy in the declaration mentioned, does not cover the freight or the advances on the freight payable for or in respect of goods stowed upon deck, unless the underwriter has at the time of the making of such policy notice by such policy or otherwise that the said goods are to be stowed on deck, of which said custom and usage the plaintiffs and the defendant at the time of the making of the said policy in the declaration mentioned, had notice and made the policy with reference thereto. And the defendant, says that the said cargo in the declaration mentioned was stowed on deck, of which the defendants had at the time of the making of the said policy no notice whatever by the said policy or otherwise.

Issue was joined on this plea.

The ship was chartered in September 1868, to go to Honduras, take a cargo of mahogany, and bring it to a port in this country. It took the cargo on board in November, and sailed homewards, twenty-two of the heavy mahogany logs being on deck, or lashed to the sides. In the middle of the month it was lost. In the mean time the captain had written home to his principals, the plaintiffs, to insure for freight and disbursements, and on the 16th Dec. the present policy was effected for 400*l.* disbursements and 500*l.* freight. At that time it was not known by the plaintiffs that the vessel was lost; but she was "overdue," and it was known that there had been very bad weather. This state of things, however, was not (it was said) known to all the underwriters, and those who knew it refused the insurance; neither was it known that the timber was partly laden on deck, which, it was now said, greatly increased the risk and peril of navigation. The non-disclosure of these facts constituted the "concealment" complained of. There was contradictory evidence, however, both as to the alleged concealment and the materiality of the facts alleged to have been concealed. Witnesses were called on the one hand to prove that there was a concealment, and on the other hand to prove that there was not; on the one hand to prove that a deck cargo was dangerous, and on the other hand to prove that it was not so. It appeared that the bill of lading mentioned a deck cargo, and that it was not shown to the underwriters.

Prentice, Q. C., Watkin Williams, and A. L. Smith were for the plaintiffs.

Sir J. Karlake, Sir G. Honyman, and Cohen for the defendant.

Before summing up,

LUSH, J. desired to know what was the view of the defence as to the deck cargo.

Sir J. Karlake said he apprehended the fact ought to have been mentioned to the underwriters.

LUSH, J.—Do you say that its non-disclosure would vitiate the policy entirely?

Sir J. Karlake said he submitted that it would.

LUSH, J. said he knew of no authority to that extent, and should rule otherwise. He believed it had already been established by authority that the omission to mention such a matter only went to the extent of the claim.

Sir J. Karlake submitted that if it increased the risk of navigation it went to the whole.

LUSH, J. said he should rule otherwise, but would reserve the point. In summing up he left to the jury the questions, (1) Whether there had been a concealment of a material fact as to the sailing of the ship; and (2) Whether there had been a concealment of a material fact as to the deck cargo.

Verdict for the defendant on both points.

PLAYFORD v. MERCER AND ANOTHER (a).

Sale of cargo—From the deck—Harbour dues payable by vendor.

A cargo of ice was consigned to the plaintiff, and before the ship came into harbour the defendants purchased the cargo, with a condition that the ice was to be taken from the ship's deck by them.

Held, that the contract 'from the deck' meant that the vendor should pay all that was necessary in order to enable the purchaser to remove the cargo from the deck, and that harbour dues charged to be paid before goods could be removed were payable by the vendor.

This was an action for the balance of an account between the parties. About 50*l.* was paid into court, and the only dispute was as to the 6*l.* 6*s.*, paid by the defendants to the captain of the ship James, for harbour dues at Lowestoft, upon the unloading of a cargo of ice, consigned by that ship to the plaintiff, but purchased from him by the defendants.

The ship arrived in Lowestoft Roads on the 21st Oct. 1869, and on the following day the plaintiff sent circulars informing his customers, and offering the cargo for sale. The defendants made an offer for the cargo "free on the quay;" the plaintiff replied by telegraph naming a different sum, and saying, "The ice to be taken from ship's deck by you." The defendants telegraphed back "consign the vessel to us." At the defendants' request by the same telegram, the ship was brought alongside a wharf in Lowestoft Harbour, and unloaded; the bill of lading was not given to the defendants.

O'Malley, Q. C., for defendants, contended that they were not consignees of the cargo, and they were no more liable for harbour dues than for the freight. [BLACKBURN, J.—Would the shipowner have a lien on the cargo, in order to discharge these dues?] This is a cargo which was purchased at the price named by the plaintiff, and was delivered to the defendants on deck instead of on the quay, merely for convenience. [BLACKBURN, J.—Lighterage charges would depend upon the agreed place of delivery, and the question here is, whether it is the same with the harbour dues.] The defendants are prepared to establish the custom in their favour. [BLACKBURN, J.—No question of custom arises; the matter entirely depends upon the construction of the contract.]

Joyce, for the plaintiff, argued that the dues were payable for the use of the harbour, and after the sale of the cargo on deck, the defendants might have landed it wherever they pleased. The sale took place whilst the ship was in the Roads, and the plaintiff ought not to be responsible for the expenses of the cargo after it was sold. Although the defendants did not get the bill of lading, they were, in fact, consignees, and they were liable for dues in the same way as they would have had to pay for lighters, if they had employed them. Further, even if the defendants should not pay for the dues, they must be a charge upon the captain, and the plaintiff could not in any way be responsible.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think the contract "from the deck" means that the vendor shall pay all that is necessary in order to enable the purchaser to remove the cargo from the deck; and assuming, as I do, that the harbour dues are by the Lowestoft Harbour Act (which neither side has produced before me) charged to be paid before goods can be removed, the plaintiff should pay them, and consequently the defendants are entitled to the verdict. I find the verdict for defendants on the pleas of payment and set-off, and I reserve leave to the plaintiff to move the Court of Queen's Bench to enter a verdict for him; both parties to be concluded by the decision of that court, unless leave to appeal be granted.

TICHBORNE v. TICHBORNE.

Interest suit—Administrator pendente lite—Order of the Court of Chancery—Probate Act, 70th section.

The creditors of a deceased intestate instituted a suit in Chancery for the administration of her estate. This court, on the application of one of the parties to an interest suit in this court touching the administration to the deceased, had appointed an administrator pendente lite, and the Court of Chancery made an order on him to apply a portion of her estate to the payment of her debts.

The court declined to interfere with the order of the Court of Chancery.

This was an interest suit for the administration of the estate of Dame Henrietta Tichborne, who died intestate. There was a suit pending in Chancery, and Stuart, V.C. appointed Mr. Richard Humphreys receiver of the real estate. In June last this court on the motion of the defendant appointed Mr. Humphreys administrator pendente lite; and the Vice-Chancellor made an order on the administrator pendente lite to apply a certain portion of the estate for the payment of the deceased's debts. The administrator accordingly advertised for sale a portion of the effects of the deceased, including jewels, trinkets, plate, &c.

Dr. Tristram now moved, on behalf of the plaintiff, for an order not to proceed to sale without the sanction of this court. By the 70th section of the Probate Act, under which his appointment was made, the administrator was to act under the immediate control of this court, and the usual practice had been for an administrator before disposing of the personal estate of a deceased person to refer the matter to the registrar of this court. The money in hand from the deceased's estate was 1034*l.*, and the debts proved and claimed amounted to 1255*l.*, leaving a deficit of 221*l.* The plaintiff was ready to deposit a sum of 300*l.* in the registry to meet this deficit rather than that the personal ornaments of the deceased should be sold.

The Solicitor-General, for the defendant, intimated that the offer would not be accepted.

Dr. Tristram asked, therefore, that the sale should not take place until the registrar of this court had investigated the claims; and if the sale were insisted on he asked that the administrator should be directed not to sell more than necessary to meet the claims.

The Solicitor-General opposed the motion on behalf of the defendant. It would bring this court and the Court of Chancery into conflict. The estate was insolvent, and unless this sale took place the money necessary to clear off deceased's debts would not be forthcoming. There was no ground for interfering with the order of the Court of Chancery.

Bridge, for the creditors, also opposed the motion. If the plaintiff wanted the articles he could attend at the sale and buy them.

Dr. Tristram, in reply, referred to the section of the Act, and contended that the administrator could only act under the control of this court.

LORD PENZANCE.—There is no doubt that as soon as this court appoints a person administrator pendente lite, he is by the express words of the statute clothed with all the powers of a general administrator, and that he has to act under control and direction of this court. But here there is an administration suit in Chancery, and that court has proceeded according to its practice in that suit. It would be mischievous, therefore, and ultra vires, if, while there is a suit pending in the Court of Chancery, this court were to make the order prayed.

Dr. Tristram.—The plaintiff is not a party to the suit in Chancery, and has no right to interfere with the proceedings there. The only means he has of moving in the matter is by coming to this court and asking for a direction to the administrator pendente lite.

LORD PENZANCE.—There is no doubt that this court has power to make orders upon an administrator pendente lite, and in most cases there is no doubt that while a suit is pending the administrator is subject to the control of this court, and no other. In this particular case it happens that two relations are squabbling as to who is entitled to the administhat the words were used not with reference to the contents of the parcels, which the company had no means of knowing, but to the parcels themselves, according as they were like or different for the purpose of carriage; and that the words "under the same" or "under like circumstances," referred to the conveyance of the goods, and not to the class of persons for whom they were carried:

Held, lastly, that an action for money had and received would lie to recover back the overcharges made upon the carriage of the plaintiff's goods, such overcharges being in violation of an obligation imposed on the company by Act of Parliament to charge all persons equally.

Baxendale v. The Great Western Railway Company, 16 C. B., N. S., 140; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 814, approved; Garton v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 1 B. & S. 112; 30 L. J. 273, Q. B., overruled.

Error upon a judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, affirming a judgment of the Exchequer, in favour of the defendant in error.

The action was brought by the defendant in error to recover from the plaintiffs in error the sum of 961*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, being the amount of alleged overcharges made upon certain parcels of goods carried on their railway by the plaintiffs in error.

The declaration was on the common count for money had and received. The plea was, never indebted.

The facts are fully stated in the report of the case in the Exchequer Chamber (13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222; 35 L. J. 18, Ex.; 3 H. & C. 800); shortly they were as follows:

The plaintiff in the action, at the trial before Martin, B. at the London Sittings after Trinity Term, 1864, proved that he pursued in London the trade of collecting small parcels, enclosing them in one package, and forwarding them to his agents in the country for delivery to the various consignees. These packages were called "packed parcels," and many were forwarded by the defendants' railway.

By the defendants' tariff, parcels between 1*cwt.* and 500*lb.* were divided into five classes, according to the description of goods they contained, and were charged at five different rates, but packed parcels were charged at the highest rate, with 50 per cent. in addition.

The plaintiff's packed parcels were always charged at the above rate, without reference to the contents of the inclosures, which were generally unknown both to him and the company.

The plaintiff tendered evidence to prove that four wholesale houses (not carriers) in London, habitually sent packed parcels, and that they were never charged at the rate paid by the plaintiff for his packed parcels. This evidence was objected to, but was admitted by the judge.

No evidence was given that the company were ever directly informed that any one specific parcel sent by these wholesale houses was a packed parcel, but it appeared that no questions were asked on the subject by the company.

The plaintiff also tendered evidence to prove that at a reference in 1849 evidence was given in the presence of the then solicitor and traffic manager of the company, showing the common practice of wholesale houses to send packed parcels by the company's railway. This evidence was objected to, but was admitted.

The plaintiff also tendered the evidence of a person conversant with the business of carriers, to show that the practice of sending packed parcels had for many years been so general, as to be notorious among carriers. This evidence was also objected to and admitted.

The judge directed the jury that there was evidence on which they might find, "that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons, containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and also on which they might find that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons; and that if the jury believed that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon a packed parcel of goods, they ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff."

A bill of exceptions was tendered to the above ruling, and subject thereto and to the objections to the above evidence, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

In the Exchequer Chamber, it was held (per Cockburn, C.J., Byles, Blackburn, Keating, Mellor, and Shee, J.J.; Erle, C.J. dissentiente), that the above evidence was admissible, and that the discretion of the judge was right; the verdict for the plaintiff therefore stood.

Against this judgment the present proceedings in error were taken.

The following judges were present at the hearing in the House of Lords: Willes, Blackburn, Keating, and Lush, J.J., and Bramwell and Pigott, B.B.

Sir J. B. Karlake, Q. C. (Attorney-General), Field, Q. C., Raymond, and F. M. White, for the plaintiffs in error.

J. Brown, Q. C. and Marshall Griffith, for the defendant in error.

The arguments were similar to those in the court below, reported in 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255, 226. The cases and authorities relied on are noticed in the opinions of the judges and the judgment (post).

The following were the statutory provisions on which the present judgment turned:—The Great Western Railway Company's Special Act (7 & 8 Vict. c. ciii).

Sect. 50:

It shall be lawful for the said Great Western Railway Company, whenever they shall act as carriers, or shall provide locomotive, or steam power carriages for the conveyance of passengers, animals, goods, wares, merchandise, articles, matters, or things, to charge for such locomotive or steam power and carriages, such sum (not exceeding the sums, if any, limited by recited Acts, or any of them), and that, either per ton, or per mile, or by bulk, measure, number, or admeasurement, or by fixed charges, as they shall think expedient: Provided always that, in whatever way the said charges are made, they shall be made equally to all persons in respect of all animals, and of all goods, &c., and things of a like description and quantity, and conveyed in, or propelled by, a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of and over the same distance along the said railway, and under the like circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any of such charges shall be made partially, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person.

The Great Western Railway Amendment and Extension Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi.)

All the provisions, matters, and things contained in the said several recited Acts relating to the Great Western Railway Company, so far as the same are now unrepealed and in force, and are not inconsistent with or altered by the provisions of this Act, and save in so far as the same may be inconsistent with the provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, shall extend to this Act, and to the several purposes thereof as fully and effectually as if the same provisions, &c., were repeated and re-enacted in this Act, and had specific reference thereto.

Sect. 2:

The provisions of the Lands and Railway Clauses Consolidation Acts 1845, in so far as the same may be applicable and are not inconsistent with the provisions hereinafter contained, shall be incorporated with and form part of this Act.

Sect. 58:

And with respect to small packages and single articles of great weight, be it enacted that, notwithstanding the rate of tolls prescribed by this Act, the company may lawfully demand the tolls following, that is to say, for the carriage of small parcels (that is to say, parcels not exceeding 500lb. weight each) the company may demand any sum which they think fit, provided always, that articles sent in large aggregate quantities, although made up of separate parcels, such as bags of sugar, coffee, meal, and the like, shall not be deemed small parcels, but such term shall apply only to single parcels in separate packages.

The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), sect. 90 :

And whereas it is expedient that the company should be enabled to vary the tolls upon the railway so as to accommodate them to the circumstances of the traffic, but that such power of varying should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the company or of particular parties; it shall be lawful therefore, for the company, subject to the provisions and limitations herein and in the special Act contained, from time to time to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken, either upon the whole or any particular portions of the railway as they shall think fit; provided, that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons and after the same rate., whether per ton, per mile, or otherwise in respect of all passengers, and of all goods or carriages of the same description, and conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the line of the railway under the same circumstances; and no reduction or advance in any such tolls shall be made either directly or indirectly in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway.

Lord CAIRNS (then Lord Chancellor) proposed the following question to the judges:—Ought judgment in this case to have been given in the Exchequer Chamber for the defendant in error, or ought a venire de novo to have been awarded?

April 22, 1869.—BLACKBURN, J.—I answer your Lordships' question by stating that in my opinion the judgment in the Exchequer Chamber was right. The points in the case are raised by exceptions to the reception of the evidence received by the judge on the trial, and to his direction to the jury what were the inferences which might be properly drawn from that evidence, and as to the legal consequences which would follow from the inferences, if drawn by them. It is therefore necessary to consider the general question as to the rights of persons who, like the plaintiff, carry on the trade of carriers on railways, and of the railway companies, and also the effect of the evidence given in this particular case. I think it will be more convenient to consider what are the rights of individuals carrying on the plaintiff's trade as against railway companies, which is a question of general importance, before inquiring into the validity of those exceptions which only affect this particular case, though those also must ultimately be determined. At common law a person holding himself out as a common carrier of goods was not under any obligation to treat all customers equally. The obligation which the common law imposed upon him was to accept and carry all goods delivered to him for carriage according to his profession (unless he had some reasonable excuse for not doing so) on being paid a reasonable compensation for so doing; and if the carrier refused to accept such goods, an action lay against him for so refusing; and if the customer, in order to induce the carrier to perform his duty, paid, under protest, a larger sum than was reasonable, he might recover back the surplus beyond what the carrier was entitled to receive, in an action for money had and received as being money extorted from him. But the fact that the carrier charged others less, though it was evidence to show that the charge was unreasonable, was no more than evidence tending that way. There was nothing in the common law to hinder a carrier from carrying for favoured individuals at an unreasonably low rate, or even gratis. All that the law required was, that he should not charge any more than was reasonable:

(See per Byles, J., in Baxendale v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, 30 L. T. Rep. 320; 4 C. B., N. S., 84; and per Willes, J., in Bramley v. South-Eastern Railway Company, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 459; 12 C. B., N. S., 75.) But when railways came into operation, and it was found that they practically superseded all other modes of transit, it became a question for the Legislature how far they would, when granting numerous persons power to make a railway and act as carriers on that line, impose on them restrictions beyond what the common law imposed on ordinary carriers. At first the Legislature in each special Act inserted such clauses as seemed, to the particular committees, reasonable in each case. Very soon there came to be usual clauses which the then chairman of committees of the House of Lords used to require to be inserted in all railway Bills with more or less modification. They were known by his name as "Lord Shaftesbury's clauses." Finally, in 1845, the Legislature embodied in a general Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20) those clauses which it was thought expedient should generally be inserted in Railway Acts. The Act governing the present case is a special Act of the Great Western Railway (10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi.). By the first section of that Act the provisions of the company's previous special Acts (including 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, which had been passed before the General Railways Clauses Act, 1845) are to have the same effect as if they had been repeated or re-enacted in it; and by the second clause the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, is incorporated with it. In the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, was contained an equality clause (one of Lord Shaftesbury's clauses) sect. 50. And in the Railways' Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, is also contained an equality clause (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 9). And it is on the effect of those two sections, taken in conjunction with the 53rd section of 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi., that the rights of the parties in the present case depend. The words of the two sections thus incorporated in 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. are not identical, but I think there is no difference in their meaning. The effect of the 53rd section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. is, I think, so far as relates to parcels not exceeding 500lb. in weight, to take away any limitation as to rates imposed by the special Acts, and to leave the company free to charge what it thinks fit for such parcels, subject, however, to the effect of the proviso for equality contained in the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the similar proviso for equality contained in the former special Act of this company (7 & 8 Vict. c. 3, s. 50). Then comes the question what is the legal effect of this proviso for equality? I think it appears from the preamble of the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, that the Legislature was of opinion that the changed state of things arising from the general use of railways, made it expedient to impose an obligation on railway companies acting as carriers beyond what is imposed on a carrier at common law. And if this be borne in mind, I think the construction of the proviso for equality is clear, and is, that the defendants may, subject to the limitations in their special Acts, charge what they think fit, but not more to one person than they, during the same time, charge to others under the same circumstances. And I think it follows from this, that if the defendants do charge more to one person than they, during the same time, charge to others, the charge is, by virtue of the statute, extortionate. And I think that the rights and remedies of a person made to pay a charge, beyond the limit imposed by the statute on railway companies acting as carriers on their line, must be precisely the same as those of a person made to pay a charge beyond the limit imposed by the common law on ordinary carriers as being more than was reasonable. The mode of establishing that the demand is extortionate differs in the two cases. Where it is sought to prove that the charge is unreasonable, and therefore extortionate, the fact that another was charged less, is only material as evidence for the jury tending to prove that the reasonable charge was the smaller one. Where it is sought to show that the charge is extortionate as being contrary to the statutable obligation to charge equally, it is immaterial whether the charge is reasonable or not, it is enough to show that the company carried for some other person or class of persons at a lower charge during the period throughout which the party complaining was charged more under the like circumstances. One single act of charging a person less on one particular occasion would not, I think, make the higher charge to all others extortionate during all that day, or week, or month, or whatever that period might be. I think it would be necessary to show that there was a practice of carrying for some person, or class of persons, at the lower rate. But a single instance would be evidence to prove this practice; and if followed up by showing that the smaller charge was repeatedly made at intervals over a period of time, the jury would, in the absence of explanation, be justified in drawing, and would probably draw, the inference, that the company during the period carried for others at that lower rate, and consequently that the higher charge was extortionate as being beyond the statutable limit of equality. It would be the very essence of the case to prove that the goods were "of the like description and carried under the like circumstances." But I think that this applies to the description of the goods and the circumstances of the carriage, and not to the trade of a consignor or consignee. The consignor in the present case was what has been called an "intercepting carrier," competing with the defendants in one of the most lucrative branches of their traffic. They would have an intelligible motive for wishing to clog his trade, and I do not see that there would be anything immoral or improper in their doing so by any legal means. But I think that the preamble to the 90th section of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 shows that the Legislature thought it inexpedient that railway companies should use their powers for such a purpose, and that the intention in passing the equality proviso was to prevent their treating such a person worse than others. The weight of authority is, I think, very much in favour of the view I have above expressed. The first case on the subject was that of Parker v. The Great Western Railway Company, 7 M. & G. 253; 13 L. J., N. S., 105, C. P., decided the 12th Feb. 1844. In that case the Court of Common Pleas, consisting of Tindal, C. J., Erskine, Maule, and Cresswell, JJ., had to construe a variety of enactments in the special Acts of the Great Western Railway Company then in force, amongst others the 2 Vict. c. xxvii, s. 24, which was one of Lord Shaftesbury's equality clauses. And in their judgment (ubi sup. p. 288) they say, "From these several enactments it appears clearly to be the intention of the Legislature, that the parties incorporated should be empowered to construct the railway, and hold it as their property, and derive certain profits from it, but that every member of the community should have an equal right to use it on the terms prescribed by the Act, and that the payment to be made for such user, whether under the denomination of rates or tolls, or charges fixed by the company, should be reasonable and equal to all persons without reference to the particular advantage to be derived by any individual or class of individuals from such user." And they proceed to hold that where a higher charge was paid in order to induce the defendants to perform that service which, according to that construction of the statutes, they were bound to perform for the smaller charge, the payment was not to be considered voluntary, and the excess might be recovered back under a count for money had and received. I think it material to call your Lordships' attention to the date of this judgment, the 12th Feb. 1844, as the promoters of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, a Great Western Act, must have been well aware of it, and the Legislature, when framing the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, could not fail to have a knowledge of it. I think that the Legislature must be taken to have known what effect the Court of Common Pleas had given to one of Lord Shaftesbury's equality clauses. This, I think, bears strongly on the construction of 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, s. 50, a Great Western Act; and I also think that, when framing a general code for all railway Acts, the Legislature would not have used similar language unless it was intended to have the same effect. And consequently, I think it is a fair inference that the intention of the Legislature, when passing the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, s. 90, was that all future railway companies should be subject to the restriction which the Court of Common Pleas had decided was imposed on the Great Western Railway. The next cases on the subject were in 1851: (Parker v. Great Western Railway Company, 11 C. B. 545, and Edwards (assignee of Parker) v. The Great Western Railway Company, Id. 588). These actions were by the same plaintiff, but for new causes of action, and under a new enactment, the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, s. 50, having now come into operation. They were brought in the same court, but not before the same judges, who now were Jervis, C. J., Maule, Williams, and Talfourd, JJ. In delivering judgment in Edwards v. The Great Western Railway Company, Jervis, C. J., after reading the words of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 3, s. 50, proceeds (ubi sup. p. 647): "The arbitrator finds that the only difference of circumstances here arises from the fact of Parker being a carrier, and that if the same goods under the same circumstances in other respects had been tendered to the company, they would have carried them for a less sum. The question, therefore, is this: is the fact of Parker being a carrier a different circumstance? or are the goods carried under different circumstances when they are carried for anybody else? Now, looking at the words of the 50th section of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii., I cannot say that they are." And both in Parker v. The Great Western Railway Company, and in Edwards v. The Great Western Railway Company, the plaintiff recovered the overcharge under a count for money had and received. In Crouch v. The Great Northern Railway Company, 9 Exch. 556, in 1854, before the Exchequer, no question arose as to whether an action for money had and received, would lie, the action being for refusing to carry for the plaintiff (a carrier) on the same terms as for the public. This depended upon the construction of the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. Parke, B. said, "The 90th section of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, is not distinguishable from the 50th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. The company are bound to charge all persons, and to convey goods under like circumstances equally. They are at liberty to increase their charges according to the increase of the risk and liability incurred, but they cannot make any difference between individuals. The Court of Common Pleas has already decided the point, and we are bound by their decision." In a second action by the same plaintiff in 1856 (Crouch v. The Great Northern Railway Company, 11 Ex. 742; 26 L. T. Rep. 293), the opinion of the jury was taken whether, as a question of fact, there was any difference in the circumstances between a packed parcel of a carrier containing inclosures for different persons, and a packed parcel containing several inclosures not belonging to a carrier. The jury found

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. SUTTON.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. SUTTON.

there was none, and the Court of Exchequer held that the question was rightly left to the jury, and that the verdict was right. Martin, B. gives what seem to me very satisfactory reasons for this decision. In Piddington v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, 5 C. B., N. S., 111, in 1858, the jury found that there was no additional risk or expense incurred by the company from the packing of parcels. The Court of Common Pleas, consisting on this occasion of Williams, Willes, and Byles, JJ., decided that a charge of double for packed parcels was in violation of the equality clause, and the plaintiff recovered the overcharge under a count for money had and received. Up to this date, as your Lordships will observe, the opinions of all the numerous judges who considered the questions of this sort agreed. In Garton v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, in 1861 (1 B. & S. 112; 30 L. J. 273, Q. B.), the plaintiff sought, amongst other things, to recover the difference between what was charged to him for the carriage of goods and what was charged to other persons for the carriage of similar goods. The Court of Queen's Bench seem to have decided that an action for money had and received would not lie to recover back the unequal charge, unless it was also unreasonable. I was a member of the court which decided that case, but I have no recollection of it, nor can I now state how I came to that conclusion. If we thought that the circumstances were not the same, so that the statutable provision as to equality did not apply, the decision and the reason assigned for it were, I think, quite right. If, as rather appears from the report to be the case, the decision went so far as to say that an action for money had and received would not lie where the overcharge was in breach of the statutable obligation to charge equally as much as if it had been in breach of the common law obligation to charge reasonably, I think the decision was a mistake; and it was overruled, in Baxendale v. The Great Western Railway Company, 16 C. B., N. S., 137; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 814, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber, which comprised three out of the four judges who took part in deciding Garton v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, in the Queen's Bench. In Bramley v. The South-Eastern Railway Company, 12 C. B., N. S., 63; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 458, in 1862, the first difference of opinion arose. The claim there was to recover back the excess of charges made in France for the carriage of goods from France to London. The whole Court of Common Pleas held that the statutable obligation as to equality of charges was confined to the railway in England, and that the common law obligation on a carrier did not require him to charge equally if he charged reasonably. But Erle, C. J., speaking for himself exclusively, questioned all the former decisions. In Baxendale v. The Great Western Railway Company 14 C. B., N. S., 1; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 833, in 1868, the same learned judge gave a very elaborate judgment in favour of defendants on every point. The majority of the Court of Common Pleas gave judgment for the plaintiff, resting that judgment solely on the decisions of courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction expressly in point. This was a perfectly sufficient ground for the decision of the Common Pleas; it ceased to be so when the case was taken by appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber. There, however (16 C. B., N. S., 137; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 814), the former decisions were affirmed. In the case now at your Lordships' Bar, the same learned judge again delivered a dissenting judgment. As far as regards the main question, the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber acted on the authority of Baxendale v. The Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.). There is not any decision in your Lordships' House on the question, and the reason urged by Erle, C. J., must be weighed and considered by your Lordships, as in this House the case can no longer be treated as concluded by authority. It is scarcely necessary to say that I treat the views of Erle, C. J., with great respect, but I cannot but feel that they are based upon an assumption that the railway companies have a moral right to the monopoly of traffic on the lines which they have constructed, and that the Legislature could not intend to deprive the railway companies of the power to throw obstacles in the way of other carriers interfering with this monopoly. I do not think it falls within my province as a judge to inquire whether the Legislature has been politic or not, but for the reasons already given I think it clear that the Legislature did intend this very thing. I now proceed to discuss the particular exceptions in this case. Three of the exceptions are directed to the reception of particular evidence. As to those I have nothing to add to what was said in the judgment of the majority of the Court in the Exchequer Chamber. I think the evidence was all admissible for the reasons there given. Then comes the exception to the direction of the judge that there was evidence on which the jury might find "that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff." The objection to this is, as I understand it, two-fold. First, it is said there was no evidence that the goods were of a like description, inasmuch as the plaintiff's parcels contained enclosures of a miscellaneous character, as might be expected in the case of a carrier, whilst the packed parcels of the wholesale houses probably consisted of enclosures of a less miscellaneous nature, and at all events were not shewn in any case to be identical in their contents with any one packed parcel of the plaintiff; but I think that on looking at the tariff of the company set out in the bill of exceptions, it is obvious that the description of goods on which the defendant imposed the higher charge, was a parcel containing packages of whatever kind, whether miscellaneous or homogeneous; and that if the plaintiff had brought a parcel containing packages exclusively consisting of drapery goods, so as to be identical with one of those sent by Messrs. Morley, he would have been charged the higher price. The defendants are authorised to charge what they please for packages under 500lb. weight, and may make the charge according to any description they like. They choose to say "We will charge the same for a package containing five enclosures and weighing 400lb., as for one containing ten enclosures and weighing 450lb.," and they may do so, but whilst they charge by that description, they must charge all goods coming under that description equally to all. In the present case, they have made the description that of packed parcels, and it is the same whatever be the nature of the packages, in their number, or their weight, at all events the jury might well find so, which is the only question on the record. The next objection is, that the circumstances are not the same. I do not think it can be said as a matter of law that they are the same; but I think the jury might, on this evidence, properly draw the conclusion that they were. I have already intimated to your Lordships my opinion that the circumstances must be those relating to the carriage, not to the consignor, and that the fact that the plaintiff was a rival carrier does not in itself make a difference in the circumstances such as to justify a difference in the charge under the statute; it rather makes against the defendants as supplying a motive for an attempt to evade the statutable provision; but I think there were matters in favour of the defendants which the jury had to consider. Seeing that the plaintiff from the nature of his trade brought all his parcels packed, whilst the wholesale houses brought only about 10 per cent. of theirs packed, it was for the jury to consider whether the failure on the part of the defendants to charge the wholesale houses for their packed parcels were owing to the difficulty of detecting and charging for them or not. I think in the circumstances of the wholesale houses sending nine unpacked parcels along with a packed one, made it so difficult to detect and charge for it, as to make it impracticable so to do; that would be a difference in the circumstances, and I do not by any means say that a verdict for the defendant on that ground would have been wrong; but then it is to be remembered that the defendants had the exclusive means of proving what attempts they had made to try to enforce their tariff against the wholesale houses, and how far they had found it impracticable so to do, and I think the jury might fairly think that there was quite enough proved to call upon the defendants for an answer. I think, therefore, that the judge would not have been justified in directing a verdict for the defendants on this ground. The last exception raises the general question whether the judge was right in directing the jury that "if they believed that the defendants knowingly charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon a packed parcel of goods, they ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff on the issue aforesaid." I still entertain the opinion expressed in the Exchequer Chamber, that it is not open to this exception to raise any question as to the forms of the pleadings, which might have been cured by an amendment. And if, therefore, an action for money had and received would not lie, but some other action would, the exception could not prevail. But it seems to me that the plaintiff's cause of action, if stated at length, would be this: "The defendants being bound by the statute to carry for the plaintiff at the rate not exceeding what they charged to others for goods of the like description under the like circumstances refused so to do unless the plaintiff paid them a larger sum, which the plaintiff under protest was compelled to pay in order to procure them to perform their duty, whereby an action had accrued to him to recover back the excess thus extorted from him." This is merely an expanded count for money had and received. The question, therefore, on this part of the exception seems to me to be whether the statute has this effect, on which I have already expressed my views at length. For these reasons, as already said, I answer your Lordship's question in favour of the plaintiff below. In this opinion my brothers Keating, Pigott, and Lush concur.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. SUTTON.

WILLES, J.—My Lords, I agree with my brothers Blackburn, Keating, Pigott, and Lush, in opinion that judgment ought to have been given in the Exchequer Chamber, as it was given, for the defendants in error, and that a venire de novo ought not to have been awarded. One contention on the part of the railway company, the plaintiffs in error, and probably that upon which they really meant to found their defence, was that the enactments imposing upon them equality of charge (7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, s. 50; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 90) are inapplicable to small parcels not exceeding 500lb. in weight, for which, therefore, they are entitled to make any charge they think fit. This, however, is unsustainable, because those enactments are quite consistent with, and are in terms applicable to, and govern, for the benefit of the public generally, whether carriers or not, the small parcels business. They have been so understood and repeatedly so applied for a long period, and the Legislature has not thought proper to undo what has been the understood doctrine of the courts, well established by decision, that, except so far as juries may find (what they have often negatived) that, in point of fact, carriage for collecting carriers imposes greater risk or expense upon the company, such carriers are entitled to have their packed parcels carried upon the railway for the same price as other persons. This gives no preference to rivals in trade; it only puts the carriers upon an equality with the rest of the public as to the price of the same work done for them by the company. The question what is the meaning of the equality clause when it speaks of things of "like description," conveyed under "the like circumstance" ought, I think, to be answered by saying that things of a "like description," when, although their composition and structure are not "identical," which would be expressed by "the same description," not "like description," they are similar in those qualities which affect the risk and expense of carriage, and that they are conveyed under like circumstances where the route, risk, and expense are, in the opinion of a jury the same, otherwise not. For instance, bags of red wheat and bags of white wheat are of like description, and bags of cotton and bags of jute of like weight and value are of the like description, if there be no dis-severing circumstance proved; but if it were super-added that really one was more risky or troublesome to carry than the other, the jury would hold that the goods were of different descriptions, and bags of silk may be suggested as an instance in which a jury would be sure so to hold. Cattle, which would be more troublesome and more exposed to risk than inanimate things, would be an instance of dissimilarity. So of horses, as less manageable than other cattle, and requiring special precautions. In the absence of a tariff the question ought, I think, to be in fact, whether the sort of thing was like or different for the purposes of carriage, that being the subject dealt with. The railway company might, also, make a distinction between the prices charged to all the world for articles not distinguished in this respect, because of there being great traffic in one, and small in another; as, for instance, in the carriage of coals and in the carriage of culm, from a district in which the one was abundant and the other not so, to such an extent that the former employed a greater number of waggons with a less expensive staff, the price of carriage being proved to depend more upon the wages of the staff than upon the wear and tear of the waggons. There are cases in which custom founded upon convenience makes a distinction such as that between "weight" goods, and "measurement" goods, where so much by weight is charged for the one class and so much by space for the other; and I can conceive it possible that the same goods may be so differently packed as to pass from one class to the other, thus ceasing to be of a like description for the purpose of carriage, though their component articles and the structure of each fibre remain the same. So there may be a good distinction between things specifically charged either by custom or tariff and "miscellaneous" goods. There can be no practical difficulty in marshalling the goods under descriptions, and stating the amount of charge that companies choose to make for carriage upon the railway of specified sorts, and the amount they choose to charge for goods not falling within the specified sorts. In the ordinary case of a railway company's tariff, the company makes this distinction, and gives notice of it to the public; nor can any objection be made so long as the charge does not violate the common law by being unreasonable, or the statute by preferring one person to another. It is a question of fact for a jury whether these limitations have been transgressed. In effect, I think the phrase "like

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. SUTTON.

description" is exhausted upon the goods, and "like circumstances" upon the route, expense, and risk of carriage, and that neither can be extended to the personal qualities of the individual who sends the goods. The direction to the jurors was not absolute to find for the plaintiff, but it was that there was "evidence upon which they might find that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons, containing goods of a like description and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and also upon which they might find that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons, and that if the jury believed that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons, upon a packed parcel of goods, they ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff." I am, therefore, at a loss to see what question of amount of evidence here arises. The defendants, having the opportunity of explanation, offer none. They accept the evidence of the plaintiff as true, and unless it can be affirmed that the question of likeness is not of fact for the jury, and that it is no cause of action upon the equality clause that the defendants charged the plaintiff for the carriage of his goods a sum larger than that which they charged at the same time to other persons in respect of goods which they, knowing that they were of a like description and quantity, carried along the same line under like circumstances as to risk and expense, the learned judge's direction is unexceptionable. As to the formal objections, since the Common Law Procedure Act at least, I think the form of action is out of the question. But I must say I have always understood that when a man pays more than he is bound by law for the performance of a duty, which the law says is owed to him for nothing, or for less than he has paid, there is a compulsion or concussion in respect of which he is entitled to recover the excess by condictio indebiti, or action for money had and received. This is every day's practice as to excess freight. As for the formal exceptions to evidence they fail, because the evidence tendered was either to show a practice that a customer of the defendants had his goods carried by the defendants for less than the plaintiff, as in case of the first exception, or knowledge of the general practice acquired by officers of the company, by whom only they can acquire knowledge, as in the case of the second exception, or general usage of the trade, as in case of the third exception. I do not dwell upon them, because for mere superfluity in the sense of redundancy of evidence, I apprehend no bill of exceptions is maintainable, and also the question whether the evidence was admissible, and whether the summing up was sustainable, is substantially the same. With profound respect, therefore, for the opinion of my brother Bramwell, and reverence which I cannot express in words, for that of the dissenting judge in the Exchequer Chamber, whose opinions, even separately, I far prefer to my own, I must answer that judgment was rightly given in the Common Pleas for the defendant in error.

BRAMWELL, B.—My Lords, the question is, whether there was evidence to go to the jury in support of the plaintiff's case; not a mere scintilla, but such as ought to have been left to them, and on which they might have acted. It is necessary to see what the plaintiff's case was. He did not say that the defendants had no right to charge him the sums they had charged, provided they charged others equally with him, but he said he was charged more than others, who were knowingly and wilfully charged by the defendants less than he was for parcels of the like description carried under the like circumstances as his, and that, that being contrary to the statute and to his prejudice, he had a right of action. No question arises as to the form of pleadings or amount of damages. I think the plaintiff's proposition correct in point of law, viz., that if the charge to the public generally, the ordinary charge, is so much for certain goods, and one person is charged more for goods of a like description and quantity, and under the like circumstances, he has a right of action. In the first place it seems to me that the equality clause applies. By sect. 1 of 10 & 11 Vict. c. cxxvi, all provisions, matters, and things contained in former statutes of the company, unless inconsistent, are to extend to that Act. It may be shown that the equality clause and small parcels clause are not inconsistent, by reading them together, the former as a proviso on the latter. Then if one person is charged more than the ordinary charge the statute is infringed, and being infringed to his prejudice, an action lies. Whether if one was charged less than all others, actions would lie by them, and for how long back, or how many being less charged would give such right of action to others, are questions that do not arise, as it seems to me; for there is evidence that the defendants habitually charged the wholesale houses less for packed parcels than they charged the plaintiff; and though those houses are only four in number, yet as there is no evidence that the defendants received packed parcels from persons other than the wholesale houses and the plaintiff, I think there is evidence that the ordinary rate charged for packed parcels was lower than that charged to the plaintiff. There is also evidence that they did this knowingly, and, as they made no effort to do otherwise, I think there is evidence that they did it wilfully. I am far from saying that the jury ought so to have found, for I do not see how the defendants could help themselves; but I think there was a fragment of evidence for the jury on all these points, though I think their verdict wrong on all; consequently it seems to me that the question is reduced to this, whether there was evidence that the parcels of the plaintiff contained goods of a like description as those of the wholesale houses. I think there was no such evidence. It is necessary first to examine the equality clause. I think the construction of the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii., s. 50, is, that "under the like circumstances" is to be coupled with "conveyed in or propelled," and "passing." The meaning of that section of itself might be doubtful, but it must be the same as 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 90, as to which there can be no doubt. But this seems to me immaterial, for the following reasons:—If these words do not help the defendants, at all events, they do not hurt. Then read the sections with or without them; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 90, recites that the power of varying tolls should not be used for the purpose of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or for the purpose of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly in the hands of the company, or of particular parties. It then gives the power, to vary, with the equality clauses as a proviso, charges on all goods of the same description; and it enacts that no reduction or advance on any such tolls shall be made, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the railway. So 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii., s. 50, in like way says, no reduction or advance on any such charges shall be made partially, either directly or indirectly, in favour of or against any particular company or person. It seems to me impossible to read these clauses without seeing that they were designed to prevent an attempt at monopoly in the company (which is not here the question, and of which there is no evidence), and a preference of one or more, or a distinction to the prejudice of one or more. The words, "and no reduction, &c., shall be made either in favour of or against any particular company or person," seem to suppose that there may be a difference, if it is not in favour or against any particular person, as, for instance, that goods bought from town A. might be charged less than the same description from town B. Suppose town B. were much nearer another railway than town A., might not a difference be made, even though both towns used the same station? It seems to me that such differences could be made. It would not be a breach of the equality clause. See Nicholson v. The Great Western Railway Company, 5 C. B., N. S., 366 and Ransome v. The Great Eastern Railway Company 4 C. B., N. S. 135, 169. It seems to me, therefore, that "under the like circumstances," or some similar expression, is necessarily found in the first part of the equality clause. At all events, there are the words "same or like description or quantity," and any difference is enough to prevent a breach of the proviso against partiality, or favour of or against any particular person. It would be infringed if other packed parcel carriers charged like the wholesale houses, whilst the plaintiff was not. It would be infringed if one wholesale house were charged as the plaintiff is, and the others were not. As it is, it seems to me not infringed. For, what are the facts? The plaintiff is a carrier, and forwards the property of others, never his own. The wholesale houses are not carriers, and principally forward their own goods. The plaintiff forwards all sorts of goods, no doubt principally drapery, but still he does forward all sorts. The wholesale houses do not. All the plaintiff's packages are packed. All those of the wholesale houses are not. According to the evidence of Hill, only 50 to 100 out of 700 to 1000. The plaintiff is paid for what he forwards; the wholesale houses are not. What they do they do for their mutual accommodation, and that of their friends and customers. What the plaintiff does is for profit. How can it be said that the goods the wholesale houses send are of a like description and quantity as those of the plaintiff, or that the circumstances are such that a reduction has been made in favour of the wholesale houses partially, or an advance partially against the plaintiff, within the meaning of the equality clause. These last words show the meaning and intent of the statute. It was to prevent practically the preferences of one person or persons over another or others. Can it be said there is anything of the sort here? Is it supposed that the plaintiff would forward any more goods if the wholesale houses were charged more, or that they would forward less if the plaintiff was charged less? I have said, and I think (though with great doubt), that there was evidence that the ordinary charge of the defendants for packed parcels was that made to the wholesale houses. But suppose it appeared that there were fifty intercepting carriers all charged as the plaintiff is, I should think the defendants would be at liberty to make a difference to the wholesale houses, either in their favour or against them, on account of the difference in the cases. One of the houses is represented to send out 700 to 1000 parcels a day, not all by the defendants' railway, indeed, but probably many; why may not the defendants in favour of such large customers carry a few packed parcels for them without extra charge? It is not done "partially in favour of or against any particular person," within the meaning of the equality clause. It is to be observed that the question is not whether it is reasonable to make a difference in the charge for the plaintiff's parcels and those of the wholesale houses. If there is a difference in the parcel, if it is not of the "like description", if in the circumstances it differs, the defendants have a right to make a difference in the charge. They may make one charge for cast iron, and another for wrought, though they could give no reason why, provided they charge all alike. An argument has been used which, with great submission, seems to me a strange one. It is said that the defendants, by their tariff, have made all packed parcels of a "like description," by putting them under one heading in their tariff. Now, there is no obligation to have or publish a tariff. The one in use may be changed tomorrow, and it would be strange if the only effect of your Lordships' decision was to make the defendants publish a new tariff, with one heading and rate for packed parcels of drapery and books, and another heading and rate for other parcels. Surely the heading of the tariff does not make a hamper with a clock, a ham, and a barometer, &c., of the like description as 100yds. of flannel and 100yds. of calico. The plaintiff's counsel declared that the result of a decision against the plaintiff would be to ruin his trade. It would not. It might compel him to raise his prices to the public, but it would carry into effect the intention of the Legislature—viz., to give to the defendants the profit, or part of the profit, of the carriage of small parcels, which at present is diverted from them. It is in vain to trouble your Lordships with the decision. The present question comes before your Lordships' House for the first time. It is not pretended that it is so settled as not to be capable of a decision in the defendants' favour, to which it seems to me they are entitled.

THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. SUTTON.

July 13.—Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, this is a proceeding in error, upon a judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber affirming a judgment of the Court of Exchequer in favour of the defendant in error. The action was brought to recover from the Great Western Railway Company the sum of 961*l.* 13*s.* 1*d.*, being the amount of the alleged overcharges made upon certain parcels of goods carried on the railway for the plaintiff. The declaration contained common counts for money had and received, and upon an account stated, to which the defendants pleaded never indebted. The material facts upon which the judgment of the court below proceeded, are stated upon the bill of exceptions tendered by the defendants at the trial, and the questions to be determined upon the appeal are: First, whether there was evidence to go to the jury that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons for the carriage of packed parcels of goods? Secondly, whether the judge was right in admitting certain evidence in proof of such different rate of charges? Thirdly, whether, supposing the different rate of charge to the plaintiff and other persons to have been established, an action for money had and received is maintainable to recover back the amount proved to be overcharged to the plaintiff upon packed parcels, by comparison with what was charged to other persons for similar parcels? The plaintiff is a carrier in London, and his principal business is to collect parcels of goods from various wholesale houses, to pack them together in one parcel, and send the parcels so packed by the defendants' railway, to his agents in the country, who unpack and distribute the enclosed parcels of goods to the different persons to whom they are addressed. The carriers of the plaintiff, who convey the parcels to the railway station always take with them a printed form of declaration, with different headings, furnished by the defendants, amongst which are columns for the name and address of the consignee, the description of package and contents, and at the foot of the declaration is the notice that "all parcels of goods and packages, the contents of which are not properly declared by the senders, will be charged with the highest class, and all such parcels of goods and packages not exceeding 500*lb.*

in weight, if the contents shall not be declared, will be considered as each containing different kinds of articles, and each such parcel of goods and packages will accordingly be subject to the regulation relating to 'smalls,' and charged for accordingly. Before the goods leave the plaintiff's office he fills up the different columns of the declaration, except those headed respectively "weight," "paid," and "remarks," and every parcel containing several parcels of different kinds of goods is always described by plaintiff as "packed." The defendants charge for the carriage of goods according to their nature and description, by a tariff headed "Rates from London," "On goods and parcels above 1cwt. and under 500lb. by luggage trains," containing five columns of increasing rates of charge, and a column headed "Class—Packed parcels," stating the charge for them to be "42s. 6d." (being the charge at the fifth, or highest rate) and 50 per cent." All the packed parcels carried for the plaintiff were charged at this rate, which, looking to the plaintiff's parcels only, would be a correct charge. But the ground of the plaintiff's action against defendants is that they have been in the habit of charging the packed parcels of other persons carried by their railway at a lower rate than they charged the packed parcels of the plaintiff, which, he contends, by their Acts of Parliament they have no right to do. For the purpose of proving this difference of charge the plaintiff produced the evidence (which was excepted to) of certain wholesale warehousemen and drapers in London, who were in the habit of inclosing, in one package or hamper, various descriptions of goods, not only for their own customers, but also for the customers of other houses; and he proved that the defendants always charged for the carriage of their packed parcels at the fourth class rate in the tariff, being the rate appropriated to drapery goods, and never charged the extra rate of 50 per cent. on any of their packages. One witness (the clerk of Messrs. Morley, warehousemen) stated that the defendants were perfectly aware of the practice of the house as to packed parcels, but that they could not tell from the outside of any particular parcel whether it was packed or not. The plaintiff also gave evidence (which was excepted to) that in the year 1849, upon an arbitration between another carrier and the defendants, witness proved, in the presence of the defendants, their solicitor, and traffic manager, the practice of houses in London of packing parcels together containing the goods of various persons, and sending them by the defendants' railway, and that the practice of packing parcels had been for the last forty years so general as to be notorious among carriers. Upon this evidence the learned judge directed the jurymen that there was evidence upon which they might find that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons, containing goods of a "like description and under like circumstances," at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff, and also upon which they might find that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff more than other persons; and upon this direction the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. The obligation of the defendants to carry goods "of the like description, and under like circumstances," at the same rate of charge for all persons alike, is imposed upon them by Acts of Parliament relating to their railway. The special Act of the defendants (10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi.) makes all the provisions of the company's previous Acts part of that Act, as if they had been repeated and re-enacted in it; and incorporates with it the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845. By one of the previous Acts of the defendants (7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50) the defendants are empowered to charge for their locomotive, or steam power, and carriages, either per ton, or per mile, or by bulk, measure, number, or admeasurement, or by fixed charges, as they shall think expedient: provided that, in whatever way the charges are made, they shall be made equally to all persons in respect of goods wares, and merchandise, articles, matters, and things, of a like description and quality, and conveyed in, or propelled by, a like carriage or engine, passing over the same portion of, and over the same distance along, the railway, and under the like circumstances. There is a similar provision for equality of charge by railway in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, but a little differently worded. The 90th section of that Act gives power to a company to alter or vary the tolls by the special Act authorised to be taken, "provided that all such tolls be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate, whether per ton, per mile, or otherwise, in respect of all goods in the same description, or conveyed or propelled by a like carriage or engine, passing only over the same portion of the line of railway, under the same circumstances." By the 53rd section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. it is enacted that, notwithstanding the rate of tolls prescribed by the Act for "parcels not exceeding 500lb. each, the company may demand any sum they think fit." Erle, C.J., in Baxendale v. The Great Western Railway Company (14 C. B., N. S., 25; and 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835) said that the incorporating clause of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi. did not, by incorporating former Acts, incorporate therewith the clauses for making equal charges under like circumstances, because, "First, the incorporation of the former Acts is 'only so far as they may be consistent with the clauses of the Act in question;' and a grant of absolute power is inconsistent with a clause which would reduce it to a power restricted by a condition. And, secondly, the equality clause in the former Acts, if they were inserted in the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi., would not affect the power granted by the 53rd section of the latter Act, as the equality clauses in the special Acts relate to the powers of charging granted by those Acts; and the equality clause in the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 20, s. 90 (the general Act) relates to a power of varying charges from time to time, and restricts that power by the condition that it shall be exercised impartially, so as to charge equally under like circumstances." With great respect for the learned judge, I cannot help thinking that the reasoning here employed is erroneous. I will not stop to consider whether a provision that a power given to companies to vary their tolls, provided that at all times the tolls be charged equally to all persons, does not almost necessarily imply that, before the variation, the tolls have been charged equally upon all. But the notion that the clauses for making equal charges are inconsistent with the power given to the defendants by the 53rd section of the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi., to demand any sum they think fit for parcels not exceeding 500lb. appears to me to be unfounded. The learned judge likens it to a grant of absolute power, afterwards restricted by a condition. But the absolute power to demand any sum the defendants think fit is not reduced to a conditional one by requiring that the tolls shall be equally charged to all persons, nor does this even operate as a qualification of the power itself. The power may be exercised at the discretion of the defendants, but charging one person what they think fit, they must charge the same to others. This does not render the power a conditional one, because the condition only attaches after the power had been exercised. It was argued at your Lordships' bar, as it was held by Erle, C. J. (who differed from the other judges in the Exchequer Chamber), that the extra charge for packing, made lawful by the 53rd section of 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi, is not within the 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii, which "authorises charges to be made per ton or per mile, or by bulk, number, or admeasurement, or by fixed charges, and that it cannot be brought within the condition for equality of charge in that section in respect of goods of like description and quantity, as the parcel charge is in part, and may be entirely irrespective both of the description of the goods and of their quantity." But it appears to be too narrow a view of the equality clause, and of the intention of the Legislature in enacting it, to deny its application to the charges made in respect of the carriage of the plaintiff's goods. The enumeration of the different modes in which the defendants may think proper to make their charges for the carriage of goods is evidently intended to cover every case. It is true that the defendants might make an arbitrary charge under the 53rd section, without reference to the description or quantity of the goods. But that is not what they have done. They have charged the plaintiff at the rate of so much per ton, and 50 per cent. in addition. This is, in the first place, a tonnage charge, and it may, perhaps, be considered altogether so, as the 50 per cent. is an addition which depends on the ascertained charge calculated at so much per ton; but, at all events, it must be admitted to be a compound charge at so much per ton, and an additional fixed charge as 50 per cent., and therefore within the express words of the 50th section of 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. The intention of the Legislature was to place all persons having their goods carried by the railway upon an equal footing; and as by the 53rd section of 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi, the defendants may charge what they think fit for small parcels (of course within a reasonable limit), there is the stronger ground for assuming that, in this case more than any other, the obligation of equality of charge to all persons alike would be imposed upon them where an opportunity would be afforded (in the words of the 90th section of the Railways Clauses Act) "of prejudicing or favouring particular parties, or of collusively and unfairly creating a monopoly, either in the hands of the company, or of particular parties." It having been seen that both the equality clause in 7 & 8 Vict. c. iii. s. 50, and in the Railway Clauses Act apply, the question arises, what is the meaning of the words "Goods, &c., of a like description and quantity, and conveyed along the railway, and under the like circumstances," in the private Act, and the words "goods of the same description" and "under the same circumstances," in the Railway Clauses Act. It is extremely difficult to understand exactly what the Legislature meant by goods of "a like description," and even by the words "of the same description," though at first sight more capable of interpretation, because the word "same" is constantly used in popular language for "similar." It seems to me that the words "same" and "like" have not different meanings in the two Acts, and that the words must be used, not with reference to the contents of parcels, which the defendants have no means of knowing, but to the parcels themselves, "whether" (as Willes, J., said in answer to your Lordships' question to the judges), "they were like or different for the purpose of carriage." I have felt greater difficulty in ascertaining the meaning of the words "under the same" or "under like circumstances." I do not see, however, how they can relate to anything else than the conveyance of the goods. To say that because the plaintiff is (what has been called) an intercepting carrier, and the other persons using the railway are wholesale dealers, therefore, the goods are not conveyed along the railway under the like circumstances, is an application of the words which I am not able to comprehend. At the trial the learned judge directed the jury "that the evidence given on the part of the plaintiff was evidence upon which they might find that parcels had been carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff." But he gave the jurors no assistance as to the meaning of the words themselves. His direction, therefore, was imperfect, but I understood it to have been agreed upon the arguments at your Lordships' bar, that no objection was to be made to it in this respect, even if any such objection would have been within the exceptions. The exception to the direction of the learned judge to the jury turned entirely upon the insufficiency of the evidence to establish the plaintiff's case. The counsel for the defendants contended that the learned judge ought to have directed the jury "that there was no evidence that parcels were carried by the defendants for other persons containing goods of a like description, and under like circumstances, at a less rate than such goods were carried by them for the plaintiff," and that "there was no evidence of the specific contents of any of the plaintiff's parcels from which the jury ought to infer a specific inequality upon any parcels between the rate charged to the plaintiff and to other persons; and that there was no evidence that the defendants knowingly and wilfully charged the plaintiff more than other persons." It is difficult to see how the plaintiff could prove that the defendants had violated the obligation imposed upon them by the Acts of Parliament, otherwise than by the evidence which he produced. If proof of specific inequality in the rate charged to the plaintiff and to other persons upon particular parcels were necessary, it would prevent the possibility of establishing any case of this description against the defendants. It was proved by persons in the employ of the wholesale houses, which are in the habit of sending packed parcels by the railway, that the defendants could not tell from the outside of the parcels whether they were packed or not. Of course, therefore, the plaintiff, could have no knowledge, or means of knowledge of the specific contents of any particular parcel sent from these houses. The only available evidence to establish the plaintiff's case, was the general proof which he gave that the wholesale houses had for years been in the habit of sending packed parcels by the railway, and that the defendants had long known of this practice, and especially that with respect to one of their houses, (that of Messrs. Morley), the defendants were perfectly aware of their habit of sending packed parcels. The plaintiff also proved knowledge brought home to the defendants through their solicitors and traffic manager, by the evidence of witnesses given in their presence, of the practice of houses in London of packing parcels and sending them by the defendants' railways. This evidence was excepted to; but it appears to me that it was properly admitted for the purpose of proving the knowledge of the practice of the wholesale houses in London to pack parcels, which the defendants learnt by the traffic manager, their agent in all matters relating to the traffic. The whole of the foregoing evidence constituted the proper mode of proving that the defendants knowingly and purposely charged the plaintiff at a higher rate than other persons upon packed parcels of goods. It was argued that as the defendants did not and could not know the contents of any particular parcel sent by the wholesale houses, they could not impose upon them the charge of packed parcels. But as the defendants knew perfectly well that it was the constant practice of those houses to send packed parcels, if they desired to obey the Acts of Parliament, and to avoid inequality of charge, they might have given notice that every parcel, the contents of which were not declared, would be treated as a packed parcel, and charged accordingly. This would have compelled the senders of parcels of this description to state what parcel contained enclosures of other persons, and what not. It appears to me to be perfectly clear that specific instances of inequality of charge was unnecessary. If it were, the provisions of the Acts of Parliament might be disregarded with impunity, and injustice might be done by the company's favouring one person and prejudicing another, and the party injured would be wholly without remedy. The last subject to be considered is the form of the action: whether an action for money had and received will lie to recover back overcharges made upon the carriage of the plaintiff's goods, not absolutely, but relatively, to the charges made to other persons. It was argued for the defendants that the charge upon the plaintiff's packed parcels being warranted by the 10 & 11 Vict. c. ccxxvi., and being reasonable, and within the absolute discretion of the company, the plaintiff was not injured by other persons being charged less than he was. But this is a fallacious way of viewing the question. The plaintiff's complaint is not that others are charged less than himself, but that the fact that their having been charged less entitled him to claim the same rate of charge, and that all beyond that rate is overcharge. The very fact of the smaller charge to others is the ground of this complaint of an overcharge to himself.

Now, if the defendants were bound to charge the plaintiff for the carriage of his goods a less sum, and they refused to carry them except upon payment of a greater sum, as he was compelled to pay the amount demanded, and could not otherwise have his goods carried, the case falls within the principles of several decided cases, in which it has been held that money which a party has been wrongfully compelled to pay under circumstances in which he was unable to resist the imposition, may be recovered back in action for money had and received. In the language of the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of Parker v. The Great Western Railway Company, 7 M. & G. 259; 13 L. J., 105, C. P., "the payments made by the plaintiff were not voluntary, but were made in order to induce the company to do that which they were bound to do without them." In another case of Parker v. The Great Western Railway Company, 11 C. B. 545; 21 L. J. 57, C. P.; and in Edwards and another (Assignee of Parker) v. The Great Western Railway Company, 11 C. B. 588; 21 L. J. 62, C. P., the plaintiffs recovered in actions for money had and received overcharges of a similar description to those in the present case. I am unable, from the report of Garton v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 1 B. & S. 112; 30 L. J., 273, Q. B., to understand the ground upon which it was held by the Court of Queen's Bench, whose judgment was delivered by the Lord Chief Justice, that money had and received would not lie to recover back overcharges made in violation of an obligation imposed upon the company by Act of Parliament to charge all persons equally. But in the subsequent case of Baxendale and others v. The Great Western Railway Company, 16 C. B., N. S., 140; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 814, in the Exchequer Chamber, the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, in delivering the judgment of the court, said, "As to the question whether an action for money had and received will lie, which seems to have been one of the numerous points discussed in Parker v. Great Western Railway Company, 6 E. & B. 77, we think that if the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench in that case went the length of holding that it would not, this court ought not to be held bound by it." I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer, is right and ought to be affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY

Reported by T. BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Dec. 10, 1869.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

Re THE SCHEME OF ARRANGEMENT FILED BY THE POTTERIES, SHREWSBURY, AND NORTH WALES RAILWAY COMPANY.

The Railway Companies' Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 127), ss. 5, 7, 9—Scheme—Filing—Enrolment—Restraining proceedings against the Company—Execution—Application to make it available—Debenture-creditor—Judgment-creditor.

After the confirmation and enrolment of a scheme of arrangement by a railway company with their creditors under the provisions of the Railway Companies' Act 1867, the Court of Chancery has no summary jurisdiction under sect. 7 of that Act to restrain any action against the company by creditors, the power given by that section being only an interim power applicable during the period between the filing and the enrolment of the scheme.

Similarly, after the enrolment of a scheme, there is no ground for a creditor coming to the court under sect. 9 of the Act, for leave to make his execution available against the property of the company.

Before the passing of the above Act, M., a debenture creditor of a railway company, whose debt was overdue, recovered judgment in an action against the company for the principal of his debt together with interest and costs of the action. After the passing of the Act the company filed a scheme of arrangement with their creditors. This scheme became binding on the debenture-creditors of the company, the necessary agents under the provisions of the Act having been given to it. The scheme was duly confirmed by the court, and enrolled. The scheme made no provision for the debts of judgment-creditors. After this had been done, the company having regained possession of their property, M. sued out execution against the company upon his judgment, and the sheriff under the writ seized some of the company's rolling stock. The company then moved, under sect. 7 of the Act, for an injunction to restrain the sheriff from continuing in possession of the property which he had seized, and to restrain M. from proceeding further against the company upon his judgment. M. therefore moved, under sect. 9 of the Act, for the leave of the court to make his execution available against the property of the company, notwithstanding the confirmation and enrolment of the scheme. Malins, V.C. granted the injunction asked for by the company, but declined to make any order on M.'s motion.

Upon appeal, held that, there being no jurisdiction under the Act after the enrolment of the scheme, both motions ought to have been refused with costs.

Semble, however, that, inasmuch as a debenture-creditor does not by recovering judgment for his debt cease to be a debenture creditor of the company, if the company had filed a bill they would have been entitled to the injunction.

CHAN.] Re SCHEME OF ARRANGEMENT FILED BY THE POTTERIES, &C., RAILWAY CO. [CHAN.]

Quære as to the correctness of the decision in Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 541; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6.

This was an appeal from a decision of Malins, V.C., which is reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 545. The facts being there stated, it is only necessary now briefly to recapitulate them.

In Feb. 1867, before the passing of the Railway Companies Act 1867, Mr. Minor, who was a debenture-creditor of the above company, and whose debenture debt was overdue, recovered judgment in an action against the company for the principal of his debt, with interest and costs. He sued out execution upon this judgment, and the writ of ca. sa. was placed in the hands of the sheriff, who made a return of nulla bona. After the passing of the above Act the company filed, under its provisions, a scheme of arrangement with their creditors. This scheme made provisions for the satisfaction of the debenture debt of the company, and was assented to by the requisite statutory majority of the debenture-creditors, and thus became binding upon all the debenture-creditors. Mr. Minor, however, did not assent to the scheme. The scheme did not profess to make any provision for payment of the judgment-creditors of the company. The scheme was confirmed by the court, and was enrolled on the 13th July 1869. In Sept. 1869, the company having regained possession of their rolling-stock, Mr. Minor again issued a writ of ca. sa. upon his judgment, and under this writ the sheriff seized certain carriages belonging to the company. The company then gave notice of motion, under sect. 7 of the Act, for an injunction to restrain the sheriff from continuing in possession of the property which he had seized, and to restrain Mr. Minor from further proceeding against the company upon his judgment. Mr. Minor then gave a cross-notice of motion under sect. 9 of the Act, for leave to make his execution available against the property of the company notwithstanding the enrolment of the scheme. The two motions were heard together by the Vice-Chancellor, and his Honour granted the injunction asked for by the company, but refused to make any order on Mr. Minor's motion. Mr. Minor appealed.

Glasse, Q. C. and C. Locock Webb for the appellant, argued that the Act gave no jurisdiction under the circumstances of the present case to grant the injunction. At any rate it was clear from sect. 5 that the proper court to apply to was the court out of which the writ issued. It could not be that the legal rights of a creditor were destroyed when there were no express words in the Act having such an effect. He had, therefore, a right to put the sheriff in possession, and then the Act said that the leave of the court must be obtained to render the execution available. That leave was the very thing which the appellant was now seeking. The rights of the appellant as a judgment-creditor were distinct from his rights as a debenture-creditor, and in the character of judgment-creditor he was not bound by the scheme. He ought, therefore, to have leave to make his execution available against the property of the company. Indeed it was only as a measure of precaution that Mr. Minor gave his notice of motion, as it was really very doubtful whether sects. 7 and 9 of the Act had any application when the scheme had been enrolled. They cited

Re The Cambrian Railway's Scheme, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 278; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 522, 530;

Re The Bristol and North Somerset Railway Company, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 448.

During the argument on behalf of the appellant reference was also made to

Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 541; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 6, where Hatherley, L. C., then Vice-Chancellor, decided that a debenture-creditor of a railway company, recovering judgment against the company for his debenture debt could only hold the fruits of his judgment as a trustee on behalf of himself and all other the debenture holders of the company who were entitled under the company's special Acts to be paid pari passu with himself.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he had always doubted very strongly the correctness of that decision. He could understand a debenture holder being prevented from exercising his legal right; but if it were admitted that he could recover judgment against the company, he could not understand why he should be deprived of the benefit of his judgment. If it were necessary in the present case to decide upon the correctness of Bowen v. The Brecon Railway Company, his Lordship would not like to dispose of the case without the Lord Chancellor. Indeed, he should like the question to be argued before three judges.

Osborne, Q. C. and Dryden, who appeared for the company, were only called upon to argue the question of the jurisdiction under the Act. They contended that sect. 7 applied to all the creditors of the company after the filing of the scheme.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said that he should have been glad to be able to deal with the case as if a bill had been filed by the company; but this it was impossible to do without the appellant's consent. It was necessary, therefore, to consider the question of the jurisdiction given by the Act. It was clear from sects. 4 and 5 that the issuing of execution without the leave of the court, was contemplated by the Act. His Lordship had, however, no doubt what was the extent of the jurisdiction conferred by sects. 7 and 9. The view taken by Lord Cairns of those sections was stated by him in his judgment in Re The Cambrian Railways Scheme (ubi sup.), "I think that the object and meaning of these clauses is sufficiently clear. The company is unable to meet its engagements. The scheme is expected to result in the production of new capital or loans wherewith the engagements may be satisfied. But if, while the scheme is maturing, and the requisite assents are being obtained, the company and its property are torn assunder and destroyed by litigation and execution, the remedy proposed by the scheme will come too late. An interim power must, therefore, be given to the court to stay actions on proper terms, and execution must be made dependent on the leave of the court." From this it was plain that in the opinion of Lord Cairns the power given by those sections to the court was only an interim power. There was no reason why the legal status of the company should be entirely changed by the enrolment of the scheme, but there were very good reasons why the court should have an interim power to restrain proceedings against the company. His Lordship was, therefore, of opinion that the summary jurisdiction given by sect. 7, applied only to the period between the filing and the enrolment of the scheme. After the scheme was enrolled the company must, if it wished to obtain an injunction to restrain proceedings by a creditor, make a case by bill, just as anyone else would have to do. His Lordship was of opinion that sects. 7 and 9 were co-extensive in their operation, both applying to the period between the filing and the enrolment of the scheme. Were it otherwise the consequence would be, that at any time, however long, after the filing of a scheme of arrangement by a railway company, any action whatever against the company could be restrained in this summary way, and it would be necessary to come to this court, under sect. 9 of the Act, for leave to make any process available against the property of the company. His Lordship was satisfied that the intention of the Act was only to give the court an interim power under these two sections, the object being to enable the company to perfect their scheme. The result was that both the motions in this case ought to have been refused with costs, there being no jurisdiction to grant the injunction, and no necessity for obtaining the leave of the court to make the execution available against the company's property. But the company must have an opportunity of filing a bill, and if a bill had been filed, his Lordship would have considered the case a proper one for granting the injunction. A debenture creditor, though he had recovered judgment for his debt, was not the less a debenture creditor, and therefore bound by the scheme. If the mere fact of obtaining judgment for his debenture debt, put an end to his position as a debenture creditor, a scheme of arrangement would never result in anything. To give the company an opportunity of filing a bill, the order of the Vice-Chancellor would be discharged as from the 16th inst. No costs of the appeal would be given.

TICHBORNE v. TICHBORNE.

Contempt of court—Publication tending to influence pending litigation—Apology—Motion to commit—Costs.

While a suit was pending to establish the plaintiff's title to a certain baronetcy and estates, there was published in a daily newspaper an article referring to the plaintiff in a manner tending to excite prejudice against him in the minds of the public. Shortly afterwards, there appeared in the same newspaper an apology in very ample terms, and a disclaimer against any intention to disparage or prejudice the plaintiff's case.

On a motion by the plaintiff to commit the printer and publisher of the newspaper for contempt of court:

Held, that the publication amounted to a contempt, but, inasmuch as it was unintentional, and had been apologised for, the only order would be that the respondent bear his own costs of the motion.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff in the above suit for an order to commit the printer and publisher of the Echo newspaper for contempt of court for allusions made to the plaintiff in an article published in the newspaper on the 1st Feb. 1870. The facts were as follows:

The bill in the suit was filed for the purpose of establishing the plaintiff's right to the Tichborne baronetcy and estates. In June 1868 an order was made directing the bill to be retained on the file of the court for a year, so that the plaintiff might bring an action of ejectment against trustees who were in possession of the estates, and establish his title to them at law. The period for which the bill was so retained was afterwards extended to the last day of Easter Term 1870. In the mean time proceedings had taken place with respect to the ejectment in the Court of Common Pleas, and also in the Probate Court, in both of which courts the proceedings were still pending. Commissions had been issued for taking evidence in the Republic of Chili and in the colonies of Tasmania, New South Wales, and Victoria. These commissions had returned, but the result of the evidence obtained under them had not been fully published. In this state of the proceedings the article complained of appeared in the Echo.

The article was headed "On Double Lives," and, after referring to the publicity in which persons of the nineteenth century lived, and to a case recently tried before the Lord Mayor, in which a person had claimed to be the Queen of England, proceeded as follows:

For the last two or three years London has been speculating on the personal identity of the gentleman calling himself Sir Roger Tichborne; and now while that cause célèbre, though yet unheard, is getting a little stale, and everybody has discussed a thousand times the anecdotes of the dogs, and the locket, and the alleged variation in height, and the supposed imperfect French accent, and the friends who recognised, and the acquaintance who forgot the claimant,—we are kindly furnished with a new and fresh mystery to supply the place of the old. On the present occasion it is not a baronet of ancient race and good estate who has been said to reappear, but "Lord Fitzroy Lennox," son of the fifth Duke of Richmond. Much similarity may be traced, however, between the tales of the two claimants. As the original heir of the Tichbornes was supposed to be lost in a vessel wrecked off the coast of South America, so the scion of the house of Lennox was believed to have perished in the wreck of the President. Here were two drowned young gentlemen of high position; and now we have two claimants assuring us that neither Mr. Tichborne nor Lord Fitzroy was really lost at all. By some happy chance or other they both escaped the destruction of their vessels; but, wonderful to relate, instead of hastening to relieve the despair of their friends, they seized the opportunity so offered of retiring into private life, after the manner of the long-missing Mr. Speke. Sir Roger Tichborne exercised, we are told, during a portion of the interval of his "disappearance" the not very attractive profession of a butcher in Australia, and "Lord Fitzroy Lennox" dates his appeal for public support and friendly recognition from "Albert-cottages, Battersea-rise," a locality hardly suggestive of the usual class of residence for the younger sons of dukes. Truly, if this kind of thing is to go on, we sober Britons shall grow accustomed to seeing among us a whole tribe of masculine Proserpines spending half their days forgotten and unheard of in the gloomy shades of the Antipodes, the other half in the sunshine of Pall Mall, the observed of all observers.

These observations were followed by a review of several historical cases of mistaken identity—among others, that of the Princess Olive—and concluded as follows:

Stories without number might be added; but we leave the subject here, with the conviction that those are happiest and most enviable who lead a life clouded with no "double life," with no such concealment from society, without mystery, and without reproach.

Three days after the appearance of this article, on the application of two gentlemen who called at the office of the Echo, and saw the editor, but who went without the authority or even the knowledge of the plaintiff, the following paragraph was inserted:

In a recent article, entitled "On Double Lives," our allusion to the case of the claimant to the Tichborne baronetcy has been thought offensive, and improperly dealing with a case still before the courts. We disclaim any intention of commenting upon the case, and certainly regret the unintentional use of expressions in any degree susceptible of such an interpretation.

The plaintiff who had seen the article, but had not seen the apology, which was printed among other paragraphs in the centre of the paper, gave instructions to his solicitors to bring the matter before the court, and caused the publisher to be served with notice of this motion.

Greene, Q. C., Karlake, Q. C. (Dr. Tristram with them) in support of the motion, contended that the general effect of the article was to prejudice and disparage the plaintiff's cause. By classing the plaintiff among the persons to whom it referred, as leading "double lives," it covertly stigmatised him as an impostor. Such an insinuation could not but act prejudicially to the plaintiff on the minds of the jurors and witnesses in the case when it came on for trial. It was a clear case of contempt, and as this court was still Dominus litis (the suit being still pending) it was a contempt of this court. With respect to the apology, it had not been inserted in a sufficiently conspicuous position in the paper; but even if it had it did not amount to a retraction, and was totally inadequate to repair the damage which had been attempted to be inflicted by the article. They cited

Daw v. Eley, Ibid, 49;

Littler v. Thomson, 2 Bea. 129.

Jackson for the respondent submitted there was no evidence of any intention to commit an act of contempt of this or any other court. If the insertion of the article amounted to contempt, he repeated the apology which had already been offered. Nothing could be further from the minds either of the editor or the writer than to transgress any rule of the court. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that, considering the highly proper course taken by the publisher of the Echo in apologising for having used expressions which might be taken to interfere with the course of justice, he wished to relieve Mr. Jackson from arguing the question of actual committal for contempt. But the case was this,—the article contained a reference to litigation and contained disparaging comments on one of the parties in reference to the subject matter of the litigation.] If in anything the article was open to complaint, the apology which had been inserted ought to have satisfied any reasonable man. But he contended that the allusions to the plaintiff in the article itself were merely references by way of illustration to a case of great public interest, and were such comments as a writer had a right to make. [The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he considered that any criticism made until a case had been decided was a contempt of court.] To be a contempt of court the criticism must be either of the conduct of the parties, or comments on the proceedings. If the court interfered in the present instance no newspaper writer would be safe in alluding to any matter pending before the court. Now, looking at the facts, could the plaintiff himself doubt that if he had remained in England, leading the life of an English gentleman, with his position and with the career he had open to him, his life would have been far more enviable, and that he would have saved himself and the court an infinity of trouble? The moral that was drawn by the writer, that those are happiest and most enviable whose life is not a double life, or clouded with concealment from society, who live without mystery and without reproach, was one which the court itself must approve. The plaintiff had nothing to complain of, no bias being shown on either side. The contempt, which at most was merely nominal, ought never to have been brought before the court, and the motion having been made, ought to be dismissed with costs. He cited Brook v. Evans, 8 W. Rep. 689.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—The respondent has endeavoured to show, through the ability and ingenuity of his counsel, that the publication in this case is not a contempt of court. That argument has been supported by reference to other cases, in which publications of a very different kind have been held to be contempts of court. All the cases cited, excepting one, which was cited from a report which is not an authority, were gross and aggravated contempts of court, consisting of publications and comments upon the evidence in those cases while they were pending before the courts, before that evidence had even been presented to the courts, and cases of that kind are aggravated contempts of the court. But whatever tends to prejudice a case—whatever matter is published to the world referring to the parties to the litigation and to the subject matter of the litigation in such a way as excites a prejudice, is a contempt of this court. Lord Hardwicke, whose judgment has always been considered as an accurate statement of the view taken by the court upon questions of this kind, speaks in these terms: "Nothing is more incumbent upon courts of justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented, nor is there anything of more pernicious consequence than to prejudice the mind of the public against the persons concerned as parties in a cause, before the cause is finally heard." To my mind the publication in this case tends to prejudice the minds of readers against the plaintiff in the cause. The essay, which is said to be an essay with a moral, has been written with very great ability, and the title of it is "On Double Lives." The substance of the essay refers to various cases of gross and known imposture in times past, and mixed up with a reference to those cases of imposture is a mention of the name of the plaintiff in this cause in a manner which, to my mind is a disparagement of his case, and tends to excite a prejudice against him. No man can read this essay, putting a fair interpretation upon it, without coming to that conclusion. But I do not think it an aggravated contempt of court. I do not think that there is any evidence of an intention to prejudice the public against the plaintiff or to disparage his character. It is obvious from what has been stated in the publication, and from what is known to the world generally of the nature of this case, that it is one which would greatly tempt any person who has applied his mind to the subject of the essay, to think of this case. It is, to my mind, a contempt of court, but not an aggravated contempt, and I must take into consideration the fact that the publisher whom I am now asked to commit to prison for contempt, previous to the hearing of this application (indeed, four days before any service of this notice of motion) published in a subsequent number of the same newspaper an apology in very ample terms. The evidence is that the plaintiff did not know of this until afterwards; but that is a circumstance of very small moment. The fact remains, that the public to whom the article was addressed, and in which comments of this case were made, were informed, by a notice in the paper, that the publication was thought to be offensive to the plaintiff, and that the author and publisher regretted the publication, and disclaimed that there was any intention whatever to disparage or prejudice the plaintiff's case. That is the substance of the evidence, and it is needless to read the terms of the apology. The impression upon my mind is that it was a satisfactory apology, and perhaps if that apology had reached the plaintiff he might have refrained from serving this notice of motion. Upon the whole of the case, considering that there has been that apology, and that that apology has been repeated in this court in very satisfactory terms—very satisfactory to my mind—it seems to me that the case, not being one of aggravated contempt, and the plaintiff having come before the court under these peculiar circumstances, there is no pretence for asking the court to inflict the penalty of imprisonment. The only remaining question is as to the costs of this application, and various considerations affect my mind upon this subject; one is that during the argument it was shown that the course of litigation at present is not in this court, the course of litigation is in fact in a court of law, and the prejudice which this publication is calculated to create in some degree—whatever that degree may be—is one which entirely affects the proceedings in the court of law. I wish to point out the importance of that in this case, because I observe in the order by which this bill was retained for a year on the file of this court there has, from some reason not easily explained, been an omission. The order is not in the usual or common form. It is usual in an order retaining a bill for a year to direct that if the plaintiff does not establish his claim at law within that time, his bill shall stand dismissed. This direction for dismissal has, for some reason I cannot account for, been omitted from this order. There is certainly enough to justify the application to this court, because the bill having been retained for a year it is impossible to say that—the time allowed not having expired—substantially the suit is not pending in this court. Substantially, it is pending, though only pro forma. But I cannot help looking with some suspicion and reluctance at a motion so brought before this court, because the contempt ought to have been brought before the court against which it was committed, and because the case has been, after an apology, pressed very hardly against the publisher. In that state of things I am not disposed to make the publisher pay the costs of the plaintiff, who comes to a court which I think is not the proper forum. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, that it is a contempt which can barely be called a contempt—an unintentional contempt—a contempt apologised for by the publisher before the matter did, or could, come before the court, I think the purposes of justice will be fully answered by leaving the publisher to bear his own costs. The order will therefore be in these terms. The said Horace Voules, the respondent, having disavowed all intention of committing a contempt of this court, and amply expressed his regret at having published anything which in any way could be considered a contempt of this court, the court, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, doth not think fit to make any order other than that the said Horace Voules do bear his own costs upon this application.

CHETHAM v. HOARE.

Ejectment bill—100 years' adverse possession—Statute of Limitations, sect. 26—Concealed fraud.An ejectment bill may be brought in a court of equity in cases where the fraudulent possession is proved.

The 26th section of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), must receive the strictest interpretation; and, therefore, in a case where it appeared that a concealed fraud might with due diligence have been discovered within forty years after the event, but no steps were taken to discover it until long after the expiration of the forty years, it was held that the right of proceeding reserved by that section had been lost.

This was a bill filed by James Chetham, suing in forma pauperis, to recover possession of estates in the counties of Lancaster and York, worth about 500,000*l.*, which had been in the possession of the defendants and their ancestors for upwards of 100 years.

The plaintiff alleged that he was entitled as issue in tail under certain entails created about the middle of the 17th century, and that one William Chetham, an ancestor of the plaintiff, became so entitled in the year 1749, but that one Edward Chetham, taking advantage of William Chetham's absence beyond the seas, then wrongfully entered into the possession of the estates, and, in order to destroy all proof of the legitimate descent of the said William Chetham, mutilated and tampered with the marriage register book belonging to Trinity Church, Salford, so that the plaintiff's ancestors had been prevented from procuring evidence of a marriage which was said to have been celebrated in the year 1724, and which was an important link in their title. That in the year 1868 the plaintiff had, by accident, discovered the concealed fraud, and had then found that the page containing the entry of the marriage in question had been torn out of the register book, and also that in an ancient index book to licensed marriages the page on which an entry of the said marriage had been made, had been pasted or fastened to the opposite page in such a manner as to prevent discovery on any ordinary diligent examination of the book.

There were two demurrers to the bill.

Glasse, Q. C. and Wickens, in support of the first demurrer, said that this bill was founded on the 26th section of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), which enacted that in every case of a concealed fraud the right of any person to bring a suit in equity for the recovery of any land of which he, or any person through whom he claimed, might have been deprived by such fraud, should be deemed to have first accrued at and not before the time at which such fraud should, or with reasonable diligence might, have been discovered. In this case if there had been fraud it might with reasonable diligence have been discovered long ago, and within twenty years after its commission. Also the proceedings for the recovery of the property should have been taken at law and not in equity. They referred to Petrie v. Petrie, 1 Dr. 371.

Cotton, Q. C. and C. Hall, for the second demurrer, were not heard.

Cole, Q. C., O. Morgan, Q. C., and E. S. Ford, in support of the bill, contended that the time allowed by the statute did not commence to run until the year 1868, when the plaintiff had first discovered the fraud which had been so concealed; that repeated attempts to discover the fraud had been made by some of the plaintiff's ancestors, and it was only discovered at last by the plaintiff by mere accident. They referred to Trevelyan v. Charter, 4 L.J., N. S., 209, Ch.; 11 Cl. & Fin. 714;Blair v. Bromley, 2 Ph. 354.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that this was a case of great importance to the public generally, and he desired to express his opinion that there was no doubt whatever that the claim set up by the plaintiff must fail altogether. The bill was to recover possession of certain valuable estates to which the plaintiff said he was entitled as issue in tail under settlements made about the middle of the 17th century, notwithstanding there had been adverse possession for upwards of 100 years. Now the proposition that a title of 100 years could be upset was an alarming proposition, and tended to shake the faith of every one in a long possession of his property. Still if the plaintiff could bring his case within the 26th section of the Statute of Limitations, he would then have a right to recover. By that statute the period of time fixed for giving a person in adverse possession of property a conclusive title against a claimant was twenty years, or, in cases of disability, forty years, unless the claimant could prove a concealed fraud. This was an eject-ment bill, and his opinion was that such a bill could be brought in a court of equity in cases where the fraud was proved; but this 26th section, which in its widest sense would give the right of recovering possession of land upon the ground of fraud, after any number of years, ought to receive the strictest interpretation. A claimant coming after the period allowed by the general law should prove that his case is strictly and literally within the words of the section, which in the case of concealed fraud allowed the time to run from the period when by reasonable diligence the fraud might have been discovered. Now the right of the plaintiff depended solely upon a marriage which was said to have been celebrated in 1724. If that was actually the case, then the property would have gone to the ancestors of the plaintiff under whom he claimed. Owing, however, to the evidence of the marriage having been fraudulently destroyed, the property passed to the ancestors of the defendants. No due diligence, however, was used to discover the alleged fraud till the year 1868, when the plaintiff professed to have made the discovery as stated in the bill. If this fraud had been alleged, as it appeared to have been, within forty years after its commission, there might have been many ways of proving the marriage besides producing the certificate; for instance, common reputation of the parties living together as husband and wife might have been proved. Considering then that the plaintiff's claim rested only on the alleged marriage in 1724, the evidence of which it was said had been fraudulently destroyed, and that this marriage might with due diligence have been proved within forty years after the commission of the fraud, his opinion was that the plaintiff had not brought himself within the 26th section of the statute, and could not sustain his claim. The demurrer to the bill must, therefore, be allowed.

GILLETT v. GANE.

* Misdescription of legatee—Will—Construction.

Devise of an estate to the use of Robert Gillett, the fourth son of G. H. G., in case he should attain twenty-one, but if he should die under that age then to the use of —, the fifth son of the said G. H. G., in case such fifth son should attain twenty-one, but if he should die under that age then to such other son of the said G. H. G., who coming after the said fifth son in birth should first attain twenty-one. Robert Henry Gillett was the third son of G. H. G., and John William Gillett was the fourth son:

Held, that the true effect of the will was to give the estate to Robert Henry, the third son, with a series of executory devises over to the younger sons in succession.

George Gillett, by his will dated 1st Feb. 1859, after devising certain hereditaments to his son the plaintiff, George Henry Gillett, in fee, charged all his freehold estates in the parishes of Biddestone St. Nicholas and Biddestone St. Peter, in the county of Wilts, with the payment of an annuity of 40*l.* to each of his daughters for life, and subject thereto devised the said estates unto Richard Gane and Gabriel Goldney, their heirs and assigns, to the use of the said Richard Gane and Gabriel Goldney, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for the term of twenty-one years from his decease upon the trusts therein declared. The testator then proceeded as follows:

And subject thereto to the use of my son, the said George Henry Gillett, and his assigns for and during his natural life, and from and immediately after his decease, to the use of Robert Gillett, the fourth son of the said George Henry Gillett, his heirs and assigns, for ever, in case he (the said Robert Gillett) shall attain the age of twenty-one years, but if he shall die under that age, then to the use of —, the fifth son of the said George Henry Gillett, his heirs and assigns for ever, in case such fifth son shall attain the age of twenty-one years; but if he shall die under that age, then to such other son of the said George Henry Gillett, who, coming after the said fifth son in birth, shall first attain the age of twenty-one years; and, in default of any such younger son attaining such age of twenty-one years, then to the use of the said George Henry Gillett, his heirs and assigns absolutely.

At the date of the testator's will the plaintiff, George Henry Gillett, had seven sons living. The defendant, Robert Henry Gillett, was the third son of the plaintiff, but claimed to be the person named in the will as "Robert Gillett, the fourth son of the said George Henry Gillett." The defendant John William Gillett was the fourth son of the plaintiff, and claimed to be entitled to the estate given by the testator to "the fourth son of the said George Henry Gillett."

It appeared from the evidence that the testator had originally made a will devising the estates to the first and second sons of George Henry Gillett, but that in consequence of some family quarrel he made the will now in question, excluding them from all interest in the estates. It was also stated in evidence that the testator knew very little of either of the sons Robert Henry Gillett and John William Gillett, and had never shown any reason for preferring the one to the other.

Cotton, Q. C. and Graham Hastings, for Robert Henry Gillett.—The court must here look at the name and not the description of the legatee. It is clear from the will that the testator knew the name of Robert, but did not know the names of the sons coming after Robert; and it is more probable that he would give his property to the son whose name he knew, rather than to the son whose name he did not know. The omission of Robert's second name Henry is immaterial: the person intended to be benefited is therefore certain, and though there may be an apparent ambiguity in reference to the "fifth" son, you must not allow this ambiguity to upset the clear reference to Robert the third son. But we contend that the "fifth" son means the next son to Robert, that is, the fourth. It is clear from the authorities that when the name is accurate, but the description of quality or position is inaccurate, the name prevails. It is a well-known maxim of law that veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis, and we contend that this maxim applies to the present case. They referred to Bernasconi v. Atkinson, 10 Hare, 345.

De Gex, Q. C. and E. Ford, for the defendant John William Gillett.—This is a case in which the description and not the name must prevail. It is clear from the evidence that the testator knew very little of either of the sons. He did not know who the third son was; but whoever he was he was to be excluded, and the property was to go to the fourth son, and so on in regular order of succession. There is nothing to show that the name was more in the testator's mind than the order of birth. The rule, veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis, is not an inflexible rule; and before you can apply it you must show that there is an error of demonstration. We contend that this will shows on the face of it that the description was the ruling idea in the testator's mind, and not the same. They referred to

Lord Camoys v. Blundell, 1 H of L. Cas. 778 ; Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 2 Y. & C. 72.

Feb. 22.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR, after reading the portion of the will above stated, said:—The defendant, Robert Henry Gillett, was the third son of the testator's son, George Henry Gillett, and the defendant, John William Gillett, was the fourth son. The question to be decided was whether Robert Henry or John William took under the devise. No question was raised or could properly be raised as to the right of Robert Henry to take under the name of Robert only, if there was no other difficulty in the way. The real question was whether the testator had mistaken the name or the description of the devisee. If this had been a simple devise to Robert, the fourth son, not followed by limitations over to younger sons of the testator's son, the case would, in his opinion, have been free from difficulty: the maxim Veritas nominis tollit errorem demonstrationis would have applied, and Robert Henry would have taken. The case of Newbolt v. Pryce, 14 Sim. 354, was a distinct authority on that point. In that case there was a bequest to John Newbolt, the second son of William Strangways Newbolt. The second son was Henry Robert, and the third son John Pryce; and Sir L. Shadwell held that John Pryce Newbolt was entitled to the legacy. The strong inclination of the court to adhere to the name rather than to the description of the devisee or legatee was shown by the case of Bernasconi v. Atkinson, 10 Hare, 345, where, under a gift by a testator to his first cousin, Vincent Bernasconi, the son of his late uncle, Peter Bernasconi, the present Lord Chancellor, when Vice-Chancellor, decided that George Vincent Bernasconi, the son of a deceased uncle of the testator named Joseph, took on the ground that the testator was mistaken in the description rather than in the name of the legatee, and also upon evidence that George Vincent Bernasconi frequently visited and dined with the testator, who usually called him Vincent. Adams v. Jones, 9 Hare, 485, was a case in which the description prevailed over the name. The bequest was to Clare Hannah Adams, the wife of Thomas Adams. The wife of Thomas Adams was named Hannah only, but he had an infant daughter, aged two years, whose name was Clare Hannah. The Vice-Chancellor Turner decided that the wife took. [The Vice-Chancellor then read the judgment in that case and continued:] That case had clearly no application to the present, where one son was as likely to be the object of the testator's bounty as the other.* Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 2 Y. & C. 72, which was much relied upon by Mr. De Gex as counsel for the fourth son, was another case in which the description prevailed over the name. There the devise was to Robert Blagrove Bradshaw, the second son of the testator's daughter. Robert Blagrove was in reality the eldest son of the daughter; and it was held by Lord Abinger that the second son took, as well by the intention of the testator, to be collected from the face of the will, to provide for the second son of his daughter, as by the parol evidence of intention which he admitted. In the present case the parol evidence, consisting of the affidavit of the plaintiff, the son of the testator—which was read without objection—showed a motive on the part of the testator for passing over the first and second sons of the plaintiff, but did not show any motive for passing over the third son. Apart, therefore, from any difficulty caused by the subsequent limitations over to “—, the fifth son” of the testator's son, and to the other still younger sons, he thought it quite clear that Robert Henry, the third son, was intended, though the testator had mistakenly called him the fourth son. Although, at the argument of the case, he thought these subsequent limitations over caused some difficulty, upon further consideration he did not think they did. If, as he was bound to conclude, Robert Henry was the son intended to take, and the testator erroneously considered him to be the fourth son, and the intention was that if he died under twenty-one, the estate should go to the next son in order of birth, the same error which led to Robert being called the fourth son would necessarily lead to his brother being called the fifth. The true effect of the will was therefore, in his opinion, to give the estate to Robert Henry, the third son, with a series of executory devises over to the younger sons in succession, if Robert Henry or those succeeding him should die under twenty-one. The result was that as Robert Henry had attained his majority, the absolute fee simple had vested in him and there must be a declaration accordingly. The cases of Doe v. Huthwaite, 3 B. & Ald. 632: and Doe v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 363, which were cited upon the argument, turned upon the admissibility of parol evidence for the purpose of ascertaining the intentions of the testator, and could not, therefore, influence the decision of this case, which he decided without any regard whatever to the parol evidence.

CROXTON v. MAY.

Wife's equity to a settlement—Form of ultimate trust—Spirett v. Willows, L. Rep. 1 Ch. 520; 4 Ch. 507, followed.

In framing the settlement of a fund belonging to a wife in pursuance of her equity to a settlement, the court declares the ultimate trust of the whole fund in default of issue to be in favour of the husband, whether he survive his wife or not.

The plaintiff in this suit was married in April 1861, and in the autumn of the same year she and her husband separated, owing to unavoidable circumstances, and through no fault of either party, and have lived apart ever since. In 1863, the plaintiff was left a legacy of 1000*l.*, the interest on which was regularly paid to her by the executor of the will until the 26th Dec. 1867, when the husband claimed the legacy.

The plaintiff then filed her bill against the executor and her husband, praying that the 1000*l.* might be settled on herself. The question was, whether in the settlement the ultimate trust should be for the husband whether he survived his wife or not, or whether his ultimate interest was contingent on his surviving his wife.

De Gex, Q. C. and A. G. Marten, for the plaintiff, cited Carter v. Taggart, 1 De G. M. & G. 286, in which case the Lords Justices said that they were of opinion that the provision in the settlement giving the capital to the lady, in the event of there being no children and her surviving her husband, was right.

E. E. Kay, Q. C., Shaw, and G. N. Colt, for the defendant, the husband, contended that the case of Carter v. Taggart had been overruled by Spirett v. Willows, L. Rep. 1 Ch. 520.

followed in Watson v. Marshall, 17 Beav. 363; in Ward v. Yates, 1 Dr. & Sm. 80; and in Re Suggitt's Trusts, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 215.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said.—In this case I am of opinion that the proper form of settlement to be made is that which was adopted in Spirett v. Willows. The principle of the court seems to me to have been accurately expressed by Lord Cairns in Re Suggitt's Trusts, where his Lordship says:—"Then with respect to the form of the settlement, the principle upon which the court acts is to let in the equity of the wife and children, and to that extent to exclude the husband's marital right; but as soon as that equity is satisfied the provision of the settlement ought to end, and the marital right ought to return." It is said that in the case of Carter v. Taggart there was a deliberate opinion of Parker, V. C. which is inconsistent with this. Parker, V. C. proceeded on his knowledge of the existing practice in the master's office, which was to exclude the husband altogether, and he deliberately affirmed and adopted that practice, going to the extent of absolutely excluding the husband from all right and interest in his own property, which was taken from him for the purpose of making a settlement upon his wife and her children. When that case came before Lord Cranworth he recognised that the fund was the husband's property, and laid down a principle which, I think, would have gone further than the decision of the court in that case, that principle being that the legal right was to prevail as soon as the provisions made for the wife and children had been satisfied, or had failed. But, as it seems to me by a little inaccuracy, he considered that the legal right in a fund of this kind would belong to the husband if he survived, and to the wife if she survived, treating the fund as a fund which had been intercepted by the court, and which the husband had consequently failed to reduce into possession. That seems to me to be very hard upon the husband, his legal right being a right to have everything belonging to the wife, subject to this, that if it be a chose in action he must reduce it into possession during the coverture. That being the husband's right, the court intercepts it, and Lord Cranworth in that case acted upon this view; that that interception by the court was equivalent to the husband not having reduced it into possession. I do not follow that line of reasoning, and I think that the principle laid down by Lord Cranworth in Carter v. Taggart ought to have led to the result which Lord Chelmsford came to in Spirett v. Willows. In Spirett v. Willows, Lord Chelmsford considered the case, it seems to me, in accordance with the true principle, that after you have satisfied the interest of the wife and children the fund ought to go back to the husband, whose property it really was. That case came very recently, in April last, before Wood and Selwyn, L.JJ. The point must have been one which attracted their attention. It is true that the case came before them after it had been dealt with by Chelmsford, L.C., and they must have considered the point settled by the order of Lord Chelmsford. But what they did would certainly have rendered it necessary that they should make some observations upon Lord Chelmsford's decision if they had considered it to be inconsistent with the law of the court, because what they did was without expressing any disapprobation whatever of Lord Chelmsford's order to enlarge the ultimate interest so as to give a greater and more beneficial interest to the assignee who represented the husband in that case. Then it is said that Spirett v. Willows is inconsistent with what was actually done in Re Suggitt's Trusts. In Re Suggitt's Trusts it does not appear to me that there was any argument or any decision upon the ultimate form of the settlement. It seems to have been considered as the legitimate and logical result of the principle which was laid down by Lord Cairns. In my opinion that is not so. I think that the principle laid down by Lord Cairns (which, to my mind, expresses more accurately the principle upon which this court ought to proceed), is, that you ought not to interfere with the marital right more than is necessary to give effect to the equity of the wife and her children—that is to say, the right of the wife and children to have a provision out of the fund. The marital right ought not to be interfered with more than is necessary for that purpose. The logical and proper result of that principle is that the husband is to have the ultimate reversion, subject to the provision for the wife and her children. The equity is not confined to the children of the marriage, but extends to the children of her present or any future marriage. That was, I think, the form in Spirett v. Willows. My opinion on these cases is, that if it be considered that there is a conflict of authority between two judges, constituting the Court of Appeal, then I have to act according to my view of what the rules of law and equity are and ought to be, and my view entirely coincides with the view taken by Lord Chelmsford in Spirett v. Willows.

Practice—Writ of prohibition—Consistorial Court—Jurisdiction.

This court will grant a writ of prohibition out of term to restrain a Consistorial Court from trying the rights to pews in a church, as the courts of common law have no jurisdiction to issue such writs except during term.

This was an application on the part of John Bateman, a person of unsound mind, for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Consistory Court of Llandaff from trying the question, whether the present applicant was entitled to certain pews in Llantrissant Church, to which he laid claim by prescriptive right as appurtenant to a mansion house, of which he was tenant in tail, in the parish of Llantrissant.

This application was rendered necessary by the fact that the churchwardens of the parish of Llantrissant had applied to the Consistorial Court of Llandaff, for a faculty for repairing and repewing the church, and if the intended alteration were carried out it would involve the removal of the pews claimed by John Bateman. This prescriptive right on the part of John Bateman to these pews was pleaded in the Consistorial Courts and traversed by the churchwardens, and it was for the purpose of restraining the Consistorial Court from trying this issue that this writ was applied for.

Cracknall, in support of the motion, referred to Com. Dig. "Prohibition;"

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made the order for the writ to be issued, and remarked that he did so, the matter being urgent, and the courts of common law having no jurisdiction to issue such a writ of prohibition, except during term, otherwise the application should have been made to a court of common law.

Custody of foreign infant—Undertaking of English guardian as to religion—New guardian.

An order appointing two persons who had been named by the adoptive mother of an Italian infant to be her guardians, on an undertaking by their solicitor that the child should be brought up as one of their own, and her religion respected, was discharged, and new guardians appointed on the application of the guardians appointed by the Italian Court on proof of circumstances shewing the undertaking had not been observed.

This was an application to the court on behalf of Sophia Pia Gori Savini, an infant, and a native of Italy, by James Robert Hope Scott, her next friend, for the discharge of an order whereby the Earl and Countess of Dundonald had been appointed guardians of the infant, or that they should be removed from being such guardians, and that Dr. Nobili, the tutor of the infant, appointed by the Pretor's Court at Florence, should have the exclusive right to the custody of the infant, and that proper directions should be given for her return to him in Italy, or in case of her remaining in England, that proper directions should be given for her education as a Roman Catholic, and that the Marchioness of Lothian and James Robert Hope Scott should be appointed guardians of the person of the infant, either alone or jointly with Lord and Lady Dundonald. The plaintiff Sophia Pia Gori Savini was born in Florence on the 5th March 1857, and was the illegitimate daughter of Count Cesare Gori Savini, an Italian. Lady Katherine Fleming, the sister of Lord Dundonald, who was herself a Roman Catholic, adopted this infant and educated her as a Roman Catholic, and the infant had received her first communion in that faith.

Lady Katherine Fleming died on the 25th Aug. 1868, and by her will bequeathed to the infant between 10,000*l.* and 12,000*l.*, and by the same will expressed a wish that the infant should be brought up in the family of Lord Dundonald.

The infant being an illegitimate child of Italian parents was subject to the Pretor's Court and to the Italian Council of Guardianship which it appointed. The guardian appointed by this council was Dr. Ferdinando Nobili.

Negotiations took place between Lord Dundonald's solicitor and Dr. Nobili, which ended in the infant being sent to England, but previous to sending her Dr. Nobili, by the authority of the council, stipulated that the nationality and religion of the infant should be respected.

On the 29th Jan. 1869 Dr. Nobili received a letter from Lord Dundonald's solicitor, in which there was an express promise that the religious belief of the child should not be tampered with.

The infant came to England in May 1869, but instead of being allowed to reside in Lord Dundonald's family, she was sent to a Protestant school at Clapham.

On the 23rd July 1869 a bill was filed, and the infant made a ward of court, and Lord and Lady Dundonald were appointed guardians of her person, and to have the care of her education.

On these facts being discovered the present application was made.

and Lord Dundonald agreed to accept, the guardianship of the infant. No attempt was made to influence the child's mind on controversial religious questions. It is plainly for the benefit of the child that she should remain under Lord and Lady Dundonald's care.

The following cases were cited:—

Colston v. Morris, Jac. Rep. 257.

Kay, Q. C., was not heard in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said—This is a very plain and simple case, and my duty is equally plain and simple. This young lady is an Italian by birth, and the adopted child of an English Roman Catholic lady; her brother Lord Dundonald was not, however, of the same religion. The child was originally brought up in all respects as a Roman Catholic, having been baptized, and confirmed, and having received her first Communion in the Roman Catholic Church, and she is at that time of life at which it is peculiarly advisable that her religious faith should not be shaken. The lady who adopted her expressed an earnest wish to her brother and sister-in-law, both in her life time and by her will, that they should be the adoptive parents of the child, and expressed a hope that the child should be brought up with their own. The child was an Italian subject and was placed under the care of the Italian laws, a council of guardianship being appointed, acting under the jurisdiction of the Italian court. I am bound to respect the rights and authority of that court, as if our position were reversed I should expect the Italian court to respect mine. Communications were opened with Lord and Lady Dundonald; there was clearly nothing in them to affect the child's nationality, and they stipulated that her religion should be respected. As to that a positive engagement in writing was given by the earl through his solicitor that the religious education of the child should receive no prejudice; that engagement was in terms absolutely binding and is in no way altered, qualified, or recalled by anything which took place subsequently. As to what followed there is considerable misunderstanding and misapprehension. A positive undertaking to respect the nationality of the child was required, which was different from that as to her religion. By nationality was meant, recognising the authority of the Italian guardians. Lord Dundonald, by a letter which I believe did reach Florence, refused to pledge himself as to the nationality of the child, but there was nothing in that which interfered with his pledge as to her religion. Very soon after the child arrived in England questions arose, and it is clearly seen that the Italian guardians did not consider that they had abdicated their authority. I am bound, without exercising any authority of my own, to recognise that of the Italian court. They are dissatisfied, and have directed Dr. Nobili to ascertain the circumstances under which the child is living. The dissatisfaction of the Italian authorities has been expressed so early that no laches can be imputed to them or to the Italian guardians. They do not require that the child should be removed to Italy, they only ask that she should be placed under the immediate care of Lady Lothian and Mr. Hope Scott, and to this I am bound to accede. If I were merely dealing with this as the case of an English ward I should be very dissatisfied with what has been done by Lord Dundonald, which is not consistent with his undertaking that the child should be brought up in his own family without prejudice to her religion. What he did was to send the child to a school kept by a Protestant governess, where she was made to go to church and read the scriptures with the other scholars. It is not sufficient to say that no attempt was made to engage the child in controversy; in my opinion she ought never to have been sent to that school. I must therefore comply with the request of the Italian guardians, and order the infant to be delivered to Lady Lothian, and appoint her and Mr. Hope Scott to have the care of her person. The order appointing Lord and Lady Dundonald must be discharged, and Lady Lothian and Mr. Hope Scott must be appointed guardians in this country, without prejudice to the authority of the Italian guardians or the Italian court. The costs of all parties to come out of the infant's estate.

Company—Future calls—Assignment of borrowing powers.

The directors of a company had power by the rules of the company to mortgage, pledge, or charge all the estate and effects of the company.

They assigned the proceeds of a call which they were about to make to meet certain promissory notes coming due.

Held, that the assignment was valid.

Semble, otherwise, if they had assigned all future calls, or all calls for an indefinite period of time.

This was a summons to ascertain whether the Alliance Bank of Liverpool were entitled to certain calls made upon the shareholders of the above company, the amount of which calls was to have been deposited with the Alliance Bank, to await the maturity of certain bills which would shortly become payable to the bank from the company.

It appeared that in August 1869 the company were indebted to the Alliance Bank to the amount of 10,000*l.*

On the 3rd August 1869 the bank wrote a letter to the company and agreed to renew the company's promissory notes for 6000*l.* falling due on the 6th August, and for 4000*l.* falling due on the 31st August, by two promissory notes for 5000*l.* each, at two and four months' date respectively from the 6th August, upon the understanding that a resolution should be passed at the meeting on the 9th August, calling up 5*s.* per share of the company's uncalled share capital. The proceeds of this call were to be deposited with the bank to await the maturity of the notes.

The two promissory notes for 5000*l.* each were signed by two directors on behalf of the company, and deposited with the bank.

A call had been made, and about 3000*l.* paid into the Alliance Bank, when on the 17th Sept. 1869 a resolution was passed to wind-up the company voluntarily, and liquidators were appointed, who gave the shareholders notice to pay what was still unpaid of the last call to them, and not to the bank. The bank asserted that they ought to have their debt paid in full, or at all events, that they should have the entire balance of the call last made, and on petition they obtained an order that the winding-up of the company should be under the supervision of the court. The present application was for the purpose of having the balance due on the call paid to the bank.

E. E. Kay, Q. C. and W. F. Robinson, for the bank, submitted that as the articles of association gave to the directors a power to mortgage, pledge, or charge all the estate and effects of the company, they were clearly acting within their powers when they made this assignment.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that this case was not governed by those in which a company assigned all future calls, or all calls for an indefinite period, or assigned all its estate and effects, and the question has been whether such assignment comprised future calls. The principle decided by those cases was that calls should be made at the discretion of the directors, and an assignment of calls prevented such discretion being exercised; but here the call assigned was one which had been already determined on, so that the discretion of the directors was not interfered with. In fact, there was nothing to distinguish this case from the assignment of the arrears of a call already made. The application of the bank must, therefore, be granted.

NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. THE LOCAL BOARD FOR THE DISTRICT OF LEADGATE (resps.)

Railway rateability—Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 55—"Land used only as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance."

The enactment in sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) that "the occupier of any land . . . used only . . . as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of the net annual value thereof," applies only to land which is still used as a railway, which railway was originally constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance.

Therefore, where a railway was originally constructed over land, without purchase, under contracts to pay way leaves, by a company without any Parliamentary powers, for the purpose of working certain limestone quarries and coal mines, and for the carriage of coals, limestone, and other articles of merchandise, and several years afterwards, under various special Acts, the line of railway became vested in the North-Eastern Railway Company, and was widened, and most of the land over which it ran was purchased, it was Held, that the railway, not having been constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance, did not come within the exemption mentioned in the above section.

This was an appeal by the North-Eastern Railway

Q. B.] NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. LOCAL BOARD FOR DISTRICT OF LEADGATE. [Q. B.]

Company to the quarter sessions of the peace, holden in and for the county of Durham, against an assessment for a general district rate made on the 27th Dec. 1867, by the local board for the district of Leadgate, under the powers of the Local Government Act 1858.

The North-Eastern Railway Company duly gave notice of appeal against the said assessment, and by consent of the parties and by order of Willes, J. the following facts were stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court.

In the year 1834, by deed of settlement dated 3rd Feb. 1834, a company, called the Stanhope and Tyne Railroad Company was established for the purpose of working certain limestone quarries near Stanhope, in the county of Durham, and certain coal mines in the parish of Lanchester, in the same county, called the Pontop and Medomsley Collieries, and for the carriage of coals, limestone, and other articles of merchandise along a railway then in course of formation by the said company, and called the Stanhope and Tyne Railroad. The line of the said railway commenced at certain lime quarries in the parish of Stanhope, and passed through a point called the Carr House at Pontop, and from thence to the River Tyne, in the town of South Shields, the whole length of the line being thirty-five miles, or thereabouts.

In the year 1834 the Stanhope and Tyne Railroad Company completed the construction of their intended railroad, and it was opened for use in the month of September in that year. The company had no powers conferred upon them by Act of Parliament to enable them to construct the railway, and it was not by virtue of any powers conferred by Act of Parliament that the railway was constructed. The land upon which the railway was constructed was not the property of the company, and the company did not obtain by purchase or otherwise the property in the said land, nor had the company any right or title to use the same, except as hereinafter mentioned. The company before and at the time of construction of the railway entered into agreements with the owners of land upon which the railway was constructed, by which agreements in consideration of half-yearly payments made by the company to the said owners, the company obtained leave to use on certain terms and for certain periods the said land for the purposes of the railway. The whole of the said railway was constructed upon lands which the company obtained leave to use by virtue of such agreements, except a portion within the district of Leadgate, which was constructed upon what was then and is used as a public highway.

The Stanhope and Tyne Railroad Company, which, besides the said railway, also constructed staiths with suitable machinery for loading and unloading vessels in the river Tyne, used the said line of railway for the purposes aforesaid, and also for the conveyance of passengers and goods from the month of September 1834, down to the year 1839. In the latter year the said company ceased to use that portion of the said railway which lay between Stanhope and Carr House, being a distance of about eleven miles (herein called "the upper part of the railway"), but down to the year 1842 continued to use that portion of the said railway which lay between Carr House and the river Tyne (herein called "the lower part of the railway").

On the 5th Feb. 1841 the said company having become embarrassed was, under the powers of the said deed of settlement, declared to be and was dissolved, and on the 18th May 1842 an Act of Parliament was passed (5 Vict. sess. 2, c. 27) whereby, after reciting (amongst other things) that it was intended that so much of the said railway as lay between Stanhope and Pontop, being the part herein called "the upper part of the railway," and such other parts of the lands of the Stanhope and Tyne Railroad Company as were not to be used for the purposes of that Act, should be sold, and that it would be of great public and local advantage if the said railway from Pontop and Medomsley to the River Tyne, being the lower part of the railway, with the staiths and works connected therewith, were kept open and regulated under the provisions thereafter contained, but that the aid of Parliament was requisite for effecting those objects. It was enacted (sect. 1) that certain persons should be and they were thereby incorporated by the name of "the Pontop and South Shields Railway Company," and should have power to purchase and hold lands within the restrictions therein contained for the purposes of the said undertaking. By the same Act it was enacted (sect. 6) that immediately after the passing of the Act the said Stanhope and Tyne Railroad, and all works attached thereto, or made or provided for the purposes thereof, or by or for the use of the said Stanhope and Tyne Railway Company and all lands, tenements, hereditaments, easements, powers, and privileges of or to which the said company were seised, possessed, or entitled at law or in equity, should be vested in and belong to the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company for their absolute benefit, but subject to the payment of the several annual and other rents and sums of money, and to the performance of the several covenants and agreements which, by the grants or leases, or agreements for grants or leases, under which the premises respectively were held, were reserved and made payable, and were to be performed, and subject also to such mortgages and other securities for moneys, liens, and charges as were then affecting the premises or any of them at law or in equity, and subject also to certain provisions for indemnity in the said Act contained.

By the said Act (5 Vict. sess. 2, c. 27), it was further enacted (sect. 143), that it should be lawful for the Pontop and South Shields Railway to agree with the owners of the lands over which the said line of railway intended to be carried on by virtue of the said Act passed, or which they were thereafter authorised to purchase for the absolute purchase for a consideration in money of any such lands and all estates or interests in such lands. And it was enacted (sect. 144), that it should be lawful for certain persons under disability to convey such lands as aforesaid to the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company, subject to certain provisions in the said Act contained. And further (sect. 145), that it should be lawful for all persons by the said Act capacitated to sell lands to the said company, and for all other persons, to grant, demise, and lease to the said company, for any term not exceeding ninety-nine years, to take effect in possession, any lands upon or over which the said railway was constructed, or which might be required for the more convenient use thereof, and that such leases might contain all the terms usually inserted in leases of way-leaves in the county of Durham, so that upon every such lease there should be reserved the best and most improved rent to be had for the same, and a condition or power of re-entry in case the rent be unpaid by the space of forty days; and that the said company should execute counterparts of such demises, leases, grants, and enter into such covenants for the paying of the rents reserved, and for regulating the use and enjoyment of the liberties and privileges granted and demised as the persons making such demises, leases, and grants should deem expedient. And by the said Act it was further enacted (sect. 166), that nothing therein contained should authorise or empower the said company to take, use, damage, or prejudice the lands of any person without the licence or authority in writing of the owner and occupier, or other person by law entitled to give or grant such licence or authority first had and obtained.

For the purpose of making provisions respecting the sale of lands purchased or acquired by the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company under the provisions of the said Act, but which should not be required for the purposes thereof, it was by the said Act enacted (s. 165) that the last-mentioned company should sell all such superfluous lands in such manner as they might deem most advantageous, and convey the same to the purchasers thereof by deed under the common seal of the company.

The said Act of 5 Vict. sess. 2, c. 27, contained provisions (ss. 176–185, both inclusive) empowering the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company to levy and demand tolls for (amongst other things) the use of their railway; and by sect. 186 of the same Act it was enacted that neither the said company nor any person using the railway as a carrier should at any time demand or take a greater amount of toll, or make any greater charge for the carriage of passengers or goods than the said company were by the said Act authorised to demand; and that, upon payment of the tolls from time to time demandable, all persons should be entitled to use the railway, with engines and carriages, subject to regulations as therein provided; and by sect. 187 it was enacted that the said company should convey along the said railway all goods, coals, and waggons offered to them for that purpose, and that if the demands made upon them for conveyance were beyond what they had the power of complying with, they should then afford to all companies and persons so applying to them for the conveyance of goods, coals, and waggons equal facilities and advantages in proportion to the trade of such companies or persons to be brought on the said railway; and by s. 248 it was enacted that nothing in the said Act contained should be deemed or construed to exempt the said railway between Pontop and South Shields, being “the lower part of the railway,” from the provisions of any general Act relating to railways which might pass during the then present or any future sessions of Parliament.

On the 23rd May 1844 another Act of Parliament passed (7 Vict. c. 26), whereby the Pontop and South Shields Railway Company did from the year 1842 to the year 1846 keep open and regulate the lower part of the railway and the said staiths and works, and did widen “the lower part of the railway.”

By an Act of Parliament, passed the 3rd Aug. 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 330) it was enacted (sects. 12 and 14) that upon the happening of certain events, and the due execution of a certain deed of conveyance therein mentioned, the said Acts of the 5th and 7th years of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, save and except as thereby otherwise declared, should cease and determine, and that the Pontop and South Shields Railway Company, being “the lower part of the railway,” and the lands, stations, houses, and other buildings, staiths, and conveniences, easements, rights, and appurtenances whatsoever, of or to which the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company were seized, possessed, or entitled at law or in equity, should belong to, and be absolutely vested in, the Newcastle and Darlington Junction Railway Company, and that the undertaking of the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company should thenceforth become and form part of the undertaking of the Newcastle and Darlington Junction Railway, subject, nevertheless, and without prejudice to the several mortgages, charges, and incumbrances which at the time of such vesting should have been upon or effecting the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company, and also subject to the usual rents, conditions, provisions, and agreements under, and subject to which, the said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company held the same.

The said Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 330, contains provisions similar to those contained in the before mentioned Act of 5 Vict., sess. 2, c. 27.

The deed of conveyance mentioned in the said Act of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 330, was duly executed on the 10th Aug. 1849, and in that year the events referred to in the second last paragraph happened.

Under the provisions of the said Act of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 330, and of divers other Acts of Parliament, the name of the Newcastle and Darlington Railways Junction Railway Company was successively changed first to the York and Newcastle Railway Company, and then to the York, Newcastle, and Berwick Railway Company, and lastly to the North Eastern Railway Company, who are the appellants herein, and all the railways, property, estate, and effects which belonged to or were vested in the Newcastle and Darlington Junction Railway Company, either as proprietors or lessees became vested in the appellants.

From the time of the passing of the aforesaid Act of the 5th Vict. sess. 2, c. 27, hitherto, “the lower part of the railway” has been worked and used for public traffic under the provisions of that Act, and the several other Acts hereinbefore mentioned, which relate thereto, and subject to such provisions of the general statutes for regulating railways in England as are applicable thereto.

The said Pontop and South Shields Railway Company before the passing of the Act next hereinafter mentioned, under the provisions of the said Act of 5 Vict. sess. 2, c. 27, sold all their interest in that portion of the line of the Stanhope and Tyne Railway Company hereinafter described as “the upper part of the railway,” and all rights, privileges, and easements to which they were entitled in connection with the said portion of the said railway to Joseph Pease, of Darlington, Esq., and four other persons, and from and after such sale “the upper part of the railway” became and was known as the Wear and Derwent Railway.

On the 22nd July 1847, an Act of Parliament passed (10 & 11 Vict., c. 292) whereby, after reciting (sect. 1) that the said Joseph Pease, of Darlington, Esq., and four other persons were or claimed to be the owners of the said Wear and Derwent Railway, and that it would be convenient if the said Wear and Derwent Railway, and certain other railways in the said Act mentioned, were placed under the management and control of a certain railway company called [the Wear Valley Railway Company, to accept and take for such consideration, either in gross sums of money or annual rents as they should think proper, the said Wear and Derwent Railway, together with the hereditaments and appurtenances belonging thereto or therewith held used, or enjoyed, and all their rights, powers, and privileges in relation thereto or otherwise belonging to them, and that every such lease and purchase of the Wear and Derwent Railway should be valid and effectual during the continuance of such lease, or during the continuance of the present or any future leases of the lands and hereditaments upon and over which the said Wear and Derwent Railway had been constructed for the purpose of enabling the said Wear Valley Railway Company to use and enjoy the line of railway, and to exercise the rights, powers, and privileges of the said owners of the the said Wear and Derwent Railway.

Under the provisions of the said Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 292, and immediately after passing the same, the said Wear and Derwent Railway, and all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments, rights, easements, and appurtenances, of or to which the said owners of the said Wear and Derwent Railway were by any means seised, possessed, or entitled, became and were absolutely vested in the said Wear Valley Railway Company, for such term, estate, and interest, and subject to such terms, conditions, annual or other rents and payments, and to such rights, liberties, powers, and easements, as the same were theretofore vested in the said owners; and the undertaking of the Wear and Derwent Railway thenceforth (subject as in that Act mentioned) became and formed part of the undertaking of the Wear Valley Railway.

By sect. 11 of the last-mentioned Act it was enacted that nothing in the Act should be construed to extend to vest in the said Wear Valley Railway Company any greater estate or interest in the said Wear and Derwent Railway than was at the time of the passing of the now reciting Act, or at the time of the payment of the purchase-money vested in such owners as aforesaid.

Under the provisions of the Wear Valley Railway Act 1845, and of the said Act of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 292, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company became lessees of the Wear Valley Railway, and continued such lessees until and at the time of passing of the Act hereinafter mentioned.

On the 3rd July 1854 the Stockton and Darlington Railway Act 1854 passed, whereby after reciting that the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company were such lessees of the Wear Valley Railway as aforesaid, and that some parts of the Wear Valley Railway, which were originally the Wear and Derwent Railway, and of a certain other railway respectively were held only in way leaves, and it was expedient that the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company should be authorised to purchase or take on lease the lands on which those portions of the Wear Valley Railway were made, it was enacted (sect. 3) that, subject to the provisions of that Act, the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, should be and the same were incorporated with that Act; and by sect. 60 of that Act it was further enacted, subject to the proviso therein contained, that the said Stockton and Darlington Railway Company from time to time might take the lands specified in the schedule B to that Act annexed, or such parts thereof, as they might think fit. Provided always, that unless the Wear Valley Railway Company, by writing under the common seal, otherwise consented, the Stockton and Railway Company should take those lands, subject to the rights affecting the same of the Wear Valley Railway Company.

The lands specified in the schedule (B) annexed to the Stockton and Darlington Railway Act 1854, included (amongst others) the lands on which those portions of the railway belonging to the Wear Valley Railway Company then under lease, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company, which was formerly called the Wear and Derwent Railway, and the works and appurtenances thereof were situate.

On the 23rd July 1858, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Amalgamation Act 1858, passed. Whereby, after reciting the said Act, entitled the Wear Valley Railway Act 1845, and the before-mentioned Act of 10 & 11 Vict. c. 292, those two Acts (ss. 7 & 8) were, except as in the now reciting Act is excepted, repealed, and all the railways and other works and conveniences, lands, building, estate, plant, property, effects, claims, and demands of or to which the Wear Valley Railway Company was seised, possessed, or any way entitled at law or in equity, were, with other railways and works vested in the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company as their original undertaking, subject to the provisions of the said reciting Act, and after the passing of that Act such railways and other works, &c., continue vested as aforesaid in the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company, and until the passing of the Act next herein-after mentioned.

By the North-Eastern and Stockton and Darlington Railways Amalgamation Act 1863, which was passed the 13th July 1863, the Stockton and Darlington Company was, on the passing of that Act, dissolved, and it was thereby enacted (sect. 58) that on such dissolution the undertaking of that company, and all the railways, buildings, lands, easements, works, and conveniences, property, and effects of or to which they were seised, possessed, or entitled at law or in equity, and the benefit of all contracts, agreements, and proceedings in any way relating thereto, and all the estate, right, title, interest, powers, and privileges whatsoever in over and with respect to those premises should be vested in, and belong to, and be held, used, exercised, and enjoyed by the appellants.

From the time of the passing of the said Act of the 22nd July 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 292), hitherto "the upper part of the railway" has been worked and used for public traffic under the provisions of that Act, and several other Acts relating thereto, and subject to such provisions of the general statutes for regulating railways in England as are applicable thereto.

In the year 1866 the Local Government Act was duly applied to and adopted for the district of Leadgate in the county of Durham, and on the 29th Dec. 1867 the local board for that district made an assessment for a general district rate for that district for defraying such expenses as were by the Local Government Act 1858, "charged upon that rate and such other expenses of carrying into execution the said Act in the said district as were not provided for by any other rate, or chargeable upon the district fund after the rate of 6d. in the pound upon the several occupiers and other parties liable by law to be assessed thereto, to commence and be payable on the 31st Dec. 1867.

Parts of "the upper part of the railway" and of "the lower part of the railway," and used only as railways, are within the said district of Leadgate.

In pursuance of the provisions contained in the Acts of Parliament hereinbefore mentioned, the lands upon which "the upper part of the railway" was constructed by virtue of agreements for way-leaves as aforesaid have by various purchases by private contract entered into at divers times with the owners of the said lands, become vested in the appellants. These lands are exclusively used for the purposes of the railway.

Part of the land over which "the lower part of the railway" passes in the district of Leadgate is the property of the appellants. The remainder of such land (with the exception of a portion which forms part of a highway) is held by the appellants under leases or agreements for way leaves, as before mentioned, which have been from time to time renewed, and under which the appellants still pay half-yearly rents for the use thereof.

Since the time when "the upper part of the railway" and "the lower part of the railway" became vested in the Wear Valley Railway Company, and the appellants respectively, as hereinbefore stated, the Wear Valley Railway Company and the Stockton and Darlington Railway Company, and the appellants respectively have expended large sums of money in widening, levelling, repairing and improving the same.

The appellants, before and at the time of the making of the said assessment, possessed and occupied, within the district of Leadgate, houses used as dwelling houses by the railway company's manager and servants, and a warehouse.

Q. B.] NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY v. LOCAL BOARD FOR DISTRICT OF LEADGATE. [Q. B.]

In the said assessments the appellants were assessed, not only in respect of the said houses and warehouses, but also in respect of the said parts of "the upper part of the railway," and of "the lower part of the railway," which are so within the said district of Leadgate, and used only as railways as aforesaid upon the full net annual value thereof. The appellants admitted their liability to be so assessed in respect of the said houses and warehouse, but contended that in respect of the said parts of "the upper part of the railway," and "the lower part of the railway" which are so within the said district of Leadgate, and used only as railways as aforesaid, they are only liable to be assessed in the proportion of one-fourth part only of the nett annual value thereof.

Copies of the following Acts, namely, 5 Vict. c. 27, s. 2; 7 Vict. c. 26; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 330; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 292, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Act 1854, the Stockton and Darlington Railway Amalgamation Act 1858, and the North Eastern and Stockton and Darlington Railway Amalgamation Act 1863, accompanied and formed part of the case; and any Acts recited in them or relating to the several companies hereinbefore mentioned were to be referred to by either the appellants or the respondents.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the appellants were liable to be assessed in respect of those parts of "the upper part of the railway" and of "the lower part of the railway" which are within the said district of Leadgate, and used only as railways as aforesaid upon the full nett annual value thereof, or only in the proportion of one-fourth part of such nett annual value thereof, or in respect of any and what part of those parts. It was agreed that judgment in conformity with the decision of the court, and for such costs as the court might adjudge, should be entered on motion by either party at the session next, or next but one after the decision should be given.

Sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98) enacts—

That the general district rates shall be made and levied upon the occupier of all such kinds of property as by the laws in force for the time being are or may be assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor, and shall be assessed upon the full net annual value of such property ascertained by the rate (if any) for the relief of the poor made next before the making of the assessments under this Act, subject, however, to the following exceptions, regulations, and conditions. . . . The owner of any tithes, or of any tithe commutation, rentcharge, or the occupier of any land used as arable, meadow, or pasture ground only, or as woodlands, market gardens, or nursery grounds, and the occupier of any land covered with water, or used only as a canal or towing path for the same, or as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one-fourth part only of such net annual value thereof.

Mellish, Q.C. (with whom was Kemplay) for the appellants, contended that the appellants' railway came within the exception in sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858, of "land used only as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance." The intention of the Legislature was to exempt from full rateability any land which is de facto used as a public railway; it was never intended to deny the exemption to a railway which is now so used, on the ground only that it was not in the first instance constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament. The possibility of such a case in all probability never occurred to the framers of the Act. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The simple question is whether we can substitute the word "used" for "constructed" in the section.] In order to carry out the obvious intention of the Legislature, the court should give a very liberal construction to the language of the section; but if the court should not feel justified in doing that, then a very narrow construction should be given to it, and the words "as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance," should be taken together as describing merely the manner in which the land is now used. In this sense the land on which the appellants' railway is constructed is at present "used" as, or in the same manner as "a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament," &c. The words "constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament" should be taken to mean simply "used as a public railway," and not as a mere private railway. Whether the railway was originally a private one can make no difference; the ground of exemption from full rateability, which is public convenience, applies to all cases of railways which are now used for public conveyance. From 1847 the upper part of the railway has been used for public traffic, subject to the provisions of the general statutes regulating railways in England. [COCKBURN, C. J.—There seems to be nothing to prevent the appellants, by taking up the rails of this railway and simply putting them down again, making it now a railway "constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament."] It is found as a fact in the case that since the upper and lower parts of the railway became vested in the Wear Valley Railway Company and the appellants, the railway has been widened as well as levelled, improved, and repaired. The governing word in sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858 is, it is submitted, the word "used," meaning now used; and the railway of the appellants consequently comes within the exemption intended to be made.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him G. Bruce) for the respondents.—The court cannot put upon the words of sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858, the construction contended for by the other side without omitting altogether the word "constructed." The exemption from liability to full rating is expressly given only to railways which have been "constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance," which the appellants' railway clearly was not. The words "constructed under" are often found in the General Acts, and are employed as contra-distinguished from "used as" or "used under." In 3 & 4 Vict. c. 97, s. 21, it is enacted that "wherever the word 'railway' is used in this Act it shall be construed to extend to all railways constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament." In the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, s. 1, the word "railway" is for the purposes of that Act defined to include "every station of or belonging to such railway used for the purposes of public traffic;" and the expressions "railway company," "canal company," and "railway and canal company," are defined as including "any person being the owner or lessee of, or any contractor working any railway, or canal, or navigation constructed or carried on under the powers of any Act of Parliament," where the distinction between "constructed" and "carried on" is clearly expressed because intended. The words employed in sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858, are well known to the Legislature, and they must be construed in their plain and obvious sense. The railway of the appellants was originally a private railway, not constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, and the appellants were, therefore, properly assessed in respect of it upon the full net annual value thereof.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I very much regret being obliged in this case to come to a conclusion adverse to the contention of Mr. Mellish, for I cannot suppose that the Legislature intended to make a distinction between a private railway, which has been brought within the provisions of the Act of Parliament and a railway constructed under powers given by an Act of Parliament in the first instance, for that purpose. I regret, therefore, that I cannot in this case, put such a construction on the words used by the Legislature as would meet the equity of this case. I have no doubt that those who passed the statute, if they had this case in their minds, would have made its language different, and would have granted the same exemption from full rateability to such a railway as this, as has been granted to those originally constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament. The difficulty I find in the matter is this. Sect. 55 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 58), provides that the occupier of any land "used only as a railway constructed under the powers of any Act of Parliament for public conveyance, shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of one fourth part only of the net annual value thereof." Now Mr. Mellish asks us to read the words "as a railway" as though the words "constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament" were not there, or to interpret the latter words as if they were "used under the powers of any Act of Parliament," which would be exactly the present case. I do not think, however, that we can reject the word "constructed," and that we must construe the exemption as extending only to land used as a railway which has been constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament, the terms adopted in the section being made use of to show that the land must still be actually used for the purposes of the railway; so that, although the railway may have been originally constructed under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, yet if the land has ceased to be employed for the purpose, and the railway has fallen into disuse, it can no longer claim exemption from full rateability. I think we can read the section only in one way, namely, as referring to land at present in use as a railway, which railway has been constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament. I do not think we should be justified in striking out the word "constructed," or, by altering the language which the Legislature has used, in giving to the section any other interpretation than the one I have mentioned.*

* MELLOR, J.—I have not the least doubt that it was not meant to exclude the case of such a railway as the present from the exemption given by sect. 55 of the Local Government Act, 1858. But I am also bound to say, on reflection, that I think we cannot read the section in the manner which Mr. Mellish desires without neglecting altogether the word "constructed," which the Legislature has inserted in that section. I don't think it was intended to make such a distinction as that which the words of the section raise; still, on consideration, I feel myself unable to put any other construction upon it.

LUSH, J.—I also share in the regret expressed by the other members of the court, because I cannot think it was intended by the Legislature to deprive of the privilege of exemption from full rateability, such a railway as the present. However, I can only collect the intention of the Legislature from the language which it has used, and I cannot read the 55th sect. of the Local Government Act 1858, in any other sense than as prescribing two conditions of this exemption—(1) that the land should be used as a railway, and (2) that the railway should have been constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament. I cannot adopt the view contended for by Mr. Mellish without rejecting or putting a strain upon some of the terms used, a thing which I do not feel justified in doing.

NORBURN v. HILLIAM.

Withdrawal of a juror upon terms—Repudiation of terms—Rehearing the cause—Costs.

An action of trespass commenced in a Superior Court was by order tried before a County Court judge and a jury; in the course of the trial a juror was withdrawn by consent, the parties agreeing to abide by the decision at which the judge might arrive after viewing the premises; before the judge delivered his decision the defendant declined to be bound by it, and the judge, considering he had no power to enforce it, declined to give it:

Held, upon a rule calling upon the County Court judge and the defendant to show cause why the judge should not proceed to give his judgment, or appoint a day for a re-hearing of the cause:

Per Bovill, C. J. and M. Smith, J., that a repudiation by either of the parties of any part of the agreement was a repudiation of the whole, and that the judge should rehear the cause:

Per Brett, J., that the court had not power to interfere, and that the plaintiff's remedy was by action against the defendant upon the agreement entered into between them in the course of the trial.

Costs were granted to the plaintiff, although not asked for in the rule.

This was an action commenced in this court, but sent for trial to the County Court of Northampton. Beasley for the plaintiff had obtained a rule nisi calling upon Francis Ellis McTaggart, Esq., the judge of the County Court of Northampton, holden at Oundle, and the defendant, upon notice of this rule to be given to them or their attorneys, to show cause why the said judge should not proceed to give his judgment in this action, or appoint a day for a rehearing of the said cause.

The following was the affidavit of W. F. Law, the plaintiff's attorney, upon which the rule was granted.

1. The writ in this action was issued on the 28th April 1868.

2. The declaration was delivered on the 28th May 1868, the venue being laid in Northamptonshire, and the first count of the declaration was as follows: "For that the defendant broke and entered a close of the plaintiff, being the site of a wall at Oundle, in the county of Northampton, and abutting on the east side thereof on land of the defendant, and a wall of the plaintiff then standing upon the said close, and broke down and destroyed a part of the said wall, and took and carried away and converted to his own use a great quantity of the materials of the same." And the second count of the said declaration was as follows: "For that the defendant took and broke another close of the plaintiff at Oundle aforesaid, and abutting on the east side thereof on land of the defendant, and stopped up a stench trap of the plaintiffs in and upon the plaintiff's last mentioned close, and erected a fence thereon, and by the said fence prevented the plaintiff from passing along her last mentioned close, whereby the plaintiff was damaged, and her occupation of the said close became of less value to her, and by reason of the said trespasses the plaintiff claimed 100*l.*"

3. The defendant pleaded in the said action on the 17th June 1868 several pleas, namely, 1. Not guilty. 2. To first count not possessed. 3. To second count not possessed. 4. To the whole, liberum tenementum, with an allegation that the stench trap was parcel, &c.

4. On the 22nd June 1868 the replication was delivered, and thereby the plaintiff joined and took issue on the defendant's pleas respectively.

5. On the 5th April 1869 an order was made by the Hon. Mr. Justice Mellor that the issues joined therein should be tried before the judge of the County Court of Northampton, holden at Oundle.

6. Notice was sent by the registrar of the said County Court that the 18th May 1869 was appointed for the trial of the issues joined in this action before the judge of the County Court of Northampton, holden at Oundle, and on the application of the plaintiff a jury was summoned to try such issues.

NORBURN v. HILLIAM.

7. I attended the trial of the said issues at the County Court at Oundle aforesaid on the said 18th May 1869, on the part of the plaintiff, and after the plaintiff's case had been concluded, Francis Ellis McTaggart, Esq., the judge of the said County Court, suggested that a juror should be withdrawn, and that he should take a view of the locus in quo, and decide the matter. To this course both parties assented, and a juror was withdrawn, and both parties subsequently accompanied the said judge upon his view, when he said he would take time to consider, and would give judgment at the next County Court at Oundle, being the court to be holden on the 22nd June last.

8. On the 22nd June last I attended at the said court, and the defendant's attorney also attended, and the said judge then stated that he had rather not give any decision on the matter. I thereupon stated to the said judge on behalf of the plaintiff that I wished to have his judgment; but the defendant's attorney having stated his wish that the said judge should not give his decision on the matter, the said judge thereupon declined to give any judgment.

9. On the 20th July last I attended before the said judge, and in the presence of the attorney for the said defendant I applied to the said judge to reconsider the matter and give his decision thereon, but the said judge refused to do so, or to render me any assistance in the matter; at the same time, stating that in his opinion the judge had no power to make the order for the trial before him, and that the cause ought never to have been sent to him.

The following affidavits were produced in answer to that of the plaintiff's attorney:

I, Francis Ellis McTaggart, judge of the County Court of Northamptonshire, holden at Oundle, make oath and say as follows:

1. I have read the affidavit of the attorney for the above-named plaintiff, sworn on the 15th Nov. last and I say that the statements in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 of the said affidavit are true.

2. The said cause came on for trial before me in the County Court of Oundle on the 18th May 1869, before a jury, the said W. F. Law appearing as attorney for the plaintiff, and R. Richardson as attorney for the defendant. After the plaintiff's case had been concluded, and the defendant's case had been begun, I stated that in my opinion an adjournment would be necessary for the production of certain evidence on both sides before the case could be submitted to the jury. I then stated that, as an adjournment at that stage of the case would be inconvenient and expensive, I was willing, if the parties and their attorneys consented, for the purpose of preventing further litigation and expense, to view the place where the alleged trespasses were said to have been committed (which place was close to the court house), in the presence of the parties and their attorneys, and to give my opinion as to what, if anything, ought to be done by the said parties, or either of them, in respect of the said wall, the said stench-trap and the said fence in the declaration mentioned.

3. It is not true that I offered to decide the matters then in issue between the parties, nor had I any power to decide them, they being then in course of trial before a jury. On the contrary, my offer was made for the purpose of preventing, if possible, the necessity for these matters being decided at all.

4. The attorneys for the said parties (who were I believe also present) thereupon stated that they were willing that I should view the premises and give my opinion as aforesaid, and they further stated that they were willing that their clients should carry out what, if anything, I should advise to be done by them, and were willing that the cause should not be further tried. No further or other agreement of any kind in that behalf was made by them to the best of my knowledge and belief; I then suggested that a juror should be withdrawn by consent of both parties. This was accordingly done, and such withdrawal was duly entered in the minutes of the court.

5. I then proceeded to view the premises in the presence of the parties and their attorneys, and after viewing them stated that I would give my opinion at the next court.

6. At the next court, on the 22nd June last, I was ready and willing to give my opinion as aforesaid, but the defendant's attorney then stated that for reasons which had since arisen, and which he did not state, his client was no longer willing to abide by my opinion. I then said that under the circumstances it would be useless to give it; that it was to be regretted that the cause had not been tried out, but that the plaintiff must now either take out a fresh writ, or with the defendant's consent issue a plaint and try the cause before me in the first instance. The plaintiff's attorney then pressed me to pronounce my opinion, but I declined, giving as my reason that there were no means by which I could compel either party to adopt it.

At the court holden the 20th July last the plaintiff's attorney made the same application, which I again refused for the same reason.

7. I was served by the plaintiff's attorney with a copy of this rule on the 13th day of Dec. last, and I then again stated to him that my only reason for having declined to give such opinion as aforesaid was that the defendant's attorney had stated that his client declined to be bound by

it. And I further stated that if the defendant would now consent to be bound by it I was ready and willing to give it.

The plaintiff's attorney then said that he would see the defendant's attorney, and endeavour to procure such consent.

At the court holden at Oundle, on the 21st day of Dec. last, the plaintiff's attorney informed me that he had been unable to procure such consent.

8. I have always been and am ready and willing to give my opinion, as aforesaid, if the parties will consent to abide by it, and my only reason for not giving it has been and is that, till they do so consent, it is useless for me to give it, inasmuch as I could make no order in the matter or compel either party to do what I might advise to be done.

9. I stated at the time of the trial that the order under which the cause was sent down for trial did not sufficiently show in the face of it that the cause was so sent down under the County Courts Amendments Act, 1867, under which only it could be and I presume was sent; but it is not true that I stated then or at any time that the case was one which could not be or ought not to be sent down for trial before me, I did in fact, as I have stated, hear the said cause until a juror was withdrawn by consent, as hereinbefore mentioned.

I, Robert Richardson, of Oundle, in the county of Northampton, gentleman, the attorney in this cause for the above-named defendant, make oath, and say as follows:—

1. That I have read the affidavit of the attorney for the plaintiff in this action, sworn on the 15th Nov. last, and filed and used for obtaining the rule nisi in this cause.

2. That the trial of the issues joined in this cause having been sent down from this honourable court to the County Court at Oundle for trial, the same came on for hearing at the said County Court on the 18th May 1869, before Francis Ellis McTaggart, Esq., the judge, and a jury, when the said Mr. Law appeared as the attorney for the said plaintiff, and I as the attorney for the said defendant; and after the case on behalf of the plaintiff was concluded, and some evidence had been given on behalf of the defendant, the judge intimated his opinion that an adjournment would be necessary for the purpose of some further evidence being adduced.

3. The judge then stated that if instead of the trouble of having an adjournment he could act as mediator between the parties (they being close neighbours), or adopt any other suggestion by which further proceedings could be put an end to, he would be happy to do so: to which offer both parties (who were then present in court) and their attorneys agreed, and expressed their desire that the judge would proceed with them at once for the purpose of inspecting the premises, the subject of the present action, such premises being almost close to the court-house. He consented to do, and did so, a juror having first, by consent of both parties been withdrawn at the judge's suggestion, and such withdrawal having by consent been entered on the minutes of the court. The judge then said that if it was the wish of both parties, he would at or previously to the holding of the next court state his opinion as to what (if any) alteration should be made by the plaintiff or defendant to the building the subject of this action.

4. That I was present at the next court held on the 22nd June 1869, when Mr. Law, as the plaintiff's attorney, made an application to the said judge to state his opinion as to what should be done in this case, when I stated that in consequence of some information my client had obtained since the day of the trial (or words to that effect), he then declined to be bound by any decision which might be come to by the said judge, and the judge then said, as he had only consented to suggest to the said parties what (if any) steps should be taken by either plaintiff or defendant, and as it appeared that both parties were not then willing to abide by his suggestion, he had no further power or right to interfere, and that he must leave the parties to take any further proceedings or not, as they might be advised or think proper to do.

5. And I further say that the said judge was not appointed arbitrator to settle the differences between the said parties in this cause, and that my client, the said defendant, on the same day that the said cause had been partly heard, and almost immediately after the said judge had viewed the locus in quo, stated to me his determination not to be bound by any suggestion which the judge should make in the matter, and I accordingly, at the court held on the 22nd June last objected on the defendant's behalf, as stated in the fourth paragraph of this my affidavit.

The Attorney-General and Archibald showed cause against the rule on behalf of the County Court Judge, and relied upon his affidavit and the case of Gibbs v. Ralph, 14 M. & W. 804, in which the court stayed proceedings in an action for the same cause as that of another action in which a juror had been withdrawn by consent. Pollock, C.B., said, "It must be taken as a positive rule of practice that when the parties to a cause agree to withdraw a juror, that puts a final end to the litigation between them, and no future action can be brought for the same cause." There was, therefore, no means by which the Judge could enforce his decision, and he was right to refuse to give it.

Grantham showed cause for the defendant. The judge can give no decision by which he can compel the defendant to abide. The proceedings were absolutely at an end when the juror was withdrawn. Perhaps there may be an action against the defendant upon the breach of the agreement — [BRETT, J.—I think there is]—or the plaintiff may try to obtain a new trial from the County Court Judge; the defendant contends only that this application is for a remedy which is not open to the plaintiff.

Beasley supported the rule. The judge was probably right in believing he had no power to enforce his decision. This application to the court, therefore, is the only remedy open to the plaintiff. The order to remove this case to the County Court must have been made under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 16, and this application is rightly made to this court. [BRETT, J.—You may take it that the defendant has scandalously broken his agreement; but how can you show that the action is not at an end, or how have we a right to interfere?] The withdrawal of a juror may be set aside, in consequence of the subsequent conduct of the parties. A new action upon the agreement could only give damages to the plaintiff; it would not determine the merits of the dispute between the parties. This action was not absolutely concluded by the withdrawal of a juror; it was a conditional proceeding, and the condition has been broken. It was said by the court in Everett v. Youells, 3 B. & Ad. 349, that an action was no more ended by discharging the jury than it would have been by withdrawing a juror.

BOVILL, C. J.—No doubt it is the understanding of the Profession that an agreement to withdraw a juror during a trial is the termination of all litigation between the parties, and I should be sorry to interfere with that impression. Here, however, there was not only an agreement to withdraw a juror, but also, as part of the arrangement, it was agreed by both sides that no decision should be given upon the legal rights of the question between them, but the judge undertook to express his opinion of what ought to be done, and the parties agreed to abide by his determination. There was in truth a substitution of one tribunal for another, and the judge was to act as arbitrator upon all matters in dispute. The juror would not have been withdrawn except as part of the whole arrangement. The reason has not been disclosed, but it seems that the defendant thought fit to repudiate that arrangement so far as it related to the submission to the judge's decision; in my opinion the repudiation of a part of such an arrangement must necessarily be held to be a repudiation of the whole. I am further of opinion upon the affidavits that the defendant seems not to have acted in good faith; at all events, there was a failure in carrying out the arrangement agreed to; and upon either party's rescinding, repudiating, or refusing to carry out a part of this arrangement the court cannot enforce any part of it. We are called upon to prevent any such proceeding. If a verdict had been given, and afterwards bad faith had been established, or it were shown that a mistake had been made, the court would clearly have power to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial; here, much rather than in the case of a verdict, it seems to me that the court should interfere. Cases have often occurred in which disputes have taken place about special cases which have been the conditions of verdicts; and when the arrangements have failed from such a cause the courts have frequently upon application granted new trials. Under the circumstances, I have no hesitation in holding that the plaintiff should be placed now in the same position as he was in before the defendant by the repudiation of the agreement, deprived him of his right. Before the agreement to withdraw a juror had been entered into, it was clearly in the power of both parties to bind themselves to submit to the judge's decision, and if it turned out that his decision could not be enforced, there could be no reason why he should not go on with the trial. The judge did not think he had power to do anything; there is no suggestion that he acted improperly; his own affidavit fully explains his reason for refusing to give his order. Mr. Grantham presses upon us to say that the plaintiff must bring his action afresh, but the court will not allow the defendant, by means of bad faith, to put an end to the course adopted by the plaintiff to obtain justice. The application by the plaintiff so far as the judge's proceeding to give judgment, is concerned, fails; but, as the previous trial was abortive, the rule will be absolute so far as it calls upon him to appoint a day for a re-hearing of the cause.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. There is no ground to complain of the judge for not proceeding to judgment. After the arrangement was made the judge became the arbitrator between the parties upon all the matters in difference. He was willing to decide in accordance with that arrangement, but he was prevented by the defendant's refusal to abide by it. The first part of the rule should, I think, be discharged; but the second part requiring the judge to proceed to hear the cause should be made absolute. Beyond question the withdrawal of a juror by consent generally puts an end to a litigated matter, and the court would stay proceedings, not only in that action, but also in another, if the plaintiff should commence one for the same cause; but if an agreement be made to abide by terms upon a verdict or nonsuit, and either party runs away from the terms, the court can say that the whole proceeding is abortive if he will not carry out any part of the terms. Instances may be suggested of the courts setting aside arrangements between parties upon the bad faith of either; e.g., a difficulty in settling a special case. In fact the courts habitually set aside proceedings, and even final judgment, if obtained against good faith. That being so, we may surely exercise our jurisdiction in this case, and say the proceedings ought not to have terminated as they have done. It was entirely against good faith on the defendant's part that the arrangement upon which this settlement was agreed to has been broken through. It is said that the effect merely is the end of this particular action, and another action might be brought; if the agreement to conclude the litigation were pleaded to a new action, and that agreement were overruled on the ground of bad faith so that the new action would not be stopped, I cannot see why we should not now say that the whole agreement was bad. The court ought to permit such a course to be adopted, if by coming to the same decision now which they would adopt by and bye they can save expense and delay to the plaintiff. Mr. Beasley's objection to the action, which it was suggested might be brought upon the agreement itself, seems to me to be a strong one; in such an action damages only could be claimed, and the merits of the question between the parties could not be settled. I think there is a discretionary power in the court which will be properly exercised in this case by setting aside the agreement to withdraw a juror.

BRETT, J.—I am glad the other members of the court have seen their way to adopt the most efficacious remedy for a scandalous breach of faith by the defendant, but I am still of opinion that the defendant has the law on his side. The agreement was to put an end to the cause, and it is not alleged that this agreement was procured by fraud; the universal understanding is, that the withdrawal of a juror is the end of a cause, and when this is done by consent it should be binding upon the parties, and without their consent I think the court has no power to set it aside. The only remedy, as it seems to me, is to bring an action upon the agreement. I think the court has no jurisdiction in the matter, and the rule ought to be discharged.

Rule absolute.

Beasley asked for the costs of the rule against the defendant.

Grantham objected on the ground that there was no application for costs in the rule itself.

BOVILL, C. J.—The defendant is clearly in fault, therefore we make an order against him for costs.

KNOWLES v. BOVILL AND ANOTHER.

Failure of consideration—Money had and received.

The plaintiff was the holder of a licence to use a certain patented invention from the patentee. The patentee intending to apply for a prolongation of this patent, and also for a patent for a new invention of a similar description, the plaintiff agreed to give him 150*l.* for the free use for ever of the former patent, as well as for the free use for three years of the new patent which the patentee was about to take out. The 150*l.* was paid to the patentee, but he died almost immediately afterwards, and in consequence of his death no application was ever made for a renewal of the former patent, or the grant of one for the new invention. The plaintiff brought an action against the patentee's executors to recover back the 150*l.*, on the ground that the consideration for it had totally failed:

Held, that he was entitled to maintain the action on the ground that on the true construction of the contract between the parties he had bought the right to have an application for the patents made, not merely the right to have the benefit of it if it should happen to be made, and the consideration had, therefore wholly failed.

The plaintiff was a mill owner and miller carrying on business at Nuneaton, in the county of Warwick. The defendants were the executors of the late Geo. Hinton Bovill, an engineer and patentee of certain improvements in the manufacture of wheat and other grains into meal and flour. Letters patent bearing date the 5th June 1849, were granted to the said Geo. Hinton Bovill for the said invention for the term of fourteen years from that date.

Afterwards further letters patent bearing date the 6th June 1863, were granted to the said Geo. Hinton Bovill for the extension of the patent for the said invention for the term of five years from and after the expiration of the said original letters patent. In the month of March 1864 the plaintiff purchased from one Thomas Hollick the mill wherein he has since carried on his said business, together with the goodwill and the stock and effects thereof.

Shortly after the plaintiff had purchased the said mill, actions were commenced by the said Geo. H.

Bovill against the said Thomas Hollick and the plaintiff respectively for infringement of the said patent by the user, in the said mill, of certain machinery alleged to be an infringement of the said patent.

The said actions were settled by payment to the said G. H. Bovill of 500*l.*, and by an agreement for the purchase of the right or licence to use the said letters patent at the said mill for the residue of the term of the said letters patent for the sum of 560*l.*, and on the 6th March a deed was executed for the purpose of carrying out the arrangement for a settlement of the said action. On the same day the said 560*l.* was paid to the said G. H. Bovill and a receipt given.

The plaintiff having heard that G. H. Bovill was about to take measures for the purpose of having the said invention protected for a further period, instructed his solicitors, Messrs. Hall and Janion, to communicate with Mr. Bovill on the subject, and they accordingly, on the 15th April 1868, wrote the following letter to the said G. H. Bovill:

Sir,—You may perhaps remember that we had a correspondence with you some time ago, we acting on behalf of Mr. Knowles, relative to an infringement by the late Mr. Hollick of your patent at his mills at Nuneaton. You will also probably recollect that Mr. Hollick paid your claim, and the matter was amicably adjusted. Both Mr. Hollick and Mr. Knowles declined to join in the Millers' Association. We are now informed that it is your intention to apply for an extension of your patent, and though we are given to understand that your application will be opposed, Mr. Knowles wishes us to say on his behalf that he has no wish to be a party to such opposition provided he can make a satisfactory arrangement with you in the event of your patent being renewed, and we should therefore be glad to hear from you on the subject.

A correspondence ensued, and finally the following letter was written by plaintiff's attorney to the said G. H. Bovill:

Dear Sir,—The prevailing opinion of millers in this part of the country is, that you will not succeed in obtaining a renewal of your patent, and having regard to the uncertainty on this point, Mr. Knowles is not disposed to give so much as 250*l.* down, but he will give 150*l.* for the free use of your patent for ever, and of the improvement you contemplate making in it as mentioned in your previous correspondence.

To this letter Mr. Bovill wrote the following answer:—

—In reply to your favour of yesterday, as I do not wish to have any opposition to my prolongation, I will accept Mr. Knowles's offer of 150*l.* for the free use for ever of the 1849 patent for whatever time it may be further prolonged or not prolonged, as well as the free use for three years as mentioned in my letter (say until the 1st May 1871), of the new patent for milling, which I am about to take out as soon I am well enough to return to business.

The plaintiff paid the sum of 150*l.* in accordance with the arrangement contained in the above correspondence, and Mr. Bovill signed the following receipt:—

Received from Mr. John Knowles the sum of 150*l.* for the free use for ever of my existing patents relating to and as applied to corn mills, and also for the free use for the period of three years from the grant thereof of a new patent for milling, which I am about to take out.

The said G. H. Bovill died on the 9th May 1868, a few days after the receipt of the 150*l.*, and in consequence of his illness and subsequent death, neither he nor the defendants, his executors, ever took or have taken any measures for obtaining a prolongation of the said letters patent for a further period, nor did he take out, nor have the defendants ever taken out, the said new patent for milling previously referred to, but the said G. H. Bovill had been engaged from the latter end of the year 1867 up to the time of his last illness and death in perfecting his improvements for which he proposed to take out the new patent.

Upon the death of Mr. Bovill, the plaintiff's attorneys wrote the following letter to his executors:—

eaton, paid the late Mr. Bovill 150*l.* for the free use for ever of the 1849 patent, for whatever time it might be prolonged, as well as the free use for three years of the new patent for milling, Mr. Bovill was about to bring out. Unfortunately Mr. Bovill died a few days after the money was paid, and we suppose no application has been, or will now be made for a prolongation of the 1849 patent, and that our client will lose the benefit of the new patent which Mr. Bovill intended taking out. This being so it appears to us that the consideration in respect of which Mr. Knowles paid the sum of 150*l.* wholly fails, and that Mr. Bovill's executors will not object to repay that sum to Mr. Knowles.

To this letter the defendant's attorneys sent the following answer:—

The executors of Mr. Bovill have handed us your letter of the 28th inst. We do not agree with your construction. Your clients made a bargain for better or worse; if the application had been refused, would you then have claimed a return of the money? There is no covenant nor agreement by Mr. Bovill to apply. The consideration was only partly for the 1849 prolongation if granted, the chief consideration was for another invention of Mr. Bovill's. Had this been secured by him, your client might have received a very large benefit at a very nominal sum and so the right to call on Mr. Bovill for a licence of such new invention, if brought out, was an ample consideration, and of great value. Put the very frequent case of a person taking a licence without a warranty of validity, and the patent being subsequently upset, and that too within a year of the licence, which may, for argument's sake, have been for fourteen years. It has been held, over and over again, that the licensee must continue his payments. He has had all he bargained for. Here Mr. Knowles has had all he bargained for, the right to call upon Mr. Bovill practically to give him for nothing a very valuable right. We see no ground morally or equitably, upon which your client can ask for a rebate or return of the 150*l.* It was clear Mr. Knowles thought the renewal was of a very questionable nature, but he bargained with Mr. Bovill for the 150*l.* to shut out every contingency.

The question for the court was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the return of the 150*l.*

Quain, Q. C., for the plaintiff.—Assuming that by Mr. Bovill's death the obligation to make any application for the extension and grant of the patents was at an end, then clearly there is a total failure of consideration, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover back the money he has paid. It is said that he bought only the chance of the application being made. But both parties must take the chance; there is no reason why the risk should be thrown on plaintiff alone. It must be implied in the contract that if Bovill died, and in consequence no application could be made, then, granting on the one hand that death might excuse from making the application, on the other clearly there must be a return of the purchase-money. The consideration that the matter depends on Bovill's life probably in fact never occurred to the parties, but if an implication is to be made on one side, it must be made also on the other. It may be, as the defendants contend, that if the applications had been made and failed, the plaintiff could not have recovered back his money, but he was entitled, under the contract, to have them made, and as they never were made there is a total failure of consideration.

Appleby v. Myers, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 615; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 595; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 669;

Wright v. Newton, 2 C. M. & R. 124;

Russell v. Ledsam, 14 M. & W. 574.

Garth, Q. C. (with him J. C. Mathew) for defendants.—The plaintiff bought a contingent right, viz., the right to have the benefit of the application if made. If it failed when made, he could not have recovered back the money; what difference does it make that it has failed in another way, viz., by never having been made. He preserved himself by his payment from the possibility of being left without the right to use the patented machinery in case the application were granted. It is clear that the value of a right to use a patent prospectively before it is granted or prolonged, may be very different from that of the right to use it when already granted or prolonged. The plaintiff cannot now turn round and say, "Repay me the price," for he has had what he bought; at any rate there has been no total failure of consideration, and therefore he can have no right to recover what he has paid. Unless there has been a breach by Bovill of his contract, the plaintiff can have no right to recover; and if there had been, his remedy must be by action for that and not to recover the purchase-money.

MARTIN, B.—In my opinion the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. The true test in this case is the question, What did he buy? In my opinion he bought an application for the grant of one patent, and the prolongation of the other. By the contract he was to take the chance of the failure or success of such application. But what he bought was an application. The result is that the consideration in this case wholly fails, because it is admitted such application never was and now never will be made. The law in some cases implies a contract when the parties have not expressly made one. In cases of the total failure of consideration for a simple contract, it implies a contract to repay the money which has been paid for the consideration that has so failed. If I thought Mr. Garth's contention were correct, and that plaintiff only bought the chance whether an application would be made and prove successful, the case might be different, but I do not think that is the true meaning of the contract.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. The plaintiff manifestly paid his money for the right to have an application made for the renewal of the one patent and the granting of the other. It cannot be doubted that if Mr. Bovill had lived and no application had been made, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover his money. From this it is perfectly clear he bought the right to have such application made. In point of fact it was not made. Then why is his claim not well founded? Mr. Garth invokes a rule of law; he claims to read such a contract with a qualification implied by law that Mr. Bovill is only bound to make such application if he lives; he is to be excused by death. Mr. Quain may fairly say then, "I am entitled to add a qualification to that qualification, viz., that if he dies the money shall be returned." I am strongly of opinion that the law ought never to imply terms in a contract unless the justice or necessity of the case obviously and imperatively demands it. But if a party contends that there is such a qualification when the engagement is of a personal character, how can he object to the qualification being qualified as I have pointed out? Can anything be more obviously just and reasonable? Why should the contractor's death be a benefit to his estate, and inflict a loss on the other party? In such a case the court only introduces a term which it is satisfied, not, perhaps, that the parties intended, but that they would have intended if they had contemplated the circumstances which have arisen.

PIGOTT, B.—I am of the same opinion. It is quite clear that the intention of the parties was that there should be an application for these patents, and that such application formed the consideration for the payment of the money. There never was any such application, and consequently the consideration wholly failed.

CLEASBY, B.—It is clear that what plaintiff bought was the chance of Mr. Bovill being successful in his application or not, not the chance of his making it or not; that would have left it in his option to make it or not, whereas it was admitted

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by HENRY F. PURCELL, Esq., Barrister at-Law.

July 1 and 20, 1869.

THE GANGES.

Salvage—Agreement for distribution—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 182—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 18.

By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 182, it is enacted that "every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage, shall be wholly inoperative."

By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 18, the above section is declared not to apply "to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship which, according to the terms of the agreement, is to be employed on salvage service, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship."

Plaintiff, while acting as temporary master of a tug, the property of the G. Y. Tug Company, which carried on a towage and salvage business, rendered services to a vessel in distress, and a certain sum was allotted for the services of the tug. It was the custom of the company to pay a fixed rate of poundage to all their seamen on all sums received for salvage, and the master, for whom plaintiff acted, served under these terms. Of all this plaintiff was aware, and gave no notice to the owners that he was not serving under their usual conditions. He now claimed an apportionment, refusing the allotment of poundage.

Held, that the effect of the above quoted sections was to place agreements of this class on the same footing as they stood before any legislation on the subject, and in nowise to fetter the discretion of the court; and that, under the circumstances of the present case, the custom was not inequitable, and plaintiff was bound by it.

This was an application to the court on behalf of a single salvor for salvage remuneration. He was the temporary master of a steam-tug called the Sailor, of Yarmouth, which rendered salvage services to a large steamer called the Ganges, whilst she was in distress near the Hasborough Sands, and instituted his suit for apportionment of salvage against the owners of the steam-tugs Sailor and Pilot, who were also salvors of the said vessel. The Sailor was a steam-tug of twenty-five tons, and thirty-two horse power, belonging to the Great Yarmouth Standard Steam-tug Company, and was manned by a crew of three men, viz., by the plaintiff as master, an engineer, and a stoker, and during the progress of the services in question, she took on board two extra men. The services of the Sailor began at one o'clock p.m., of Friday, the 23rd Oct. 1868, and lasted till four o'clock p.m., of the Sunday following, and it was admitted in the answer that the services were performed with much difficulty and some risk, and that by means of the said services, and those of other salvors, the Ganges was rescued from a position of great danger.

The other salvors were the tugs Pilot and Andrew Woodhouse, and the Caistor lifeboat, also belonging to Yarmouth. A sum of 2000*l.* was paid by the owners of the Ganges and of her cargo, which was accepted as covering the claims of all the salvors, and the amount due to the Sailor was fixed at 410*l.*

10*s.*, distributable among the owners, master, and crew of that tug, and of this sum 3*l.* 15*s.* was set apart as the portion to be paid to the plaintiff, and was tendered to and refused by him.

Butt, Q. C. and Pritchard for plaintiff.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. and Clarkson for defendants.

The cases and statutes cited, with the arguments, fully appear in the following judgment:

July 20.—Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE (having summarised the facts as above). This sum would certainly, upon the general principles upon which salvage is distributed, be a very inadequate remuneration to the plaintiff, who was the temporary master of the Sailor. This particular allotment, however, is defended upon the ground of special custom and agreement. It appears from the defendants' pleadings, and from the evidence that the Great Yarmouth Steam-tug Company carries on a business with the steam-tugs the Sailor and the Pilot, and two other tugs. This business consists in great part "of rendering salvage services and towage services in the nature of salvage services to vessels in distress; and their tugs are expressly provided and constantly kept up at a great cost with a view to rendering such services, and but for the remuneration obtained for such services, they would be unable to work their tugs at a profit." The secretary of the company, Mr. Freeman, was examined. He explained that they had a business of towing and salvage; and that there were many cases of towage of distressed vessels for which sums under 10*l.* were received; that the simple towage remuneration would not enable the company to keep up their tugs; the masters and crews are allowed by the company 5*l.* per cent. on all towage, and upon salvage where the sum earned was over 5*l.*; besides this, they had their wages, and, when away from port, 1*s.* 6*d.* a day for victualing money. During the fishing season there was a towage of fourteen or fifteen boats a day; each tug had a crew of three men, and one large rope on board; and the company had carried on this business since 1862, during which time only one man had demurred to the system of poundage. It appears, however, that the tugs were laid up for nine months in the year. It appears also from the evidence that the remuneration is the same to each of the crew, however different the degree of merit, and also that the tug or tugs not employed in the service share equally with those that are employed. The plaintiff deposed that he had been master in the service of the defendants for about thirty months, and "for two fourteen months," as he expressed it, he had been master of the Sailor; that he was perfectly aware of the custom of poundage, and had always acquiesced in it; that when he took Butterfield's place as temporary master of the Sailor for a few days he was aware that this custom prevailed, and he gave no notice to the owners that he was not serving upon the ordinary terms of poundage remuneration; he admitted that Butterfield had taken his place when he (the plaintiff) was in the service of the company on the same terms. Some evidence has also been offered to the court tending to prove that the arrangement in question does operate, on the whole, beneficially for the seamen who are employed by this company. Upon the general question as to whether any agreement of this kind shall be maintained I have had considerable doubt. On the one hand, there is a tendency to set aside the principles upon which salvage remuneration is awarded, to remove the stimulus which that principle affords to individual exertion, and to reduce the various degrees of merit which may arise to one dead level. On the other hand, I think I must infer from the evidence before me that one principal object of salvage remuneration is advanced by this agreement, namely, the having in readiness vessels peculiarly fitted for the preservation of life and property, and crews accustomed to the navigation of them. I have considered various cases which have been decided by my predecessors 5 on this subject, viz., The Red Rover, W. Rob. 150; the Margaret Kay, referred to in The Zephyr, 2 W. Rob. 48; and The Beulah, 2 N. of Cas. 64; 1 W. Rob. 477. In the Beulah the words of the judge are remarkable: "I cannot consider myself bound by any arrangement that the owners might make with the mariners, because I apprehend that the latter are entitled to the judgment of this court as to what it thinks equitable, and as to the principles which ought to govern each particular case. At the same time, I must confess that I should be exceedingly reluctant indeed to disturb an arrangement hitherto carried on with satisfaction to all parties, and which, as far as I find, has been productive of nothing but a harmonious result. I cannot lay out of my consideration an important fact which makes a material difference in a case of this kind, namely, that it has been sworn, and not contradicted, that the persons on board these steamers receive their wages whether in sickness or health, and they are therefore in a very different situation, in many important respects, from ordinary mariners. I wish it to be understood that if, unfortunately, any such case as this should occur again, I undoubtedly shall make an exception to any arrangement which has been formed between the parties, not only where there has been great risk, but also where there has been extraordinary labour; but these are the only cases in which I shall do it. Where there is no great risk or extraordinary labour, I shall think it my duty to adhere to the arrangements with respect to quantum which have hitherto been acted upon by the parties." These cases were decided before the enactment of the Merchant Shipping Act, to certain sections of which I will now refer. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), contains the following clause (sect. 182): "Every stipulation by which any seaman consents to abandon any right which he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative." The Enchantress, Lush. 95; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 575, was decided after the passing of this Act. In that case the learned judge said (p. 96, after quoting the 182nd section), "The court has held, and must hold, that not all agreements barring salvage are wholly inoperative, but that agreements limiting the proportion of salvage money are to be maintained only so far as they are really equitable. I am of opinion that the alleged agreement in this case is open to the objection that it is inequitable, and that, even if made, it is not binding upon the plaintiffs." Since this decision the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) has provided as follows, by sect. 18: "It is hereby declared that the 182nd section of the principal Act does not apply to the case of any stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship which, according to the terms of the agreement, is to be employed on salvage service, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by such ship to any other ship or ships." I do not construe these statutes as in any way fettering the discretion of the court upon the subject of these agreements; the joint effect of the two clauses is simply to render such agreements not illegal, and to place them on the same footing on which they stood before any legislation on the subject. This I am glad to find was the opinion of my predecessor in the last case to which I shall refer. The Pride of Canada, in Bro. & Lush. 208, reported more fully in the Mar. Law Cases, vol. 1, p. 406, the circumstances of it were very similar to the present case. Having regard to these circumstances, especially to the facts, that the salvor in this case was perfectly aware he was acting for a person bound by this arrangement which I cannot pronounce upon the evidence before me, to be inequitable; that no extraordinary exertion or peril accompanied the salvage service in this case which was mainly effected by the vessel, I think I shall act in accordance with the principles which have guided my predecessors in this court in pronouncing for the validity of the arrangement in the case now before me. I have considered the argument which has been addressed to me with respect to the apportionment of salvage to this individual under the assumption of the agreement, and I have come to the conclusion that I ought not to interfere with that matter. I pronounce, therefore, against the prayer of the plaintiff, but I shall give no costs.

THE PANAMA.

THE PANAMA.

Bottomry bond—Validity—No notice to owner.

Where a vessel was in distress at Cuba, and it became necessary to have recourse to bottomry, the agents there of the charterers telegraphed to the charterers at Liverpool, and received their authorisation to make the necessary advances on a bond. The owner, however, also resided in Liverpool within the knowledge of the charterers, but he being insolvent they gave him no notice; nor had the master communicated with him, as they also knew. Moreover, they also, being second mortgagees, had not communicated with the first mortgagee, who was close at hand:

Held, that in the absence of notice to the owner, under the circumstances, the bond was invalid.

This was a petition in objection to the registrar's report in a cause of bottomry, brought by Charles Barron and Thomas Harrison, the holders of two bottomry bonds, against the vessel Panama. The owner did not appear, but the validity of the bonds was opposed by Mr. Stewart, a mortgagee, and it was agreed by the plaintiff and defendant that the bonds should be referred to the registrar, assisted by merchants, "to report the amount due thereon, but without prejudice to any question as to their validity."

At the reference before the registrar, the first bond was abandoned, and as to the second, the registrar reported that it was invalid, on the ground that the bondholder had not communicated with the owner, although he was in the same town, and might have conferred with him whenever he pleased, and was aware that the master had not communicated with him. The registrar reported that all the charges were "quite proper," that the "bottomry premium was not excessive," and that "he was not aware that any of the items could have been struck out."

The petition of appeal alleged the report to be erroneous, because the registrar had no power to decide upon the validity of the bond, and because the facts did not warrant the report that the bond was invalid. It was subsequently agreed between the parties that the court should be asked to decide the question as to the validity of the bond, as if the question were mooted before it in the first instance, and that the remainder of the report should be accepted. The facts of the case are stated at length in the judgment.

Butt, Q. Cur adv. vult.

July 30.—Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—The first bond has been abandoned, and I have only to deal with the second bond, which is dated the 2nd Dec. 1868. It was signed at Cardenas, in Cuba, and given to cover [two sums respectively of 378*l.* 3*s.*, and 250*l.* and with a bottomry premium of 30 per cent. on the former sum, amounts to the sum of 741*l.* 12*s.*; but the sum of 250*l.* has been withdrawn from the claim by the counsel for the bondholder, on the ground that it was originally advanced on the security of the freight; so that the claim of the bondholder in this court is limited to the principal sum of 378*l.* 3*s.*, and the bottomry premium of 113*l.* 9*s.* The owner of the Panama, Mr. Fincham, does not dispute the validity of the bond, but he has been examined as a witness by the defendant. The bond was entered into by the master, who was Fincham's son-in-law; the owner is insolvent, and was so at the time when the bond was given. A first mortgagee, Mr. Stewart, appears to contest the validity of the bond. And it is important to observe that the bondholders held a second mortgage on the vessel. The bond does not affect the cargo; and according to the finding of the registrar, with which I agree, the expenses which the bond was given to cover were quite proper. The owner, as I have said, was insolvent, and the master had no credit, and recourse to a bottomry bond appears to have been a matter of necessity; the time which it takes to write a letter from Cuba to Liverpool and obtain an answer is six weeks in the ordinary course of post. The master has not been produced as a witness by either party. The facts which I have now stated are not disputed. I will now consider more closely those which relate to the execution of the bond. On the 23rd Aug. 1868 the Panama left Cardenas, and arrived at Trinidad de Cuba in Sept., and took on board a cargo of mahogany and cedar, the freight on which, it appears, amounted to 1100*l.*, or 1200*l.* On the 12th Oct. 1868 the Panama left Trinidad for London, but having suffered injury from tempestuous weather, she put into Cardenas. She was surveyed on the 6th Nov.; the master applied to the agents of Messrs. Finlay and Co., which latter gentlemen were the agents of Messrs. Barron and Harrison, for an advance of money, which was refused. He then went to Havannah and attempted to obtain the money from Messrs. Finlay and Co. themselves; he was again refused, and returned to Cardenas. It appears he then applied to the owners of the cargo for money, and on their refusal, threatened to sell a portion of the cargo. The master had for some time been distrusted, both by Barron and Harrison, and it would also seem by Fincham the owner; and Messrs. Finlay and Co., taking alarm at the threat to sell a portion of the cargo, resolved to get rid of him; and on the 24th Nov. telegraphed to Barron and Harrison in the following words: "Panama wants 200*l.* to clear, also 160*l.* claimed by Mantle for wages; are ready to advance all, but he must leave vessel to captain appointed by consul. See owner: answer." To this Messrs. Barron and Harrison answer also by telegram on the 25th of the same month: "Do best our interest, appoint new master, secure advance, bottomry." On receipt of this telegram Messrs. Finlay and Co., with the assistance of the British consul at Havannah, remove the master, Capt. Mantle, and put another master in his place; but before Capt. Mantle leaves, they get him to sign the bottomry bond, which is the one in dispute in this case. At the time when Mr. Barron telegraphed back this answer, he was resident in Liverpool. Mr. Fincham, the owner, resided in that town or close to it, and continually attended at an office in the town. Of this fact Mr. Barron was perfectly aware; he was also perfectly aware that Mr. Stewart was first mortgagee of the vessel, and resided in Liverpool. Mr. Barron had no communication whatever with the owner upon the subject of this bottomry bond, and the question arises whether in all these circumstances he had a right to instruct the master, through his agents, to bottomry the ship as a security for his, the bondholder's, advance of money. It is not necessary to assert, as a proposition of law, that in all cases the bondholder, or even the master, must communicate with his owner before a bottomry bond be entered into; or that it is necessary that the bondholder should communicate with the first mortgagee. Neither of these propositions is required to sustain the judgment which I am about to pronounce, and which is confined to the particular facts and circumstances of this case. Having regard to them, I think there was a duty incumbent upon the bondholder of communicating with the owner before the bond was entered into, and that this duty was not taken away by the fact that the owner was insolvent, a fact which was much pressed upon me by the counsel for the bondholder. For the owner might have thought it expedient to endeavour to raise the money, either through his creditors, or from the first mortgagee who was close at hand, or from some other source; and I cannot lay out of my consideration the fact that by this bond the second mortgagee, who is a lender, does practically render the vessel liable to pay a premium of 30 per cent. before the first mortgagee can be satisfied. I pronounce against the validity of this bond, with costs.

Collision in river—Vessel aground—Duty of approaching vessel.

Where a steamer coming up a river during a high spring tide, and late at night, after passing a schooner also coming up the river, took the ground, and whilst aground was subsequently run into by the schooner:

Held, that, even assuming the steamer to have been 300 yds ahead when she grounded, it was not the duty of the schooner, under the circumstances, to have dropped her anchor, with the view of avoiding the collision, and that the steamer was solely to blame.

This was an appeal from a decree made by Mr. R. M. Kerr, the Judge of the City of London Court, in a cause arising out of a collision in the river Thames, between the brigantine Elizabeth and the screw steamer Adalia. The court below having held the Elizabeth solely to blame, she now appealed from that decision.

GALWAY (TOWN) ELECTION PETITION.

Butt, Q. C. and Webster, for respondents.

The facts of the case are fully set out in the judgment.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I entirely assent to some observations made by Mr. Butt, that with regard to all these appeal cases, the course which the court ought to pursue is, where there is a nice balance of evidence, and the court above may be of opinion that it preponderates one way, while the court below, in giving judgment, considers it preponderates the other, the Superior Court should be very reluctant indeed to disturb the sentence of the inferior court; and where the question is to be determined with any reference to the demeanour or conduct of the witnesses, again the appellate court should be reluctant to interfere with the judgment of the court below. It appears that the Elizabeth was going from Hartlepool to London with a cargo of coals. She had a crew of seven hands, all told. She had four men in a boat, which, I think, when somewhere below the Fishguard, she put out for the purpose of keeping the ship with steerage-way. She had a waterman at the helm, the captain was forward on the deck, and the mate and a lad were on deck. There was a high spring tide running at two knots which is an important point in the case. The wind was S.S.W. The length of the Elizabeth was 80 or 90 feet. The Adalia that evening had taken a pilot on board at Gravesend, and she first sighted the Elizabeth rather below Woolwich Pier. The Adalia drew 15ft. forward and 17ft. aft. Her exact speed perhaps it is rather difficult to gather from the evidence, but she was going about a knot and a-half faster than the Elizabeth, which was going a knot and a-half. She passed the Elizabeth somewhere below Woolwich Pier, by the School Ship, on her port hand, and by misfortune ran into the shoal on the opposite side of the river. It was eleven o'clock at night, in the month of June. She said that she took down her side lights, and remained with her masthead light up, in order to signify that she was not lying in a condition to move. The Elizabeth ran into her in the following manner, as stated in the Adalia's log: "She ran into her starboard gangway, carrying away several stanchions, 10ft. moulding, bowsprit, and all the gear attached, and other damage." After coming starboard side to starboard side—that is to say, the stern of the Elizabeth to the stem of the Adalia—she came round under her bowsprit, and for some little time was port side to port side. What became of the boat is not exactly clear, but somehow or other the rope was parted, and she got away from both the vessels. Upon the evidence laid before him, the learned judge, and the assessors who assisted him with their advice, have come to the conclusion that the Elizabeth was alone to blame for this collision. One of the nautical assessors appears to have differed upon what was considered a very material point in the court below—viz., the distance at which the Adalia was ahead of the Elizabeth just before the collision happened, after she had run ashore on the other side. The learned judge of the court below founded his decision, as it appears to me, upon this view of the law, that from the facts which were tendered, according to the evidence which he believed on behalf of the Adalia, it was the duty of the Elizabeth to have dropped her anchor, and thereby to have avoided the collision. The learned judge of the court below acted upon the belief that there was 300yds. distance, and between eight and ten minutes in point of time, which separated the two vessels from the time when the Adalia ran aground to the time of the collision. It is not my disposition at all to adjudicate upon this case with reference to minute and exact measurement either of time or distance; and though I have been furnished with a very careful statement from the nautical gentlemen who assist me on this occasion, which would lead to a contrary inference from that which was adopted by the learned judge and the assessors in the court below, I am not about to decide the case before me upon those grounds. I will assume that there was the distance which the Adalia alleged, that she was 300yds. ahead of the brig when she grounded, the tide was a high spring tide, and the Elizabeth was advancing all the while. It appears to me that, upon the state of facts sworn to by the witnesses on behalf of the Adalia with respect to the distance, it was an error in law to hold that it was the duty of the Elizabeth to perform the manœuvre which I have mentioned, and thereby, as it is alleged, to have avoided the collision. It is just possible that in the most auspicious circumstances, in broad daylight, and with a full knowledge of what was going to happen, the Elizabeth might have been in that condition, with regard to her crew, that by dropping her anchor she might have avoided the collision, though on that point the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House who assist me are extremely doubtful; but when it is remembered that the steamer had passed the brigantine in the way which I have described, at eleven at night, and, at a very short distance from her, had run aground on the opposite side, there was no obligation whatever upon the Elizabeth to make the manœuvre in question. She had received nothing which could be considered, at least having regard to the circumstances of the case as a warning of the condition in which the steamer was placed, nor, as I have said, if she had received that warning, could she, in the state in which she naturally was at that time, have avoided the collision by dropping her anchor. The learned judge seems to have been of opinion that there was not a proper look-out kept on board; but, looking at the evidence, the court would come to a different conclusion. I am wholly unable to see upon what grounds it was that the learned judge concluded there was not a look-out on board the Elizabeth. He seems, indeed, to have rather inferred there was not a proper look-out from the fact of her not dropping her anchor, which he thought it would have been her duty to have done if she had had a proper look-out. Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, and having the full assent and approbation of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, I find myself compelled, assuming the facts to have been such as the learned judge proceeded on, to pronounce in favour of the appellants in this case, and to reverse the sentence of the court below, with costs.

General intimidation—Undue influence of ministers of sects—Legitimate and illegitimate clerical influence.

A general refusal by bishops and clergy of the solemn rites of the church to persons on account of their voting or not voting in a particular way, will avoid an election.

Catholic clergy to address their congregations; to advise them to canvass the merits of the candidates; to tell them that one man is for the country and another against it; that one man is for a church which they think ought to be disestablished—so long as there is no play upon the superstitious feelings of the people.

The ruling in the Dublin case affirmed, namely, that general bribery and general treating will invalidate an election, though not directly traceable to the candidate; and that general intimidation, whether lay or ecclesiastical, will upset every election at which it is practised.

The case of Huguenin v. Baseley (coram Lord Eldon 1807) cited and applied.

This was a petition against the return of Lord Lawrence and Sir R. Blennerhassett, and contained twenty-eight clauses. The question ultimately resolved itself into a single issue respecting clerical intimidation, upon which judgment was given as follows:

KEOGH, J.—I now come to what has been not improperly called by my learned friend Dr. Seeds the great constitutional question in this case, that is, the question of undue influence practised, in the words of the Act of Parliament which I shall read, on behalf of the sitting members. The words of the Act are most precise, not leaving things at large or in any uncertainty, but going into the most specific detail. I refer to the 5th section of the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102. I had to consider this question very anxiously in another place, at the Drogheda election, in which, beyond a doubt, undue influence was practised by laymen and by ecclesiastics, and I so declared. "Every person who shall directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person on his behalf, make use of or threaten to make use of, any force, violence, or restraint, or inflict or threaten the infliction by himself or by or through any other person, of any injury, damage, harm, or loss, or in any other manner practise intimidation upon or against any person, in order to induce or compel such person to vote or refrain from voting, or on account of such person having voted at any election, or who shall, by abduction, duress, or any fraudulent device or contrivance, impede, prevent, or otherwise interfere with the free exercise of the franchise of any voter, or shall thereby compel, induce, or prevail upon any voter either to give or to refrain from giving his vote at any election, shall be deemed to have committed the offence of undue influence, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, making him liable to the punishment of fine and imprisonment, and shall also be liable to forfeit the sum of 50*l.* to any person who shall sue for the same, together with the full costs of suit;" and, by a clause in another Act of Parliament, "shall render the seat of the member void on whose behalf that undue influence is used;" and if it is used, and is found by the judge trying the offence to have been used (as it was found by me in the case of the trial of the election petition for the borough of Drogheda) by himself or his agents, the member is incapacitated from again seeking the suffrages of that constituency during the then existing Parliament. That is the definition of undue influence given in the Act of Parliament. My learned friend Dr. Seeds reminded me that in the case of the trial of the election petition for the city of Dublin, I had given a short exposition of what I considered to be the law upon these subjects, and on referring to them I find that I said this: "I say that general bribery will invalidate an election, even though it be not directly traceable to the candidate. I say that general treating will invalidate an election, even though it be not directly traceable to the candidate and I say, above all things, that general intimidation and undue influence, whether it is lay or ecclesiastical, whether it is the ecclesiastic of one persuasion, or whether it is the ecclesiastic of another; whether it is the Protestant Episcopalian minister, or the Presbyterian minister, or the Roman Catholic priest, or the minister of any other of those innumerable sects which I believe are to be found existing over the face of the world, will upset every election at which it is practised." I see no reason to qualify in any way a single word which I stated in that judgment. That I believe to be the law, as laid down by the greatest authorities, and of that I believe no happier exposition was ever given than in the celebrated argument of Sir Samuel Romilly, in the case of Huguenin v. Baseley, in the year 1807, before Lord Eldon, in the Court of Chancery of England, as to which I think it is recorded that Lord Eldon, years afterwards, stated that the words of that great jurist were "still ringing in his ears." It will not, therefore, be out of place that I should adopt the splendid language and diction of that great jurist, as containing a true and admirable exposition of that which constitutes undue influence when practised by ecclesiastics. The case of Huguenin v. Baseley did not, of course, relate to an election, but it was a suit brought in Chancery to set aside a settlement made voluntarily by a widow upon a clergyman and his family. That settlement was set aside as having been obtained by undue influence and abused confidence by the clergyman as an agent undertaking the management of this lady's affairs, and it was so set aside upon principles of public policy and utility. Sir Samuel Romilly speaks in his argument of this undue influence. I adopt his words as marking what I conceive to be the limit between due and undue influence, and I shall proceed, when I have read those words, to refer them to the case now in question. "Undue influence will be used if ecclesiastics make use of their power to excite superstitious fears or pious hopes, to inspire, as the object may be best promoted, despair or confidence" (that is, to inspire despair or confidence, in order to obtain their own objects, be they what they may), "to alarm the conscience, by horrors of eternal misery, or support the drooping spirits by unfolding the prospect of eternal happiness—that good or evil which is never to end." Now, what is the necessary consequence if that is a true version of influence? Is it that the influence of the clergy is to be excluded? I say not. A question was put to the Bishop of Galway by the learned counsel who cross-examined him: "Did you say that if the people were estranged from their clergy, and were not obedient to their clergy, they would escape from all legitimate authority?" And the answer is, "I did." I say so too. Differences of religion will prevail to the end of the world, as they have prevailed from the very first hour of Christianity; but, I say, it is idle to put forward the proposition that it is desirable in any country that the people shall be free from the influence of their clergy. To be a good citizen there must be a religious sentiment; and if you release the people from the influences, I say the legitimate influences, of their clergy, you set them at sea upon the billows of every kind of infidelity; and they will become as indifferent to the civil as they have been to the religious authority. Those are my sentiments; they are perfectly consistent with, they are ingrained in, authority itself; and so far from shaking the edifice of temporal power, and of temporal peace, they go to maintain both. But the question is, has undue influence been used, and has influence been unduly used? And there is no more difficulty in answering that in the case of ecclesiastical than of civil influence. The same test must be applied to it, and that the reasoning of the human mind. Then let me approach this particular case, and let me ask myself this question, Has there been undue influence? In the first place it was said rather hastily, and I am sure without meaning to argue such a proposition, that if the priest uses influence at all the election will be void. The Roman Catholic bishop in this country is not represented at the council table, where I frequently have the pleasure of meeting archbishops and bishops of the Protestant Establishment; the cassock and the lawn sleeves of the House of Lords are not worn by him; he is and remains in the eye of the law a commoner, and as a commoner he must find his representative. The Legislature and the law have given him a vote, and have entitled him to vote, and he has a right to exercise that privilege. The minister of the Protestant Episcopalian religion has the same right, and no less; the minister of the Presbyterian religion has the same; the landlord has his vote, and his tenants have their votes; and is it to be said that the landlord is to use no influence with his tenants? I deny the proposition altogether. I say it is right and becoming that a landlord should use his influence with his tenants; and so long as he does not exercise that influence in an illegitimate manner, no steadier, or safer, or more legitimate influence can be used. The public press, which is now almost one of the estates of the realm from its great and amazing power, from day to day and from hour to hour exercises its influences upon every constituency; and no one would presume to say that the public press should not put forth its tremendous powers, to advise, to lecture, often to control the people; because if you were to place limits upon that power the public benefit would be disregarded, and the freedom of the press would be destroyed. Then, I ask, are the only persons in the community who are not to be at liberty to exercise their legitimate influence the bishops and clergy of the Roman Catholic Church? I meet with a positive negative any such assumption; but, as I said before, that influence must be legitimately exercised. I hold in my hand the report of a case in which the election for a neighbouring county, the county of Mayo, was contested in Parliament before a committee of the House of Commons, in the year 1853. There certain electors for that county petitioned against the return of the present member for that county, Mr. George Henry Moore, and the late member for that county, Colonel Gore Ouseley Higgins. The seat was contested, evidence was given, and the committee came to this resolution: "That it appears from evidence given before the committee, that there was great abuse of spiritual influence on the part of a great body of the Roman Catholic priesthood during the last election for the county of Mayo." That committee was composed of no ordinary men; the chairman was Lord Harry Vane, a most distinguished member of Parliament; one of the members was Mr. John George Phillimore, the member for Leominster, one of the ablest lawyers in the House of Commons, and another was Mr. Clive, a very able man; and they arrived at the resolution which I have read, "that there was great abuse of spiritual influence on the part of a great body of the Roman Catholic priesthood during the last election for the county of Mayo," and yet they declared the members to have been duly elected as knights of the shire. I do not mention this as expressing my concurrence in the decision. I think that if I had come to the conclusion that there was great abuse of spiritual influence on the part of a great body of the Roman Catholic priesthood, I should have also arrived at the conclusion that the representatives were not duly elected. Amongst that committee there was not one single Roman Catholic gentleman, all the members being of the Protestant persuasion; and yet they, having had that evidence before them, did not think that that abuse of spiritual influence had gone the length of invalidating the election. I come now to a case of an opposite kind. In the year 1857 Colonel Gore Ouseley Higgins was the unsuccessful candidate for the representation of the county of Mayo; he petitioned against the sitting member, Mr. George Henry Moore, and the petition complained of every description of intimidation, and of every description of undue influence. A very full report of the case is given in 1 Wolferstan and Dew's Election Cases, 1857—8. [The learned judge referred fully to the particulars of that case, and proceeded:] Upon that evidence the committee came to the conclusion "that George Henry Moore, Esq., was, by his agents, guilty of undue influence at the last election for the county of Mayo. That undue influence and spiritual intimidation prevailed to a considerable extent at the last election for the county of Mayo. That in the exercise of such undue influence and spiritual intimidation the Rev. Peter Conway and the Rev. Luke Ryan were so prominently active, that the committee deem it their duty specially to report their conduct to the House in order that such steps may be taken as may seem to the House to be proper and necessary." Of course, the gentleman who was so unseated was unable to offer himself to the electors again during the whole of that Parliament. There is a case of undue influence proved to the satisfaction of any man on earth, and there is a case in which it was acted upon by the House of Commons, not shilly-shallying with resolutions condemning spiritual undue influence, and leaving the member to hold his seat, but finding undue influence to have been exercised, and arriving at the legitimate and logical conclusion that the member should not retain his seat. Looking at it in that light, let us approach this case. Has there been such undue influence as ought to avoid the election in this case? If there has, the higher the person who used it the more fearlessly he ought to be dealt with. I care not whether he be curate, parish priest, administrator, bishop, or archbishop. I cannot go higher than that in this country; but if undue influence at an election were proved before me to have been exercised within the limits of the law and of my own reason, consulting as to the proper deductions to be drawn from the facts, I would, without the slightest hesitation in the world, find that to have been an undue election; and let the persons who have brought that state of things about, whenever it occurs, deal with the consequences. In this case every description of charge has been made against the Roman Catholic clergy. They have been charged, in the statement of my friend Mr. Heron, with having refused the rites of the Church, in order to influence votes at this election. If that had been proved in a single case, I would have avoided this election; I would not have hesitated one moment about it. If a single elector—the most miserable freeman that crawls about this town—had been refused the rites of the Church in order to compel him to vote, or because he had voted, or because a member of his family had voted, in a particular way, I would have avoided this election without the least hesitation; but I have never known of such a thing being done in this country. I am perfectly satisfied that the eminent ecclesiastic who gave his testimony so frankly upon that table would countenance no such procedure. I said when the bishop was examined that whatever inferences we might draw from the testimony of the right reverend prelate, no man could deny him the justice of saying that he had frankly told what was passing in his mind, without regard to consequences. I am certain that he would never let near him the abominable idea of making the sacred rites and mysteries of his Church subservient to political purposes. But the charge was made, and a more fearful charge I know not of; and let me say that it was one which ought not to have been hazarded without a belief in its truth, and that it would be supported in proof. In these petitions I make every allowance for human frailty and for human passion; but I say that where a great body of men, holding a position of the highest importance in the midst of a Roman Catholic congregation, headed by a bishop distinguished for great talent, refuse the most solemn rites of the Church to persons on account of their voting or not voting in a particular way, such action on their part will, and ought to, avoid an election. But I say that such a charge against such men, or against any men, ought not to have been hazarded unless there was forthcoming some evidence of it; and in this case there was not one particle of evidence offered to prove the statement. It was said that the clergy threatened privation of the rites of the Church. There is not a particle of evidence of anything of the kind, not a suspicion of it. The intimidation is divided by Dr. Seeds into spiritual intimidation practised by the bishop upon his clergy, and by the clergy, under his dictation, on the people. I am not here as a censor of the manners of the ecclesiastics of my own or any other church; that is not my province. I have merely to inquire, just as any other judge would do, no matter what his religious belief might be, whether the spiritual influence of the Roman Catholic clergy was brought to bear unduly upon the minds of their congregations, so as to deter them from the free use of their franchise? I may entertain, and I do entertain, opinions about some of the transactions disclosed in this case; and I must say that they do not coincide with those which evidently were entertained by a bishop of my own church. I do not approve of the most sacred mystery which is known to the Roman Catholic Church, or to every Christian in the Roman Catholic Church—that sacred and solemn mystery in which every true Roman Catholic believes that the sacrifice of Calvary is repeated in the atoning blood of our Saviour—being suspended to deliver a political discourse—of the devout minds, whose hopes and expectations are bent upon the celebration of that sacred rite, being diverted or confused by the brawl of an election battle. But, exercising my own opinion, I gave it there; it is due to the right reverend prelate to say that he never preached himself until the sacrifice of the mass had been concluded; but not so with other clergymen. It is described, as we Roman Catholics all understand, that after the first Gospel, the celebration of the mass was suspended, in order to lecture the people upon the subject of the conflicting claims of the different candidates. I think it would be well, even, if the House of God were not made a place for delivering political discourses at all; but I pass that by as a matter of trifling importance. I recognise the full right of the Roman Catholic clergy to address their congregations; to advise them to canvass the merits of candidates; to tell them that one man is for the country, and that another man is against the country; and to tell them that this man is in favour of a church establishment which they think is more for the benefit of the people to have disestablished; to tell them that another man, though a Roman Catholic in profession, is yet playing the game of another candidate who is against the interests, in that respect, of the Roman Catholic population; nay, more, I would not hold a very hard and fast line as to language which, in excited times, might be used by Roman Catholic ecclesiastics or by civilians. They may be impatient; they may be zealous; they may be wrathful, provided they do not surpass the bounds of what is known to be legitimate influence. I heard nothing, as reported in the discourse of the right reverend prelate, which at all surpassed those bounds. There was no threat to suspend or refuse the rites of the church; there was no play upon the superstitious feelings of the people.

The learned judge found, therefore, that the respondents were duly returned, and that corrupt practices had not extensively prevailed.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY

Reported by T. BROOKSBANK and E. STEWART ROCHE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Jan. 14.

(Before Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

MORRIS v. WRIGHT.

Copyright—Directory—Compilation—Piracy—Injunction—Motion for, before publication of defendant's work.

Although the law is, as laid down in Kelly v. Morris, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222, that in such works as a Directory a later compiler is bound to set about doing for himself that which the first compiler must have done, and must, in the case of a road-book, have counted the milestones himself, and in the case of a map of a newly discovered district, must have gone through the whole process of triangulation, and may use a previous work only to verify his own calculations, and as in Morris v. Ashbee, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550, that the compiler of a directory may not cut a series of slips, or take the names, from an earlier work, and use them in printing his own, even though he send persons with the slips to the several addresses to ascertain their accuracy, yet when slips were cut out of the plaintiff's book only to guide the defendant as to the persons on whom he should call, it was Held, that the defendant was doing no more than he was authorised to do.

And where a defendant had for a time made an improper use of the plaintiff's prior publication, and was so using it at the date of a decision in another suit which established the illegality of such use, and upon that decree desisted therefrom, but proceeded with preparations for publishing his own work, of which preparations the plaintiff became aware by means of information derived from a person who had been in partnership with the defendant, and the plaintiff thereupon at once and before any publication by the defendant filed a bill and moved for an injunction, it was Held (affirming the decision of James, V. C.), that no interlocutory injunction could be granted, as on publication it might appear that no improper use had been made of the plaintiff's work.

This was an appeal by the plaintiff against an order of James, V.C., dissolving, on the motion of the defendants, an injunction which had been granted restraining the defendants until the hearing of the cause, or further order, "from printing, publishing, selling, delivering, or otherwise disposing of the said projected book, called the Handbook or Manufacturers' and Exporters' Directory of Great Britain, or any part thereof, or any other book in the compilation of which cuttings from the plaintiff's book called the Business Directory of London have been used, or any copy or copies thereof, and from printing or copying any editions of the plaintiff's said book, or any part thereof, and from in any manner using the same, or any copy thereof, or extract therefrom, in the preparation of any future edition of their said projected book, or any other directory, handbook, or similar work."

The bill stated that in the year 1862, the plaintiff composed and printed and published a book called the Business Directory of London for 1862—1868, containing the names, addresses, and trades, or occupations of the merchants, traders, and other persons carrying on business or residing in London and parts adjacent; that the production of this book had cost the plaintiff much study and labour, and a large sum of money, many persons being necessarily employed by him to ascertain by personal inquiry the particulars mentioned; that in every year since 1862 he had published a new edition of that book, and had in the year 1868 added an appendix of merchants, traders, and manufacturers in the provinces; that his book was made the medium for advertisements by manufacturers and tradesmen in London and the provinces, and that of these persons such as desired to have a further description of their trades or businesses than was given in the general heading under which they were classed were entitled to have such fuller description called "extra lines" inserted immediately after their names upon payment of an equivalent sum to the plaintiff, and they would also advertise their goods or wares at the end or in the body of the work upon payment; that by these "extra lines" and advertisements the plaintiff had made a large profit, and that the copyright of all the editions of the book vested in the plaintiff as the registered proprietor, and he had entered such editions at Stationers' Hall; that amongst the persons employed by the plaintiff as canvassers for the edition of 1868, were one William Henry Franklin, and the defendants, George Taylor Wright, and Frederick Wadkin Sternberg, all of whom had for some time been in his service, and were acquainted with the plan of the plaintiff's book, and his method of canvassing for subscriptions and advertisements; that soon after the edition of 1868 was published, the three persons last named left the plaintiff's service, and in April 1868 entered into partnership as directory compilers and publishers under the style of "Wright and Co. of Bristol," and commenced canvassing for a new directory to be published by them to be called the Western Shipping and Commercial Directory, but the title of which was soon afterwards changed to the Handbook or Manufacturers' and Exporters' Directory of Great Britain; that the plaintiff began his preparations for his edition of 1869 on the 21st July 1868, but that his canvassers found reason to believe that Messrs. Wright and Co., guided by cuttings from his 1868 edition, had called on a very large number of his customers, and forestalled a large number of his orders, but that the plaintiff was unable to obtain at that time legal evidence of the manner in which they were operating; that he had, however, recently discovered as a fact that Wright and Co. had printed his book in preparing their own by cutting up into slips copies of the plaintiff's book for 1868 with its provincial appendix, and these slips containing names and addresses were pasted on printed canvassing forms issued by Wright and Co., and were taken by them or their canvassers as guides to the houses named therein, and the persons or firms named in such slips were solicited by Wright and Co. to pay to them their charges for reprinting such slips in the projected directory and for extra lines and advertisements, and also to purchase the said projected directory; that in this way Wright and Co. had received sums of money, instances of which were mentioned in the bill; that in a similar way Wright and Co. had used slips from a work published by Messrs. Ashbee and Co., which was itself printed from the plaintiff's work, and had been restrained by a perpetual injunction in Nov. 1868: (see Morris v. Ashbee, 19 L. T. Rep.

N. S. 550); that the slips thus pasted on the forms were afterwards written out, and the manuscript or copy from which the projected directory was to be printed was thus prepared, and the plaintiff charged that Wright and Co.'s projected directory was a gross piracy of his own work, and that it was impossible to sever the parts which were original from those which were pirated; that Franklin had ceased to be a member of the firm of Wright and Co., who were "preparing for the speedy publication of the projected directory," and had in fact an edition of 1500 copies in the press. The bill prayed an injunction in the terms above mentioned, and an account of sales.

The affidavit of the plaintiff supported the statements of his bill, and Franklin detailed the mode in which the plaintiff's work was used by Wright and Co., and stated that the materials for their directory had been supplied to a great extent from cuttings taken from the plaintiff's book and the work of Messrs. Ashbee and Co., and another witness exhibited some of the cuttings so used by the defendants.

The affidavit of the defendant Wright after questioning the copyright of the plaintiff in his work, and stating that his firm had begun an independent canvass for the country in June 1868, and for London in Nov. 1868, proceeded as follows:

13. Before the decision in this honourable court made in the case of Morris v. Ashbee, and knowing the usual practice of the plaintiff, and the instructions which were uniformly given to his canvassers by him, we had no doubt but that we had a right to use cuttings from any copyright directory or other work for the mere purpose of guiding ourselves or our canvassers to the houses of the different manufacturers and traders, so long as we made no other use of such cuttings, and obtained from such persons themselves their names and addresses and any additional entries or other matters which they might wish to have published in our projected work—that is to say, so long as we abstained from copying any part whatever of such other works into our own work, and inserted in our own work nothing but matter obtained originally from our subscribers and patrons.

In paragraph 14, he stated that his firm arranged that lists should be made out of the principal manufacturers and merchants of the different towns to be canvassed, to be supplied to the canvassers, "but we gave strict directions to our canvassers to use the lists supplied only as guides to the residences of the persons therein named, and for no other purpose whatever." He said that the lists were taken from different sources including the works of the plaintiff and of Messrs. Ashbee, as to which latter no adverse decision had then been given; but he said that the names taken from those two works were very few, and that the entries of names in Wright and Co.'s work were far more numerous than those in the said two works.

In paragraph 15, that on the decision on the 11th Nov., 1868, in Morris v. Ashbee, he and his partners resolved "to abstain altogether in the future from using cuttings for any purpose whatever;" that instructions were accordingly given to their servants, and that to the best of his belief no cuttings whatever were afterwards used in connection with their projected work.

The 16th paragraph was this:—

§ The course of business of myself, my partners, and our canvassers respectively, was, upon calling on the different persons canvassed, to show them a form printed on the back of a specimen of our intended work, and to canvass them for an order to insert their names, business, descriptions, or other matters proposed to be printed in our work, and, if successful in getting an order, to get the person or persons giving the same to fill up the form presented to him or them, or to furnish a bill-head, circular, or card of his or their own firm, from which such names and extra matter were to be taken. If such persons declined to pay anything they were requested to give authority to insert their names only in one work, for which we required no payment, and were asked to give a card as evidence of such authority having been given. [Then he produced two bundles of papers, which were the forms used as aforesaid and filled up by the persons canvassed, or filled up by the canvassers respectively from information directly given by the persons canvassed, and also four boxes of cards were produced containing some thousands of cards received from the canvassers, and he proceeded:—I superintend the compilation of our intended work, and to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief not a single name, or any additional matter of any kind, has been copied for the manuscript of our work from the said work of the plaintiff, or from the said work of Messrs. Ashbee and Co.; where in the manuscript of our said work the names only of persons appear, such names have been copied from the cards received as aforesaid, and where the names appear with additional matter, such names and additional matter have been copied from entries made on our own forms, or on cards and other documents supplied and obtained in manner aforesaid.

MORRIS v. WRIGHT.

17. Only a very small portion of our projected work was canvassed for upon the system which we at first adopted. The bulk of the work, that is to say about seven-eighths thereof, was canvassed without any cuttings at all.

The defendants produced affidavits from several of their customers in corroboration of the foregoing statements as to the manner in which Wright and Co.'s directory was canvassed for.

Franklin, in an affidavit in reply, stated that the manuscript for Wright and Co.'s work was formed up to 1868 to a very great extent from cuttings from the plaintiff's and Messrs. Ashbee's works, and that after that date the said cuttings were used to a very large extent; that the bulk of the defendants' work had indeed been canvassed for before the injunction in Morris v. Ashbee.

The plaintiff having obtained an injunction ex parte, the defendants moved to dissolve it, and on the 25th Nov. 1869, James, V.C. gave judgment as follows:—"This case is substantially distinguishable on the materials before me, which alone I can deal with for the purposes of this interlocutory application, from Kelly v. Morris, and Morris v. Ashbee. The case of the plaintiff is, 'You contemplate in a book that you are going to bring out an invasion of my copyright,' and the bill is filed quia timet. The plaintiff's case is that the defendants have taken his book, and used it for purposes which were said by the court in those two cases to be an illegal and improper use of it. The accomplice (Franklin) says they used those slips in that way, and that that makes up the sum and substance of the book which is about to be published; the defendants admit that they did use these slips to a great extent for a purpose which they thought at the time was legitimate, for the purpose of canvassing and going round to different people; but when the court decided that what Ashbee was doing was illegal, they determined that they would entirely abandon all use of these slips, and they have not used them for any purpose since that time. I think the balance of evidence is in favour of the defendants. It seemed to be argued on the part of the plaintiff, that if the defendants had for a day, or a week, or a month, or had once done wrong, they never afterwards could do right; that they never afterwards could print any directory, because they had once to some extent availed themselves in a manner not sanctioned by this court of the work of the plaintiff. If they really do what they say they were going to do—to bring out a work in which they do not intend to copy any part of the plaintiff's book—I do not see that I can prevent them, because they at one time used slips for the purpose that has been stated. It is not immaterial to consider that, from all that appears in the affidavits, the sole use of the slips was to obtain orders for paid insertions, which appears to me to be a perfectly legitimate use of them, provided they are not afterwards used for printing, and that ordinary and bona fide steps are taken by them to make the book their own directory. Beyond what I have said, it seems to me that the defendant's book is a different book from the plaintiff's. . . . This question is one which may be more accurately determined at the hearing; but, as the case now stands, I do not feel myself justified in interfering, not knowing how I could compensate the defendants in damages if the plaintiff should turn out to be wrong. But if the defendants, when the whole matter is before the court, and we have the advantage of seeing the book itself when it is ultimately put into shape, do anything wrong, they and their printer will always be liable to make full compensation to the plaintiff, and I think there would be no difficulty in ascertaining the amount of compensation to be paid to him." His Honour, therefore, dissolved the injunction, and the plaintiff appealed.

G. Osborne Morgan, Q. C. and H. H. Cozens-Hardy supported the appeal, relying upon

Kelly v. Morris, L. Rep. 1 Eq. 697; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 222;

Morris v. Ashbee, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 34; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; and Lewis v. Fullarton, 2 Beav. 6.

Kay, Q. C. and Mark W. Hunter, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—It is to be regretted that the plaintiff should have brought the case here at the present time; because I have no doubt that at the hearing full justice will be done, and that at the hearing, if he makes out a case, he will get any relief to which he is entitled. But what I have to consider is not what he may or may not have done at the hearing of this cause. Nor should I wish to do anything which would prejudice the decision that may be come to at the hearing. As far as regards the facts of the case, all I have to consider is, whether at this moment an injunction ought to be granted; or, in other words, whether the Vice-Chancellor ought to have dissolved the injunction which he had previously granted. If one considers the exact state of things at this moment, I have no hesitation in saying that the Vice-Chancellor was quite right in dissolving that injunction. The costs, as I understand it, were to be costs in the cause. The plaintiff, if he is right, will have all he is entitled to, and I have no hesitation in saying also that I ought not now to grant an injunction.

Just observe how the matter stands. First of all, there has been no publication; secondly, no book ever was printed, about seven printed pages and no more have been produced; and thirdly, if this book, compiled as the plaintiff alleges it to have been compiled, was put in a shop window to-morrow, the plaintiff beyond all question, if that book contained that which he says it does contain (the book itself would show the advertisements and so on which he complains of) would get an injunction, and he was in that state that, resting upon the Vice-Chancellor's opinion, no possible prejudice could happen to him. The bill itself was filed in Sept. 1869. The evidence relied upon is that of Mr. Franklin, and great stress has been laid upon Mr. Wright's letter to Mr. Franklin of the 18th Nov. 1868. It is to be observed that Morris v. Ashbee, had been decided on the 11th Nov., and that up to that time the parties took a different view of the law to that which was laid down in Morris v. Ashbee, and what Mr. Wright writes in that letter is this: "You have the Sheffield papers; look over them and see if any of them are from his cuttings; if they are, mark them, and I must write to the parties and get them to fill up a fresh form. I must have all of them as you promised," and so on. That letter of the 18th Nov. 1868, is unquestionably the letter of a person who knew the position in which he stood with reference to those cuttings, and who at the time was desirous, if any of those Sheffield cuttings had been used bodily, as they were used in Morris v. Ashbee, that that should be set right, and that the cuttings should be put aside; that distinct questions should be put to the parties, and that the parties should give their own special instructions about them; but am I to infer (because that is what I am called upon to do), at this stage of the cause, there being a direct conflict of evidence between Mr. Franklin and Mr. Wright, that it was Mr. Wright's intention to do the very thing which, by the letter of the 13th Nov. 1868, he expressed his intention not to do, or, in other words, to do an illegal act which, if found out, would make him undoubtedly liable? Whether he has or has not done so is a question to be tried at the hearing. I have no doubt whatever that in November 1868 it was his intention, at all events, to bring himself within the 13th and 16th paragraphs of his affidavit, and I do not think it will be very easy to arrive at any conclusion as to whether he has done so or not, without getting those documents which are not produced at present, and with reference to the contents of which, if not produced, I cannot at this stage of the cause at all speculate.

MORRIS v. WRIGHT.

That being so, let us see what the contents of the 13th and 16th paragraphs of his affidavit are, and see whether there is anything in Kelly v. Morris or in Morris v. Ashbee which would render that which Mr. Wright, I agree, admits in the 13th and 16th paragraphs of his affidavit that he has done, illegal. If there is nothing illegal in doing that which he speaks of in the 13th and 16th paragraphs of his affidavit, taking into consideration the state of things in this case, with, as I have said, no book in the market, no intention on the part of the defendant to do anything beyond what has been done, as stated in the 13th and 16th paragraphs of his affidavit, and certainly if a book were published to-morrow which disclosed on the face of it that it was to any substantial extent copied from the plaintiff's book, he would be in no degree prejudiced by his delay, he would at once get his relief. [His Lordship then read the 13th and 16th paragraphs, and proceeded.] Those two paragraphs are perfectly specific, and no doubt the defendant admits that he used the slips that were cut from the book for the purpose of guiding him to the residences of the persons who were canvassed. That he admits, and nothing more. He denies that there was any copying of any kind or description.

Now first of all if one wanted a definition of "copyright" at all, it could be found in one or two decided cases. I believe that it was said in the House of Lords, that the true definition of "copyright" is "the sole right of multiplying copies." That of course means you must not copy either with or without colourable alterations. That is a general definition of a copyright.

Now let us see what it was that was laid down in Kelly v. Morris. I may observe that both in Kelly v. Morris and in Morris v. Ashbee there was the most direct copying that possibly could be. Not only were the slips used for the purpose of canvassing, but the course pursued really was, when a slip was presented to the person who was canvassed, they asked him whether he authorised the particular thing; they proceeded to get his authority for the insertion, and the thing was copied into the book. We must look at the injunction according to the facts that were proved in the particular case. The present Lord Chancellor says in Kelly v. Morris, "I think there must be an injunction in the same terms as that which was granted in Lewis v. Fullerton, viz., to restrain the publication of the part which are pirated, without waiting till all the parts which have been pirated, can be distinctly specified. The defendant has been most completely mistaken in what he assumes to be his right to deal with the labour and property of others. In the case of a dictionary, map, guide book, or directory, when there are certain common objects of information which must, if described correctly, be described in the same words, a subsequent compiler is bound to set about doing for himself that which the first compiler has done. In case of a road book, he must count the mile-stones for himself"—to stop there for a moment, in this case the party has gone to the individual himself. "In the case of a map of a newly discovered island (the illustration put by Mr. Daniel), he must go through the whole process of triangulation, just as if he had never seen any former map, and generally he is not entitled to take one word of the information previously published without independently working out the matter for himself so as to arrive at the same result from the same common sources of information; and the only use that he can legitimately make of a previous publication is to verify his own calculations and results when obtained. So in the present case the defendant could not take a single line"—that means as I apprehend, that he could take nothing whatever—"of the plaintiff's directory for the purpose of saving himself labour and trouble in getting his information." If it goes further than what I take it to mean, no doubt it goes beyond what the law authorises, and beyond what the decision of the Lord Chancellor and myself was the other day in Pike v. Nicholas. It does not mean that he may not look into the book for the purpose of ascertaining where a particular person lived, and for the purpose of ascertaining from that book whether it was worth his while to call upon that person or not; but it means that he may not take that particular slip and show that to the person, and get the authority of the person as to putting that particular slip in. Then the Lord Chancellor goes on—it does not rest there. "The defendant from the description of the way in which he had in the first instance compiled his business directory, seems to have known exactly what he might do. No doubt the expense of procuring information in a legitimate way is very great. The defendant himself has told us so, and also that it was not for some years that he was able to make it pay. But the defendant goes on in his affidavit to propound a most extraordinary doctrine as to the right of publicity in the names of private residents, who had, as he expressed it, given their names for public use. What he has done has been just to copy the plaintiff's book, and then to send out canvassers to see if the information so copied was correct. If the canvassers did not find the occupier of the house at home, or could get no answer from him, then the information copied from the plaintiff's book was repeated bodily, as if it was a question for the occupier of the house merely, and not for the compiler of the previous directory. Further than this the defendant tells us that he had a number of new agents and that one of them performed his part of the work carelessly, thus at once showing how easy it would be on the system adopted by the defendant, for any negligent agent to send back his list all ticked as if correct, without having taken the trouble to make a single inquiry."

I take it that that judgment rests entirely upon the facts, and I am quite satisfied from what the Lord Chancellor said in the copyright case the other day, Pike v. Nicholas, that it was never his intention to say you may not look at a directory for the purpose of directing you where to call. What he meant was, you are not to take a passage of the directory, and go and see whether it happens to be accurate, and, if it is accurate, bodily copy it into your directory.

My own judgment in Morris v. Ashbee was also referred to. That judgment did not go so far as regards the facts as the judgment of the Lord Chancellor did. What I said was this: "The plaintiff incurred the labour and expense, first of getting the necessary information for the arrangement and compilation of the names as they stood in his directory, and then of making the actual compilation and arrangement, and though each individual who paid might no doubt have his own name printed in capital letters, or with the same super-added lines wherever he chose, neither one nor all of them could authorise the cutting of a series of slips, or the taking of the names, as arranged from the plaintiff's directory, and the use of them in the printing of a rival work. This brings me to Kelly v. Morris. In that case, no doubt, Morris's canvassers did more than anything that has been proved to have been done by or on the part of these defendants, for in Kelly v. Morris, if the canvassers did not find the occupier of the house at home, or could get no answer from him, then the information copied was printed bodily. Neither the decree, however, nor the judgment, is based solely on, or confined to, this. The decree is general in its terms, following Lewis v. Fullarton, and the substance of the judgment is, that in a case such as this no one has a right to take the results of the labour and expense incurred by another for the purposes of a rival publication, and thereby save himself the expense and labour of working out and arriving at these results by some independent road. If this was not so, there would be practically no copyright in such a work as a directory. Moreover, it is not necessary for me to define the extent to which the defendants might have gone, or may go, in using the plaintiff's directory. What I have to determine is, whether they could lawfully do what they actually did. Now it is plain that it could not be lawful for the defendants simply to cut the slips which they have cut from the plaintiff's directory, and insert them in theirs. Can it then be lawful to do so because, in addition to doing this, they sent persons with the slips to ascertain their correctness? I say clearly not." Therefore, it is quite clear in both those cases that the parties had gone very far beyond anything stated in the 13th and 16th paragraphs of Mr. Wright's affidavit. They had virtually and bodily copied from the book; they had copied from the very slip; and all they had done was to take the slip, and vary it, and nothing else. As pointed out by Mr. Wright's affidavit, it is a very different thing undoubtedly. In Pike v. Nicholas we had this—two rival works were published with reference to the same subject-matter; and we thought certainly that the defendant had been guided by the plaintiff's book, more or less, to the authorities which the plaintiff had cited; but it was a perfectly legitimate course for the defendant to refer to the plaintiff's book, and if he did, taking that book as his guide himself, go to the original authorities, and compile his book from the original authorities, he made no unfair or improper use of the plaintiff's book. And so here, if the fact be that Mr. Wright used the plaintiff's book in order to guide him as to the persons whom it would be worth his while to call on, and for no other purpose, he made a perfectly legitimate use of the plaintiff's book. Of course, the law so laid down, no doubt, would govern this case in the court below, but I do not wish to say anything whatever to prejudice what the ultimate facts of this case may be, supposing the plaintiff makes out such a case as he alleges by his bill; but what I do think in the present state of things is, that the Vice-Chancellor did that which was right between the parties. There was no case whatever for an injunction, there being no book even in print, and no publication of any kind; the plaintiff being in this position, beyond all doubt—that if that was published, which he says the defendant has compiled, he could restrain it.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF HALIFAX.

Under these circumstances, although I regret it, I must refuse the appeal with costs.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR and Lord Justice GIFFARD.)

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF HALIFAX.

Practice—Withdrawal of appeal—What costs to be allowed to respondent.

An appeal was presented against a decree made in a suit by information and bill. The appellants memorialised the Attorney-General so withdraw his fiat, and he was attended by all parties. He refused to interfere, and held that he had no power to deal with the costs of attending him. The appellants then gave notice that they should withdraw their appeal, and at once served notice of motion accordingly. The respondents asked for a direction that the costs before the Attorney-General should be in terms included in the costs to be paid by the appellants. But

Their Lordships refused any special direction, and ordered only that the appellants should pay all such costs as they would have had to pay if the appeal had on that day been dismissed with costs.

This was an original motion by leave of their Lordships on behalf of the defendants, that they might be at liberty to withdraw a petition of appeal, which they had presented against a decree of James, V.C., they undertaking to pay to the plaintiff and informant such costs as by the order for setting down the said appeal they might be liable to pay, and that the deposit on the appeal might be returned to them. His Honour's decree is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 52, and by it an injunction was decreed to restrain a contemplated extension of certain works by which a stream called the Hebble Brook was polluted.

The appeal was on this day about fourteen out of their Lordships' printed list, and it was stated that probably no costs had been incurred by the plaintiff, and it was desired to avoid all further costs.

The common form of setting down an appeal for hearing is that the appeal shall be set down for hearing, upon the petitioners or their solicitors, subscribing the said petition, thereby consenting to pay such costs as the court may think fit to award in respect of any proceedings had (if any) since the decree made at the hearing.

Bristowe, Q.C., appeared to support the motion, of which notice had been given, and, having stated the facts as above, was stopped by the court.

Ince, for the plaintiff and informant, stated that until very lately an appellant could not withdraw his appeal; and though the modern practice had altered that rule, it was necessary for the court to say in each case what costs were to be allowed. On the 8th July 1869 the Vice-Chancellor made the decree; the petition of appeal was presented and set down on the 3rd November, and the order setting it down was served. The appellants then memorialised the Attorney-General to direct the withdrawal of his fiat. This memorial was presented ex parte, but the Attorney-General gave notice that he would hear all parties on the 30th November, on the memorial. All parties accordingly attended him by counsel, when he declined to interfere, but held that he had no power to deal with the costs of that application. Notice of withdrawal of the appeal was given on the next day. He now asked that their Lordships would give special directions as to these costs, without which, as he alleged, the taxing master would not include them, and he cited and, as to the 20*l.* deposit,

Brashier v. Wyatt, 16 W. R. 182.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said.—Mr. Bristowe, your clients must pay all such costs as if on this day the appeal had been dismissed with costs, including the costs of this motion. I confess it appears to me that the reason of the rule is extremely simple—that whereas, up to the time when that rule was adopted, persons who were minded to withdraw from a contest were obliged to incur the expense of preparing briefs for counsel, to have the matter solemnly argued, and solemnly disposed of in court, they are now permitted by the new system to withdraw at any time they think proper, with less expense incurred in simply making the application to the court, and submitting to the terms, if the matter has not been heard on its merits, of paying all such costs as the court should think fit. What more can be given to anybody than all the costs he would have had if the petition of appeal had been dismissed with costs? It was not intended by the undertaking to put the party under any sort of pressure or penalty, or to do more than if the petition had come to a hearing and had been dismissed with costs, but only to relieve him of some portion of the costs, which might be incurred if he were obliged to bring it on. Therefore the obvious justice of the case is, that the party shall be put in the same position as if he had brought it on, and had been directed to pay all the costs, and it is not because he has given an undertaking of this description that he should pay more costs than he would have been compelled to pay otherwise. There have been some intermediate proceedings before the Attorney-General, as to which it appears there is a difficulty as to the Attorney-General granting the costs; but if the difficulty be so, it might just as well have been so before the case had come on before James, V.C. and before the Vice-Chancellor had dismissed the information with costs. It would have been exactly the same. He would have given no special directions. If they were costs in the cause they would have to be paid for. If they were not costs in the cause they would not have to be paid for. I think the form of order I have suggested will meet the justice of the case.

Re THE ESTATES INVESTMENT COMPANY;
ASHLEY'S CASE.

Company—Winding-up—Contributory—Fraudulent prospectus—Laches.

A., amongst a number of other persons, was induced by misrepresentations to take shares in a company. On discovering that they had been deceived, a number of the shareholders repudiated their shares and formed themselves into a committee to protect themselves, and agreed to be bound by the result of a representative suit instituted against the company by one of their number. A. did not join the committee, and did not repudiate his shares until the representative suit had terminated in favour of the plaintiff. He then demanded back the money which he had paid on his shares, but took no active steps to have his name removed from the register of the shareholders on which he remained at the date of the winding-up of the company:

Held, that he had lost his remedy by laches, and that he must be settled on the list of contributories.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the official liquidator of the above named company to settle Mr. Ashley's name on the list of contributories in respect of thirty shares under the following circumstances:

Ashley, amongst a number of other persons, had been induced by the misrepresentations contained in the prospectus to take shares in the company on its formation in February 1865. In the following June several persons who had applied for shares on the faith of these representations repudiated their shares and formed themselves into a committee to protect their interests by legal means, and to resist any actions that might be brought against any of them by the company. On their refusal to make any payments in respect of their shares, actions were commenced against them separately by the company; these were consolidated, and ultimately stayed by order of Martin, B., until the decree should be made in Ross v. The Estates Investment Company, a representative suit which had been instituted by Ross at the instance of the committee to have his name removed from the register of shareholders. By an arrangement with the solicitor of the company it was agreed that the other dissentient allottees should not be prejudiced by their not taking proceedings pending the decision in Ross's case. The company was ordered to be wound-up on the 16th March 1867, and it was not till after that date that the suit of Ross v. The Estates Investment Company was finally decided by the Court of Appeal in favour of Ross: (Vide 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 272; L. Rep. 3 Eq. 122, and on appeal 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 61; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 682.)

Ashley was not a member of the committee of dissentient allottees, nor did he in any way join with them, or agree to abide by the result of Ross's suit; and he did not become a client of the solicitor employed by the dissentient allottees until after the date of the winding-up order. At a meeting of the company held on the 18th July 1865, he learned that the prospectus was alleged to contain misrepresentations; and at the same time he heard of the institution of the suit by Ross to have his name removed on the ground aforesaid. He afterwards received a circular from the secretary of the company, stating that arrangements had been made for the settlement of the questions which had been raised between the company and the dissentient allottees.

Ashley took no steps to repudiate his shares until after the decision of Wood, V.C. in Ross v. The Estates Investment Company (sup.) which was pronounced on the 18th Nov. 1866, and a report of which Ashley read in the Times newspaper. Soon afterwards he called at the office of the company and asked them to return the money which he had paid on his shares, but he was in reply informed by the secretary that the money could not then be repaid, as the company were about to appeal from the Vice-Chancellor's decision. His name was afterwards removed from the list of contributories, on the ground that his case came within Pawle's case 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 100, 589; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 497, in which it was held that Pawle, a member of the committee, had not lost his right to have his name removed from the list of contributories by having awaited, under the above-mentioned arrangement with the company, the result of Ross's suit.

The present summons was taken out to settle Ashley's name on the list, on the ground that he had lost his right to relief by laches.

Roxburgh, Q. C. (Higgins with him), for the official liquidator, contended that as Ashley's name was on the register of shareholders at the date of the winding-up, and he had taken no proceedings against the company to repudiate his shares, he must now be fixed on the list. He cited

Re The Cleveland Iron Company, Ex parte Stevenson, 16 W. R. 95.

Jessel, Q. C., Swanston, Q. C., and Everitt, for Ashley, contended that there was in this case everything to entitle him to be removed from the list of contributories; there was misrepresentation on the part of the directors, there was no act on the part of Ashley to affirm the contract, and he had verbally repudiated his shares. They cited

Re The Reece River Company, L. Rep. 4 E. & I. 64; Scholey v. Central Railway Company of Venezuela, 14 W. R. 786.

Lord ROMILLY.—I think Mr. Ashley must be fixed on the list of contributories. The leading principle in all these cases is, that a man must not play fast and loose. It is the duty of a shareholder in a case like this to go and ascertain for himself whether there has been a misrepresentation or not. He attended the meeting of the 18th July 1865; and instead of joining the committee of dissentient allottees, and agreeing to be bound by the result of Ross's suit, as he might have done, he did what amounted to nothing at all; he remained in such a position that if the company proved successful he could have insisted on retaining his shares. The secretary's reply to this application to have his money returned amounts to nothing; he did not say that if the company failed in their appeal they would pay. I am of opinion that this case is not governed by Pawle's case (sup.), but by Scholey v. The Central Railway Company of Venezuela (sup.), and that Mr. Ashley, therefore, must be fixed on the list of contributories.

Re THE LONDON, HAMBURG, AND CONTINENTAL EXCHANGE BANK.
ZULUETA'S CASE.

Company—Payment by directors ultra vires—Remedy.

The directors of a bank instructed their broker to buy a round number of shares in order to keep up their price in the market. The broker accordingly bought and paid for a large number of shares, which were transferred afterwards into the name of a trustee for the bank. In payment for them the secretary of the bank gave the broker a ticket to be delivered to the cashier directing him to credit the broker's account at the bank with the amount which he had paid for the shares, and his account was credited therewith accordingly:

Held, that, assuming the payment to have been made ultra vires, it could not be disallowed in the winding-up, as the transaction was concluded by crediting the broker's account with the amount, though it might have otherwise if the transaction had remained in fieri:

Held, also, that it was not the duty or the business of the broker to construe the articles of association of the company, or to decide whether the directors were or were not exceeding their powers.

Semble, that if the transaction was ultra vires, the only remedy of the shareholders was against the directors personally.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Messrs. Zulueta for leave to prove in the name of a Mr. Henry in the winding-up of the above bank for 1843l. 11s. 5d. under the following circumstances:

In Nov. 1864 the directors of the bank, in order to keep up the price of their shares in the market, instructed Mr. Henry, their broker, to buy a round number of shares in the market. The directors made no entry of it in their minute-book, but they called Mr. Henry into the board room and gave him his instructions, using the expression "a round number" of shares, and they informed him that some of the shares would be taken by the directors personally, and the remainder by the company.

Henry accordingly bought 175 shares at the average price of 11l. 1s 4d. per share, and paid for them out of his own moneys. Two of these shares were afterwards transferred into the name of one Edmands, and Henry was paid for them; sixty more were transferred into the names of the various directors, all of whom paid Henry for them; the remaining 113 shares were first transferred into the name of one Hunt, one of the clerks of the bank, in trust for the company, and afterwards into the name of a Mr. Marshall as the nominee of the bank. For these 113 shares Henry had paid 1843l. 11s. 5d.; and he was paid for them by the bank in this manner: the secretary of the bank gave him a ticket to be delivered to the cashier, directing the latter to credit Henry's account at the bank with the amount, which was accordingly done; and Henry continued to draw upon and pay into his account, as he had previously been in the habit of doing. At this time the account showed a balance of upwards of 18,000l. in his favour.

Henry also acted as broker for Messrs. Zulueta, who were in the habit of placing large sums in his hands for investment; and in March 1865, when the winding-up began, Henry had nearly 15,000l. standing to his credit at the bank. This sum in fact belonged to Messrs. Zulueta, who had already obtained leave to prove for the whole amount, with the exception of the sum of 1843l. 11s. 5d., for which the official liquidator refused to allow Messrs. Zulueta to prove, on the ground that the directors had no power to purchase the shares on behalf of the bank, that the purchase was a breach of trust, of which Henry was cognisant, and, therefore, that the transaction was not binding on the company.

Jessel, Q. C., and F. O. Haynes, for Messrs. Zulueta, contended that the directors had power to purchase shares in the bank and to expend the moneys of the company for that purposes, and that, even if the transaction were ultra vires, the giving of the credit ticket by the secretary, and the crediting of Henry's account with the money, amounted to actual payment, and concluded the transaction. They referred to

London, Hamburg, and Continental Exchange Bank v. Henry, L. Rep. 7 E

Roxburgh, Q. C., and Graham Hastings, for the official liquidator, contended that the transaction was ultra vires, as the articles of association did not authorise the directors to invest the funds of the company in the purchase of their own shares; and that it was a breach of trust of which Henry must be assumed to have been cognisant, as all persons dealing with a company have implied notice of the articles of association; and, consequently, that Zulueta, as claiming through Henry, was not entitled to prove for the amount credited to Henry under these circumstances. They cited

Feb. 7.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is an application for leave to prove for 1843*l.* 11*s.* 5*d.* against the bank. The amount is not in dispute, neither is it in dispute that the claimant is entitled to stand in exactly the same situation as Mr. Henry, the late stockbroker of the company. The question is, whether Mr. Henry is entitled to prove for the sum against the bank; in other words, whether he is a creditor of the company. The facts are these. [His Lordship stated the facts of the case, and continued:] By a round number I consider that the directors made a considerable or large number of shares, but that the number was left entirely to Mr. Henry's discretion. The facts of the case being as I have stated, it is difficult to understand how the directors or the official liquidator, which is the same thing, can now say that Henry is not to be at liberty to prove for this amount. It is said that the act of the directors was ultra vires, and that it does not bind the company; but assuming this to be the case, it is difficult to see how they can recover back from a person to whom they have paid the money for the goods bought the money so paid. Suppose the transaction to be wholly ultra vires, and that the company had joined, how could the directors or the company, in taking the accounts with their stock broker, disallow this item, or require it to be refunded by him? If the transaction was still in fieri it might be so, but when it is concluded, and the money paid, what other remedy have the shareholders of the company than to require the directors personally to repay the money so improperly expended by them. For I consider the transaction in effect exactly the same as if the secretary had directed the cashier to pay the money in bank notes to Mr. Henry, and he had done so, and the amount had never appeared in his account at all. It was not the duty or the business of Henry to construe the articles of association of the company, or to decide whether the directors were or were not exceeding their powers. This was a matter for their consideration. Also, how was he to know how many were intended for the company, and how many for the directors or nominees of the directors? One hundred and seventy-three shares were delivered by him to the company; it was not his function to distribute them, or to award sixty to the directors and one hundred and thirteen to the company; all that he was required to do was to deliver the shares, and what he was entitled to was to be paid for the shares which he bought under their instructions. It would be an endless and indeed an impossible matter for every person who has dealings with a joint-stock company to ascertain whether the transaction is within their power and authority. If it were, it would be necessary in some cases to take the opinion of counsel on the subject, and it would in every case paralyse the powers and functions of the board, with whom no one would deal under such a restriction, unless the order was accompanied by an opinion of counsel, and indeed even then the trader would not always be safe. My opinion is that Henry is entitled to prove, and that the remedy of the shareholders, if any, is against the directors of the company personally.

Re THE UNIVERSAL BANKING CORPORATION (LIMITED);

MACKRETH'S AND STRANG'S CASE.

Company—Contributory and creditor—Assignment of debt—Balance order—Set-off—Composition-deed—Jurisdiction.

A shareholder and creditor of a company who subsequently to the winding-up of the company assigned the debt due to him:

Held, not entitled to set-off the debt against a sum claimed for calls.

A liquidator of a company who refused to prove for calls under a composition-deed, executed by a contributory after the winding-up:

Held, entitled to an order for payment of the calls; but that leave must be obtained from the Court of Bankruptcy before process could issue.

This was an adjourned summons taken out on behalf of a Mr. Mackreth to set aside a balance order obtained against him by the official liquidator of the above company, in respect of a sum of 2550*l.* (residue of a sum of 3400*l.*) due from and ordered to be paid by him for calls on 340 shares in the company.

The facts were as follows:—

The company was incorporated under the Companies Act 1862. Shortly after its formation Mackreth became the holder of the shares in question, and advanced to the company a sum of about 9000*l.* On the 22nd June 1866 an order was made for the compulsory winding-up of the company, and on the 20th Dec. in the same year Mackreth assigned the debt due to him from the company to a Mr. Strang.

In Oct. 1867 Mackreth executed a deed of arrangement with his creditors, whereby he covenanted to pay them a composition of 1*s.* in the pound. In the schedule of the deed (which was duly executed and registered under the Bankruptcy Act 1861) the official liquidator's claim for the 2550*l.* was inserted as a debt due from Mackreth to the company.

On the 16th June 1868 Strang gave the liquidator notice of the assignment of the debt due from the company to Mackreth.

On the 8th July in the same year, the list of contributories of the company (including Mackreth's name) was settled; and on the 16th July Mackreth went to the official liquidator, and tendered him under the deed of composition the sum of 127*l.* 10*s.*, as a full satisfaction of the 2550*l.* The official liquidator, however, refused to receive the money or to come in under the deed.

In Nov. 1868 a call of 10*l.* per share was made upon the contributories; and in Jan. 1869, the balance order for the 3400*l.* was made, and Mackreth paid (as was admitted) 850*l.* under it. On the 5th June 1869 the list of the creditors of the company was settled, including the name of Strang, the assignee of Mackreth's claim. No dividend, however, had as yet been declared on the debts due from the company.

Dickinson, Q. C. and Bathurst, in support of the summons, contended that the liquidator was bound to accept the composition tendered to him in discharge of his claim. The deed was perfectly valid and acted as a complete bar to any action which the company might bring against Mackreth for their alleged debt. Further, even if Mackreth was not protected by the deed, he was entitled to set-off against the claim of the liquidator an equal amount of the debt of 9000*l.* due to him from the company. Although he had assigned the debt, his assignee could only sue the company for it in his name, and he was still the legal owner of it. They cited

Re Duckworth, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 578; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 580;

Re The Anglo-Greek Steam Navigation Company, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 17; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 706; Blumberg v. Rose, L. Rep. 1 Ex. 232, 314—365.

Greene, Q.C. and Brooksbank for the official liquidator, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I cannot say that I entertain the slightest doubt on the question of set-off. The arguments on the question have proceeded on the fallacy that Mackreth after having parted with all his right to the debt due to him by the company, and made it the property of Strang, still is to be treated as if he had retained some right in respect of it. That is an entire mistake, for if his assignment is good for anything it is an assignment of all his right to recover his debt from the company. In that view of the case, what is now sought by Mackreth is to set-off the debt due from the company to Strang against what he (Mackreth) owes to the company. He cannot, however, assert any such right, because it must necessarily depend on the company owing something to him, and his owing something to the company. After the assignment the company owed nothing to him, and what they now owe in respect of the debt they owe to Strang. There being, therefore, no right of set-off the liquidator is entitled to the balance order claimed. There is a reduction agreed upon, and about that there is no dispute. For that the balance order must go. As to the question affecting the validity and effect of the composition-deed I shall not at present finally dispose of it, because I do not intend that the order I now make shall be drawn up until I have given judgment in the case of Mitchell and Aspinall. Both cases are similar with regard to the deed. I still, however, retain the same opinion that I expressed at the time when I reserved my judgment in Mitchell's and Aspinall's case, and the more I have thought about it the more I am convinced that the words of the Bankruptcy Act of 1861 admit of no doubt. The decision in the Richmond Hotel Company, ex parte King, L. Rep. 4 Eq. 566; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 785; L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 10; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 188, proceeded on the ground that the Court of Bankruptcy had no jurisdiction to say whether process could issue or not, if it were process of contempt (which is only process against the person), and that the Act of Parliament only related to process against the property. Now the language of the statute is as clear as can be, for the 198th section mentions process both against the person and the property. Process for contempt is process against the debtor's person for the purpose of compelling him to pay the debt. That seems, by an inadvertence, to have escaped the attention of the court in dealing with the case I have referred to; but however high the authority of the decision of that court upon this question may be, the words of the Act of Parliament are higher, and, therefore, my impression is, that I am bound to act upon them. If the matter be considered, it is quite clear that following the language of the Act of Parliament is what most conduces to the purposes of justice in this case; for if this balance order is allowed to stand, the liquidator, according to the Act, will not be entitled to issue process without leave of the Court of Bankruptcy. That is perfectly clear. When, therefore, he goes to the Court of Bankruptcy, that court having a clear statutory jurisdiction to administer the trusts of the deed, will decide whether or not, the liquidator is to come in under the deed, or whether he can be allowed to issue process as not being entitled to come in under the deed. If the judge in bankruptcy should say that he must come in under the deed, and the liquidator considers that the deed is a bad one, the question can then be decided by the Lord Chancellor sitting in bankruptcy. The deed is registered in bankruptcy, the Court of Bankruptcy has an express statutory jurisdiction over it, and for other courts to enter into the consideration as to whether the deed is good or bad seems to me a highly inconvenient course. I think also there can be little doubt that questions of this kind can be better disposed of under the paramount jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor in bankruptcy than by an action at law, or by this court. There is another consideration involved. In this case the court, under its statutory jurisdiction and the Companies Act, is administering the assets of this company, and it is the duty of the court in administering those assets to say what are the debts and what the credits of the company. But what a conflict of jurisdiction there would be if I were now to say what is to be done in the administration of Mackreth's estate, with which I have nothing to do. Any order which I might now make might be at variance with the decree of the other branch of the court when it comes to decide upon the administration of the trusts of the deed of composition. It seems to me that this is one of the few cases in which the statute is perfectly clear and distinct, and in which, by following the words of the statute, a liability to error is escaped. The balance order must therefore stand, and the liquidator must carry it to the Court of Bankruptcy. The Lord Chancellor has jurisdiction to say whether that is right or wrong, because it is a question involved in the administration of the trusts of this deed and the assets of Mackreth. The order, however, as I have before observed, will not be drawn up until the order is made in the case of Mitchell and Aspinall. With respect to Mr. Strang's position the liabilities of his assignor attach to him. The order as to that part of the case which affects him will therefore be: Declare a set-off of an equal portion of the debt against the call; let Strang or Mackreth prove for the balance, but order that no dividends be paid on such balance to either Strang, or Mackreth for him, until after the full amount of 2550*l.* has been really paid to the liquidator. The costs of the liquidator will be reserved.

Jan. 31.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR made an order to the effect that the balance order of Jan. 1869 had been rightly obtained, and that the duty of the liquidator would be to apply to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to issue process against Mackreth according to the course of the court of equity.

Hine, upon trust during the life of the said Mary Meade Willing, to permit the same to remain in their then present state of investment, and after her decease to invest the same as therein mentioned; and it was thereby further declared that the said J. P. Hine, his executors, administrators, and assigns, or the trustee or trustees for the time being of the said indenture should stand possessed of such sums, and the securities for the same upon such trusts, and subject to such powers as would correspond with the trusts and powers by the said indenture expressed and declared concerning the said lands and hereditaments, or as near thereto as might be.

The bills of exchange not having been paid at the time they became due, the banking company commenced an action against the defendants, Henry Stretch and Mary Meade Stretch, for the recovery thereof, to which action an appearance was put in; but before judgment could be obtained the defendant Henry Stretch was, on the 27th Feb. 1868, adjudged a bankrupt, and the plaintiff, one of the registered public officers of the company, was, on behalf of the company, appointed creditors' assignee. The amounts due on the said bills of exchange were proved by the company as debts in the bankruptcy, but no dividend was declared, and there were no assets whatever of the bankrupt applicable to the payment of his debts, and he obtained his discharge. The present bill was then filed on behalf of the company, and prayed that it might be declared that the company were entitled to have the rents and profits of the said lands and hereditaments comprised in the said settlement of the 5th Oct. 1867, and the income of the promissory notes therein mentioned, and the securities for the same, during the joint lives of the defendants, Henry Stretch and Mary Meade Stretch, applied in payment of the said several sums of money due to the company upon the said several bills of exchange, and that the defendant J. P. Hine might be directed to pay the same accordingly, or that the beneficial interest of the defendant, Mary Meade Stretch, under the said settlement might be sold, and the proceeds of such sale might be applied in payment of such sums.

J. Pearson Q.C., and J. J. Jervis for the plaintiff, contended that Mrs. Stretch's separate estate was liable to the debts incurred by her before her marriage, and that although at law she was discharged from the debts by the bankruptcy and discharge of her husband, yet in equity the payment of these debts could be enforced against her separate estate. They cited Lindley, for the defendants, argued that the wife's debt was absolutely gone at law, through the discharge of the husband. This bill was to recover a debt which was a legal but not an equitable debt. The legal debt was now gone, therefore the bill could not stand. This court had no jurisdiction to enforce a purely legal demand which had gone. The only case in which a wife's debt incurred before marriage was ordered to be paid out of her separate estate, was Biscoe v. Kennedy already cited; that case had never been acted upon here, and in America the court declined to follow it (Vanderheyden v. Mallory, 1 Comstock, 452). In Jacob's edition of Roper's "Husband and Wife," vol. ii., p. 240, the case was quoted, but without any comment one way or the other. He also referred to 1 Chitty on Pleading, 67.

Pearson, Q.C., in reply.—In all the cases cited a distinction was drawn between separate property and no separate property. The debt did not on marriage cease to be the debt of the wife, though the husband was liable.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This suit raises a point of very great importance. The case raised is this: The plaintiff is one of the registered public officers of the Wilts and Dorset Banking Company, and the defendant, Mrs. Stretch, in the months of March and April 1867, and while a feme sole, became the acceptor for her brother of certain bills of exchange which came into the hands of the banking company. In the month of October following she married the defendant Henry Stretch, and being the possessor of a small property, on the 5th Oct. 1867, in contemplation of the marriage, she conveys all the property to which she is entitled to the defendant John Petty Hine, to such uses as she should appoint, and in default of such appointment to the use of the said J. P. Hine during the joint lives of herself and her husband, upon trust to pay the income to herself for her separate use, but without any restriction on anticipation; and what the plaintiff now claims is this separate life estate. The bank, finding the bills were not paid, brought an action against the husband and wife for the recovery of the money. The husband, however, became bankrupt before judgment was obtained, and it is not disputed that he is completely discharged by his bankruptcy from these bills. Now it is perfectly well settled that upon marriage the husband becomes liable for a debt incurred by his wife before marriage; but it is clear that, the debt being a debt of the wife, the husband and wife must be joined as parties in any action for the recovery of the debt; and it is also clear that if before judgment is obtained the husband becomes bankrupt and obtains his discharge, the wife at law is absolutely discharged for ever from the debt; this was decided in the case of Lockwood v. Salter, 5 B. & Ad. 303, and Miles v. Williams, 1 P. W. 249. There is no doubt, therefore, that the personal liability of both the wife and husband is completely gone by the husband's discharge. But this bill is founded on the principle that, although the wife is personally discharged her property is not discharged. But on the question of principle, if the law is that a woman who contracts debts, and, having abundant means of paying them, marries, and makes a settlement of her property upon her marriage, is to be discharged from such debts, it is a state of things greatly to be deplored. Removing property from the reach of creditors savours of fraud; people are bound to make provision for their debts, and to settle only such part of their property as is free from debts; and I think the court is bound to consider an evasion of this duty, if not a fraud, at all events, an act deserving of strong disapprobation. In the present case no fraud is alleged, for it is said that the husband did not know of the debts at the time of the marriage; but after the marriage he did know of them, and he now resists the payment of them. Here the lady has secured all her property for her life. Is it just or equitable to say that she should be able to defeat her creditors? The question is, whether she can do so? It is clear that if a man is indebted and marries, and reserves to himself a life estate, the law gives this life estate to the creditors. Why should it be different in the case of a woman? On every principle of justice, every interest she may reserve to herself under her settlement should be liable to her debts. But it is said that as this lady is discharged from her debts at law they cannot be enforced in equity. I think, however, that this point is decided by the case of Miles v. Williams (sup.); there Lord Macclesfield, then Parker, C. J., after deciding that the wife is for ever discharged by the discharge of the husband, says, "a case may possibly be put, where a woman being in debt may make over all her effects in trust and then marry a bankrupt, and by that discharge all her debts and yet preserve her estate; but that would be a fraudulent conveyance as against creditors, quoad so much of the estate as would satisfy their debts, and for that they might have remedy." There Lord Macclesfield puts the very case we have here; and I am of opinion that this lady, quoad her estate under the settlement, cannot make a settlement to defeat her creditors; and I entirely agree with his lordship in the opinion that such a settlement is a fraudulent conveyance. The decision in Miles v. Williams was followed in Lockwood v. Salter, but the judges there declined to give any decided opinion as to the case of the wife having separate property, that being an equitable question. I now come to the other cases that have been cited at law. In Sparkes v. Bell, 8 B. & C. 1, the husband and wife were both taken in execution for a debt of the wife's, and an order having been made by Bayley, J., for the discharge of the wife from prison, an application was made to the Court of King's Bench to discharge that order on the ground that the wife had separate estate, although the husband had obtained his discharge as an insolvent debtor. There the court acted on the principle that though the wife may be personally discharged, yet her separate property is not discharged, and granted the application. Bayley, J., said, "When the wife is taken in execution she shall not be discharged unless it appear that she has no separate property, out of which the demand can be satisfied." In Lockwood v. Salter, although it was decided that the wife was personally discharged, yet that eminent judge, Patteson, J., referring to Sparkes v. Bell, as apparently inconsistent with Miles v. Williams, said the application in the former case was to the equitable jurisdiction of the court, and that the wife might have applied for her discharge under the 72nd section of 7 Geo. 4, c. 57, which was not adverted to in the argument, and he thought that that section was intended to operate so as to make the separate property of a married woman available to her creditors, and that on that ground the decision in Sparkes v. Bell might be supported. The court there again recognised the principle that the wife may be personally discharged, but not without giving up her separate property. In Biscoe v. Kennedy (reported in a note to Hulme v. Tennant, 1 Br. C. C. 16), there were two suits, the object of which was to make the wife's separate estate liable for a debt incurred before marriage. In the first suit, the bill was dismissed; but in the second, the separate estate was declared liable to the debt, which was ordered to be paid out of it accordingly. Mr. Lindley says that this case has not been acted upon, and that in America it has not been followed; but I think that if the case had been one of any doubt, it would have attracted Mr. Jacob's attention. In his edition of Roper's "Husband and Wife," vol. ii., p. 240, he cites the case, and though he does not comment upon it, still I must infer that he cites it as good law, and I am of opinion that it is now good law, and I cheerfully follow it, as it is founded on principles of justice and honesty. I am of opinion, therefore, that all Mrs. Stretch's separate estate must be given up to the payment of the debts incurred by her before her marriage, and, accordingly, that the plaintiff is entitled to the decree he asks. There will be no costs for the husband and wife, but the trustee's costs must be a first charge on the wife's life estate.

Mortmain—Charitable legacy—Gift towards the erection of a chapel.

A testator left the residue of his property to his executors, "to be given, used, or employed by them towards the erection of a new Wesleyan chapel in the town of H. instead of the one now in use, when such an erection shall take place."

Held, that the gift was void under the Statute of Mortmain.

Booth v. Carter, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 757 dissented from.

It is a clearly settled rule that a gift of money to be applied in building a chapel, schools, or other charitable object, implies the acquisition of land for the purpose of the building, and is therefore void under the Statute of Mortmain.

This was a petition under the Trustees Relief Act, and related to a bequest contained in the will of the Rev. Abraham Watmough, a Wesleyan minister, the question being whether a bequest towards the erection of a chapel was void under the Statute of Mortmain.

Mr. Watmough died in 1863, and by his will, made in 1861, he left the whole of his estate, after payment of his debts and funeral expenses, to be used and employed by his executors for the sole use and benefit of his wife, as she might require it while living, and to cover the expenses of her funeral, when dead, and the rest of his property he gave, bequeathed, and left in the hands of his executors, "to be given, used, or employed by them toward the erection of a new Wesleyan chapel in the town of St. Helen's instead of the one now in use, when such an erection shall take place."

Mrs. Watmough died in 1868, and the executors after her death paid 534*l.* 8*s.* into court under the Trustee Relief Act, as representing the testator's residuary personal estate. The trustees of the Wesleyan Chapel at St. Helen's presented this petition, which asked that the fund might be paid to them, to be applied by them towards the building of a chapel then in course of erection. The circumstances of the case, which were referred to in the petition were, shortly, that the testator, during his life, had occasionally preached in the Wesleyan Chapel at St. Helen's. This chapel was too small for the congregation, and about the time the testator made his will, discussions, in which he took part, had frequently taken place as to the necessity of erecting a new chapel, and the means of providing funds for that purpose. There was at that time a probability that a new chapel would be built as soon as the funds could be obtained. In 1868 the trustees of the chapel took a lease for 999 years of a piece of land, and a new chapel was now in course of erection upon it, and, when completed, it was to be used instead of the existing chapel. *

Glasse, Q.C. and Rowcliffe for the petitioners, maintained that the bequest towards the erection of a chapel was a valid one. It could not be inferred here that the testator intended that the money which he bequeathed was to be laid out in the purchase of land, and the old doctrine that a bequest was void which tended to bring fresh land into mortmain was over-ruled by the House of Lords in Philpott v. St. George's Hospital (infra), which established the principle that it must appear upon the face of the will that the testator intended the money to be laid out in the purchase of land. Here the natural construction of the testator's words pointed to the site of the old chapel, which was land already in mortmain. In Booth v. Carter (infra), a bequest in almost precisely similar terms to the present, was held to be valid.

Wickens, for the Attorney-General, supported the prayer of the petition, and took the same line of argument.

Cole, Q.C. and Bird, for the testator's next of kin, opposed the petition, and urged that the bequest was void. It was laid down that a direction to build must be considered as a direction to purchase land for the purpose of building, unless a contrary intention is clearly expressed. In Philpott v. St. George's Hospital, which had been relied upon by the other side, the testator had expressly prohibited the application of money in the purchase of land. Booth v. Carter, was inconsistent with the authorities. Moreover, the gift here was void for remoteness.

Attorney-General v. Bishop of Chester, 1 Bro. C. C. 444.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This case involves important principles, though it relates to a bequest of no great amount. The testator, after giving his property to his wife for her life (which makes no difference as regards the construction of the bequest in question) gives the rest of his property "to be given, used, or employed by his executors towards the erection of a new Wesleyan chapel in the town of St. Helen's instead of the one now in use, when such an erection shall take place." Now it has not been, and could not be, contested, that if the testator had added the words, "on the site of the existing chapel," or had in any way pointed out that the new chapel was to be erected on land already in mortmain, or had expressly prohibited his executors from applying the money in the purchase of a site, the bequest would have been perfectly good. But I have been surprised that the question whether a bequest of money for the purpose of building a chapel is valid or invalid, should have been argued. It is a question which has been discussed for many years, and it is in my opinion clearly established by all the authorities (except the case of Booth v. Carter (sup.), that a naked gift of money to be applied in building anything, whether it be a chapel or school, or any other building, implies the acquisition of land for the purpose of the building, and is, therefore, within the Statute of Mortmain, and is invalid. The rule is stated by Lord Eldon in Attorney-General v. Davies (sup.) to be, that "unless the testator distinctly points," that is to say, by the terms of his will, "to some land already in mortmain, the court will understand him to mean that an interest in land is to be purchased, and the gift is not good." That rule has been acted upon ever since. In Pritchard v. Arbouin (sup.), which has always been considered a leading authority on this subject, the rule is again laid down in almost the same language. In Giblett v. Hobson (sup.) where the terms of the bequest were very similar to those in the present case, although there never was a case in which it was more fit to give a favourable construction to a charitable legacy, for it was perfectly clear from the extrinsic evidence that the testator intended the almshouses to be built on the land already promised to the charity, the Vice-Chancellor (Sir L. Shadwell) and Lord Brougham felt themselves bound to hold the bequest void, because the testator had simply given a direction to build, without referring to land already in mortmain. In Mathew v. Scott (sup.) all these authorities are cited and followed as establishing the rule of the court. I was surprised to hear counsel contend that all these cases have been overruled by the House of Lords in Philpott v. St. George's Hospital (sup.), but I have carefully read that case, and I find that, so far from being overruled or impugned, all these cases are cited, and expressly approved of and affirmed; and each of the learned lords who gave judgment in that case laid down the rule as an established rule, that a direction to lay out money in building implies a direction to purchase land upon which to build. I need only mention the other authorities to the same effect which have been cited: Attorney-General v. Hull (sup.); Dunn v. Bownas (sup.); and the latest authority, Tatham v. Drummond (sup.), in which Lord Westbury, in accordance with all the decisions, held that a direction to build slaughterhouses implied the necessity of purchasing land, and was therefore void. Philpott v. St. George's Hospital has really nothing to do with this case; there the testator not only directed that the money should be laid out in building on land which was to be provided from other sources, but, to avoid all possibility of doubt, he expressly prohibited the application of his money in or towards the purchase of land. It is in my opinion so important that the rules of construction should be free from doubt, and that every one should be able, upon reading the will, to say whether a bequest is valid or invalid, that I should not have called upon the counsel for the respondent in this case if it had not been for the decision of the Master of the Rolls in Booth v. Carter (sup.). I asked Mr. Cole to distinguish that case from the present, but he failed to do so, and in my opinion the two cases are undistinguishable. The only additional words in the bequest in this case, viz., "when such an erection shall take place," merely express that which would have been implied if it had not been expressed, and consequently they have no effect upon the construction. In Booth v. Carter the Master of the Rolls seems to have allowed himself to be influenced by the extrinsic evidence that there was land already in mortmain on which the chapel might be built. But in my opinion the rule is clearly settled, that in order to uphold such a bequest you must find in the will itself, and not outside it, a saving clause rebutting the implication which arises from a direction to build, that land is to be purchased, and as in Booth v. Carter there was nothing in the will but a direction to apply the money in building, I think that the decision in that case is contrary to all the authorities, and to the established rule, which is founded on principles of convenience and justice, and I must, with all respect for the Master of the Rolls, decline to follow it, and must decide that this bequest is void. I hope the case may be carried further, so that this point may be clearly settled by the court of appeal.

JOHNSTON v. RENTON.

JOHNSTON v. PARSEY.

Shares in company—Forged transfer—Rights of owner.

On bill filed by plaintiff, the owner of shares in a railway company, which had been transferred to innocent purchasers by deeds of transfer to which the name of the plaintiff was forged by the person to whom he had intrusted the shares for safe custody, against the company and the innocent purchaser, praying that the purchaser might be decreed to deliver up the certificate to the plaintiff, and that the company might be decreed to cancel the alleged transfer, and to deliver to the plaintiff a new stock certificate:

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the relief prayed, but that, under the circumstances, his own negligence having facilitated the forgery, he was not entitled to costs.

Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway, 1 J. & H. 243, followed.

The object of both these suits was to obtain the decree of the court that the defendants Renton and Parsey should deliver to the plaintiff certain railway stocks, and that the railway companies should re-enter the name of the plaintiff in their books as the owner of such stock.

The facts in the first suit were as follows:—

William Johnston in 1865 delivered the certificates for twenty-five fully paid-up shares in the Metropolitan District Railway Company for safe keeping with George Edward Hudson, as manager of the United Service Company Bank (Limited), with which company the plaintiff kept a banking account, and on the 4th Sept. 1865, Hudson gave the plaintiff a receipt for the certificates.

On the 25th Sept. 1865, the shares were converted into stock, and the plaintiff was registered as the owner of such stock. Shortly afterwards the certificate for the same was given to the plaintiff, who signed a receipt for it, and at the same time gave his address as at 9, Waterloo-place, where the United Service Company Bank carried on business, saying it was the address of his agent George Edward Hudson, who had the charge of the share certificates.

On the 12th Nov. 1867, the plaintiff gave Hudson the stock certificates for the purpose of keeping them safe, and Hudson received the dividend and put it to the plaintiff's credit in his banking account.

The United Service Company in June 1868, passed a resolution for voluntarily winding-up the affairs of the company. About this time Hudson began to carry on a banking business on his own account, and sold the plaintiff's railway stock of which he held the certificates to the defendant Renton, who purchased them in the ordinary course of business on the Stock Exchange. Hudson forged the plaintiff's name to the deed of transfer. On the 7th July the registrar of the railway company having received the forged transfer and the stock certificate, wrote to the plaintiff to inform him that the transfer was lodged for registration, and directed the letter to 9, Waterloo-place. No answer being received, the transfer was duly registered, and a new stock certificate was given to Renton.

A short time before the 4th Nov. 1868 Hudson absconded, and about the same time the plaintiff discovered the forgery; and on the 6th Nov. his solicitors wrote to Renton, and also to the secretary of the railway company, informing them of the forgery and requiring the transfer to be cancelled. Renton replied that he did not consider himself liable to return the stock. On the 20th Nov. 1868 this bill was filed, and on the 14th April 1869 it was amended. The bill prayed that the defendant Renton might be decreed to deliver to the plaintiff the stock certificate, and that the railway company should cancel the forged transfer, and re-enter the plaintiff's name in their books as the owner of such stock, and that all dividends accrued and to accrue on such stock since the alleged transfer took place should be paid to the plaintiff.

The defendant Renton denied the fact of the forgery, and insisted that he had a good legal title to the stock; and even admitting the allegations in the bill, the plaintiff, whatever his remedy might be against the company was entitled to none as against him, and that the plaintiff had, by his own negligence, so contributed to the fraud as to prevent him obtaining that relief to which he might otherwise be entitled.

The following were the facts in the second suit: The plaintiff was the owner of 200*l.* stock of the London and South-Western Railway Company, the certificates for which he deposited with Hudson as manager of the United Service Company for safe custody, and the plaintiff requested by letter the treasurer of the railway company to pay all dividends accruing thereon to his agents the United Service Company, and in a postscript he gave his address at the East India United Service Club. Towards the end of June 1868 Hudson, without the knowledge of the plaintiff, sold this stock to the defendant Parsey, giving him a transfer deed purporting to be signed by the plaintiff, and also the certificates of the stock. The defendant Parsey sent the transfer-deed to the treasurer of the railway company for the purpose of being registered. The treasurer then wrote a letter to the plaintiff, addressed to his club, inclosing a notice which he begged to be returned to him after being signed by the plaintiff if the transfer was correct. Receiving no answer to this letter, the treasurer wrote two more letters to the same purport and directed to the same address, to the last of which the following reply was received:

14, St. James'-square, 16th July, 1868.

SIR,—In reply to yours of the 11th and 15th instant, I beg to say that I have executed a deed of transfer of the 200l. stock held by me in the London and South-Western Railway. I am, Sir, your obedient servant, W. JOHNSTON.
To the Treasurer of the London and South-Western Railway.

Hudson, who by some means had become acquainted with the contents of the treasurer's letters, forged the above reply. In consequence of that reply the transfer was registered in the name of the defendant Parsey. Within four days after the plaintiff discovered the forgery his solicitor wrote to the treasurer of the company, informing him of the fact of the fraud. The treasurer replied that the shares had been transferred into the name of the defendant Parsey. The plaintiff's solicitors wrote another letter threatening the railway company with proceedings if the company did not cancel the transfer and restore the stock to the plaintiff. The company not acceding to the request, this bill was filed, which prayed for relief in the same manner as in the first issue, except as to payment of the dividend.

Willcock, Q. C. and Graham Hastings were for the plaintiff.

Fry, Q. C., and Streeten appeared for the Metropolitan District Railway Company.

Fry, Q. C., and Gaselee for the London and South-Western Railway Company.

Lindley and Stirling were for the defendant Renton.

Amphlett, Q. C., and Lindley were for the defendant Parsey.

The following cases were cited in the course of the argument:—

Taylor v. Great Indian Peninsula Railway Company, 4 De G. & J. 559;

Governor and Company of the Bank of Ireland v. Trustees of Evans's Charity, 5 H. L. Cas. 389, 413;

Taylor v. Midland Railway Company, 28 Beav. 287; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 588; Sloman v. Bank of England, 14 Sim. 475.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—Both these cases appear to me to be on all fours with Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Company, both as to the relief prayed and as to the costs. In this case, no doubt, the plaintiff had a right to say, "I am the owner of stock and the company will not acknowledge my right." I am of opinion that it would have been quite competent to the plaintiff, if he had been so advised, to have filed a bill against the company alone, saying, "I am owner of this stock, I am a shareholder. You have put somebody else's name on the register. This is a matter I have nothing to do with, any more than if you had given it to anybody without authority. I claim that I had 500l. stock, and I still have it, it never having been transferred." He might have filed his bill against the company for that purpose; and if he had done that, the company might probably have insisted that somebody else should have been made a party, and if the company had so insisted, then there would have been a different question as to costs. No such opportunity was given to the company here. The company, if such opportunity had been given, would probably have given notice to the transferees that if they did not come in as defendants they, the company, would retransfer the fund back into the name of the transferor, or something of that kind. However that may be, the facts here are substantially the same as in the case of Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Company; that is to say, a forged instrument, together with the possession of the deeds, was presented to the company; the company acted upon that; the person who claimed under the forged instrument was made a defendant; the company was also made a defendant, and the decree in that case was to restore the debentures to the plaintiff whose name had been forged. But at the same time the conclusion of the Vice-Chancellor's judgment was that it was not a case for costs. I am bound to say I cannot see any distinction between that case and this; at all events, any distinction which is in favour of the plaintiff, because, as far as I can make out, there was no negligence of any kind attributable to the parties there, except that they all three joined in depositing the instrument in the hands of one solicitor. In this case I am bound to say there is some evidence of negligence, or, at least, of misplaced confidence, on the part of the plaintiff, which misplaced confidence has led to the loss; and it would, therefore, be very hard, as it seems to me, to throw the costs arising from the plaintiff's misplaced confidence on the other parties who have been misled by it. The facts are these: In the first place, as to one company, he gave his address at the banker's, who, through their manager allowed the certificates to get out of their hands. He trusted the certificates with them; that is part of the trust which he reposed in the bank. He then told the company that any notice to be sent to him connected with these shares was to be sent to the bank. The notices were sent to the bank, and thereby the company was deprived of the protection which they otherwise would have had. Then he says, "It was all wrong, it was a gross fraud of the manager of the bank." But who was it who trusted the bank, and who was it who, through the bank, trusted the manager? Why, the plaintiff. It seems to me, therefore, that, in the first place, the plaintiff has by his own negligence led to the proceedings. In the second suit he says he gave his address at his club. In some way or other the club must have received authority from him to hand the letters over to the person who got them, and it was the plaintiff's business to have taken care that letters of business were sent to him at his own proper address. Not having done that, he has also in that respect contributed to the loss by his own want of precaution, or his own misplaced confidence in somebody else, which comes to the same thing. Therefore, it seems to me that this is a much stronger case than that of Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Company for following the decision of the Vice-Chancellor, and saying that this is not a case for costs against either of the defendants. The remedy will be simply, in the first suit, to decree the company to cancel the alleged transfer of the 500l. stock to the defendant Renton, and the entry of such alleged transfer, and to enter the name of the plaintiff in their books as the owner of such 500*l.* stock, and to deliver to the plaintiff a certificate of the ownership of such stock. I think the company must pay the dividend. I think the plaintiff has a right to have it, whether against the person who has received it, or against the company. In the first suit, therefore, the order for payment of the dividend will be against the company. In the second suit, I think the plaintiff has a right to say, "You have paid my money, and you must repay it to me." It will exactly follow the words in Cottam v. Eastern Counties Railway Company. The decree will be without prejudice to any question between the co-defendants in equity as well as at law.

Re ALBERT LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY;

COOK AND EDWARDS' CASE.

Assurance Company—Petition to wind-up—Premium payable after presentation of petition.

The non-payment by a policy-holder of a premium falling due after the presentation of a winding-up petition, in which an order for winding-up is ultimately made, does not affect the policy-holders' claim against the company, in respect of the policy.

The question raised by this petition was whether a policy was forfeited by non-payment of the premium after a petition to wind-up the company had been presented.

The premiums on the policies in question were payable on the 7th Aug., and the thirty days' grace allowed by the rules of the company for the payment of premiums expired on the 7th Sept. In the mean time, on the 11th Aug., a petition for winding-up the company was presented, and on the 17th Sept. the order to wind-up the company was made.

Eddis, Q. C., and Lindley, for Cook and Edwards, contended that they were not bound to pay the premiums after the petition to wind-up the company had been presented, and referred to

The Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 84:

Re Smith, Knight, and Company, ex parte Ashbury, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 223;

Kay, Q. C. and Higgins appeared for the official liquidators of the company, and submitted that the contract between the policy-holders and the company was not put an end to by the presentation of a petition to wind-up the company, and that the policy-holder must go on paying the premium due on his policy until the time arrived for proving for the amount of his claim. The time fixed by the General Orders of Nov. 1862, rule 25, for ascertaining the liability of a company in course of winding-up was not the date of the commencement of the winding-up, but the date of the winding-up order. The premium in this case not having been paid within the thirty days' grace, which expired before the winding-up order was made, the policy had been forfeited. They cited the following cases in support of their argument:

Re Trent and Humber Company, ex parte Cambrian Steam Packet Company, L. Rep. 4 Ch 112;

Ex parte Mendel, 1 De G. J. & S. 330.

Eddis, Q. C. was not heard in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that nothing in this case had occurred to interfere with the rights of the policy-holder. There was a contract between this gentleman and the company to the effect that if he would pay a certain sum every year on a certain day, they on their part would, after his death, pay a certain sum to his representatives. The performance of this contract the company had rendered impossible for this gentleman to perform, for, on the 11th Aug. 1869, a petition to wind-up the company was presented, and on the 17th Sept. a winding-up order was made which was quite inconsistent with the contract. By this order the funds of the company were transferred to the official liquidator, whose duty it was to apply them in discharge of the liabilities of the company. For all practical purposes it was the company and not the policy-holder who determined this contract. The case mentioned by the learned counsel for the company, in which a company sought, by means of a winding-up order, to be relieved from their contract, and in which case damages were recovered against them, was not applicable to the present case. In the present case the amount of damages should be ascertained on the day of the commencement of the winding-up. The claimant is entitled to prove notwithstanding the non-payment of the premium. The costs to come out of the assets of the company.

THE BRIGHTON TURNPIKE TRUSTEES v. THE SURVEYORS OF THE HIGHWAYS OF THE PARISH OF PRESTON.

Turnpike-road—Order of contribution for repairs for parishes—Principle of computation.

When an application is made to justices at the instance of turnpike trustees for an order of contribution upon the parishes through which the road runs towards its repair, such order should be made upon the principle of the actual costs of repairs of the road in each parish, and not upon a mileage principle.

*Where, therefore, the trustees of a turnpike-road were authorised by their Act to expend annually 850*l.* upon the repairs of their road, and finding that sum was insufficient they applied to justices for an order of contribution upon the several parishes through which their road ran, and in doing so represented that they had expended the 850*l.* upon the mileage principle, whereby a larger contribution was required from parish P. than would have been required had they expended on the road in such parish a fair proportion of the 850*l.* according to its relative wear and tear:*

*Held, that the trustees were wrong, and that the justices having estimated what would be the fair relative proportion of the 850*l.* to have applied to the repair of the road in such parish, and having made an order for the deficiency, they were right in so doing.*

This was a case stated by Justices under the 20 & 21 Vict., c. 48, as follows.

At a special sessions for highways, held at Hove, in the county of Sussex, on the 1st March 1869, an information by Edward Waugh, clerk to the appellants, was exhibited before the justices under the 4 & 5 Vict., c. 59 (which statute has been continued by several subsequent statutes to the present time),

Q. B.] BRIGHTON TURNPIKE TRUSTEES v. THE SURVEYORS OF HIGHWAYS OF PRESTON. [Q. B.]

stating that the funds of the Brighton, Cuckfield, and West Grinstead Turnpike Trust, applicable under the Brighton, Cuckfield, and West Grinstead Turnpike Roads Act 1854 (the local Act by which the trustees are authorised to levy tolls upon the roads, for the repairs and maintaining the same), were insufficient for the repairs of the turnpike road within the parish of Preston, and praying that the justices would proceed to make such judgment and order in the premises, as upon examination to the justices would seem meet, and as to law did appertain. The justices examined into the allegations contained in the information, and it appearing to them that the allegations were true, they did adjudge and order that the respondents should pay to the appellants the sum of 53*l.* out of the highway rates to be levied in the parish of Preston, such sum of 53*l.* to be wholly laid out in the actual repairs of such part of the turnpike road as lies within the parish of Preston. The appellants were dissatisfied with the determination of the justices, upon the hearing of the information, as being erroneous in point of law; and having duly applied to them to state and sign a case setting forth the facts and grounds of their determination for the opinion of this court, the following case was stated:—

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved and admitted by both parties:—The Turnpike Trust is regulated by the Brighton Cuckfield and West Grinstead Turnpike Roads Act 1854, which Act is to be taken and considered as part of this case, and is hereinafter referred to as the local Act. Sect. 25 of the local Act, provides for the application of the revenue of the trust in the following order: First, in paying the expenses of the Act. Secondly, in paying the expenses of erecting a new toll house, in lieu of the Preston gate. Thirdly, in paying the expenses of repairing toll gates, and in salaries and general management, not exceeding in any one year the sum of 174*l.* Fourthly, in paying the expenses, not exceeding the sum of 850*l.* in any one year, of maintaining and keeping in repair the said roads. Fifthly, in paying interest at 3*l.* 10*s.* per cent. on 2761*l.*, a portion of the debt due on the roads. Sixthly, in paying interest at the rate as aforesaid, on 4700*l.* the remainder of the debt. Seventhly and eighthly, in reducing the principal of such debt. Ninthly, in paying any further expenses (beyond the sum of 850*l.*) of maintaining, keeping in repair and improving the roads and of putting the Act into execution in reference thereto. There was not any portion of the revenue applicable for the repair of the roads under the ninth clause.

The roads of the trust were of the total length of thirty-five miles, and the proportion of the turnpike road within the parish of Preston was one mile and thirty-eight poles in length. The sum of 850*l.* authorised by the local Act to be expended in repairs of the roads was at the rate of about 24*l.* 6*s.* per mile on the whole length of the roads, and such sum was wholly insufficient for the repairs of the roads. The average cost of the repairs has been the sum of 1200*l.* per annum. In no one of the parishes within which the turnpike road of the trust lies, can it be kept in repair for a sum at the rate of 24*l.* 6*s.* per mile. The estimated cost of repairs for the whole of the road for the year ending 31st Dec. 1869, was the sum of 1350*l.* 13*s.*, out of which the cost of repairing so much of the turnpike road as lay within the parish of Preston for that year was the sum of 142*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* The portion of the turnpike road which lay within the parish of Preston had a large amount of traffic upon it, and was very much used and resorted to by the inhabitants and visitors of Brighton, and costs considerably more to keep in repair than any other portion of the road. There was no toll gate in the parish of Preston, and under the local Act the trustees were prohibited from erecting a toll gate in such parish. The cost of keeping the roads in repair varied considerably in the several parishes, and the following tabular statement shows the length of the road in each parish, and the estimated cost of repairing the same for one year.

The appellants, as trustees of the roads at a meeting held for, among other purposes, that of fixing the amount to be contributed towards the repairs of the roads out of the highway rates of the several parishes within which they lie, had considered and decided that the sum of 850*l.*, which by the local Act they are authorised to expend out of the tolls in the repair of the roads, should be credited to the several parishes within which they lie rateably in proportion to the mileage of road of the trust within each parish; and they consequently applied to the respondents to pay them out of the highway rates for the parish of Preston the difference between the anticipated cost of the actual repairs of such part of the turnpike road as lies within the parish, and the sum (portion of the 850*l.*) which they had on the above-mentioned mileage principle appropriated to the repairs thereof. The respondents contended that the trustees ought to expend the sum of 850*l.* in proportion to the actual wear and tear in each parish.

There was no evidence to show whether the sum of 850*l.*, or any part thereof, had been actually expended in proportion to mileage, or in proportion to wear and tear. Under the mileage principle contended for by the appellants the proportion of the sum of 850*l.* to be spent in the parish of Preston was 27*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.*, leaving a sum of 115*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* to be contributed by the respondents, and this last-mentioned sum the appellants applied to the justices to adjudge and order to be paid by the respondents. The justices were of opinion that—whereas the anticipated cost for the entire year of the repair of all the roads of the trust was 1350*l.* 13*s.*, of which 850*l.* was the sum to be contributed under the local Act out of the tolls, and the excess 500*l.* 13*s.*, the sum to be contributed under the general Act out of the highway rates—it was right that the two sums of 850*l.* and 500*l.* 13*s.* should be apportioned between the several parishes upon one and the same principle, that, namely, in accordance with the anticipated expense for the entire year of repair in each parish and not upon the principle of mere mileage, and as 89*l.* would be the share of the 850*l.* for which the parish of Preston would be entitled to have credit on this principle, the justices ordered the respondents to pay out of the highway rates of the parish of Preston the sum of 53*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, such sum being the difference between 89*l.* and the sum of 142*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, the estimated cost for the entire year of the repairs in that parish. The question of law arising upon the above statements was whether, under the circumstances stated, the decision of the justices was correct, or whether the principle contended for by the appellants was correct? If the court should be of opinion that the principle contended for by the appellants was the correct one, the order is to be amended by increasing the sum of 53*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, thereby ordered to be paid, to the sum of 115*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* But if the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the order is to stand.

Grantham appeared for the appellants, and contended that the decision of the justices was wrong, for that the mileage principle is the one they should have adopted, being not only the simplest, but in its result the fairest.

Merrifield, for the respondents, argued that the justices were right in their decision, for that the just way of apportioning the 850*l.* was according to the relative extent of the wear and tear of the roads in the various parishes.

Grantham was heard in reply.

Rea v. The Justices of Berks, 8 Dowl. 727 ;
Reg. v. South Shields, 23 L. J. 134, M. C. ;
Brown v. Evans, 34 L. J. 101, M. C.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think that our judgment should be for the respondents. The Act of Parliament makes provision for enabling the trustees of turnpike roads where the funds are insufficient to bear the expenditure necessary in repairing the roads to apply for an order for contricution out of the highway rate made for any parish through which the road passes. Now, starting from that point of view, I come to the conclusion that an apportionment according to the mileage principle is wrong. The present is a case of a trust with roads passing through several parishes, one contiguous to Brighton, where the population is large and the traffic heavy, and others being country parishes without any such large population or heavy traffic. In the former class of parishes, a much larger expenditure would be required than in the latter. Now if the fund which the trustees are authorised to raise and expend was sufficient for the repair of the whole system of roads it would be expended according to the proportion required for this or that parish. Instead, however, of being sufficient, it proves to be insufficient, and it therefore becomes necessary to apply for a rate in aid. Suppose then, that for parish A. 100*l.* should be required for the maintenance of the roads, whilst for parish B. 50*l.* would be sufficient, and a rate in aid is required, the amount which the trustees have in hand ought to be expended in the same proportion as it would have been if it had been sufficient without calling for any contribution. Justice and equity require that it should be apportioned between the parishes in proportion to the expenditure required in each for the repairs of the road in each. The justices, therefore, were right in saying that the fund received by the trustees ought to be apportioned in the way suggested by the respondents.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. No doubt the division according to the mileage principle is the more simple of the two, but certainly the more equitable mode of apportioning is according to the expenditure actually required.

HANNEN, J.—I certainly felt some difficulty during the argument, but upon reflection I agree with the opinion expressed by my Lord. If, indeed, it had been intended that the fund should be applied according to the mileage principle, it is somewhat strange that the Legislature should not have said so ; and as they have not, I think that it must have been contemplated that something more was necessary than a mere mileage proportion. It is certainly proper that the greater expenditure required in the repair of any particular portion of the road should be taken into consideration.

Ex parte MARGARET SHORT.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 17 ; 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 87, s. 7)—Second offence—Conviction.

A beerhouse keeper, after the passing of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 (The Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869) was convicted of the offence of keeping her house open for the sale of beer on Sunday before half-past twelve o'clock at noon, and subsequently she was again convicted for refusing to admit a constable to her premises :

Held, that the offence first named was properly treated as an offence within the provisions of the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 87, s. 7, and that the justices were right in treating the last-named offence as a second offence and of awarding a penalty accordingly.

J. Paterson moved for a rule calling upon two justices of Cheshire to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to remove unto this court a certain conviction, made on the 6th Oct. last, against one Margaret Short, for refusing to admit a constable to her premises, which consisted of a beerhouse, whereby she was adjudged to be disqualified from selling beer, ale, &c., for the space of two years. By the 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 85, s. 7, it is enacted

That it shall be lawful for all constables and officers of police, and they are hereby authorised and empowered to enter into all houses which are or shall be licensed to sell beer or spirituous liquors to be consumed upon the premises when and so often as such constables and officers shall think proper ; and if any person having such licence as aforesaid, or any servant or other person in his employ or by his direction, shall refuse to admit, or shall not admit, such constable or officer of police into such house, or upon such premises, such person having such licence shall for the first offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, together with the costs of the conviction, to be recovered within twenty days next after that on which such offence was committed, before one or more justices of the peace ; and it shall be lawful for any two or more justices before whom any such person shall be convicted of such offence for the second time to adjudge (if they shall so think fit) that such offender shall be disqualified from selling beer, ale, porter, cider, or perry, by retail for the space of two years next after such conviction, or for such shorter space of time as they may think proper.

By the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, s. 16, it is enacted that—

Where any person licensed under any of the said recited Acts to sell beer, cider, or wine by retail, or any person licensed under the said Act of the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, is convicted of keeping his house open for the sale of, or of selling beer, cider, wine, spirits, or any other exciseable liquor, or of suffering the same to be drunk in such house at any time during which such house ought by law to be closed, any person (other than the servants or inmates of such house) present in such house at such time shall, unless he account for his presence to the satisfaction of the justices having cognisance of the case, be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding 40*s.* for each offence.

Sect. 17 enacts that—

In the following cases, that is to say (1), where any person is convicted of an offence against the tenor or conditions of a licence granted to him under any of the said recited Acts, or of an offence for which a penalty is imposed by any of the recited Acts. (2) Where any person is convicted of an offence against the tenor of a licence granted to him under the said Act of the ninth year of the reign of King George the Fourth, if any previous conviction or convictions since the passing of this Act for any of the said offences be proved against him, the offence of which he is last convicted shall be deemed to be a second or third offence as the case may be, provided that the said previous conviction or convictions did take place within the five years next preceding.

JONES (app.) v. DICKER (resp.)

[Q. B.]

The conviction did not refer to any previous offence for which the said Margaret Short had been convicted of the same kind, but four other convictions for other offences were recited in it, one of which was since the passing of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27 (The Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869), and that was for keeping the house open for the sale of beer on Sunday before half-past 12 o'clock at noon. It was stated on affidavit, that the said Margaret Short had never been previously convicted of the offence of refusing to admit a constable into her house, or of any of the offences enumerated in the first branch of the 17th section of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, since the passing of such Act.

J. Paterson contended that the justices were wrong in inflicting the penalty of disqualification from selling beer, &c., for two years, for the conviction shows no first offence which was necessary to justify them in inflicting it. The keeping of the house open upon a Sunday for which Mrs. Short had been convicted, could not be considered as a second offence, for that, it is submitted, is not an offence against the tenor or conditions of a licence granted to her under any of the recited Acts. It certainly was an offence under the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61, s. 15, but that part of the Act is repealed by the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, s. 2, and a new enactment is provided with reference to this matter under the 4th section, and which Act is for regulating the sale of beer and other liquors on the Lord's Day, and imposes a penalty of five pounds for a breach of its enactments. That enactment is not included in those recited in the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27.

E. Taylor showed cause in the first instance. The justices had jurisdiction to convict as they have done. Although there had been no previous offence of refusing to admit a constable, there certainly had been one of keeping the house open for the sale of beer before half-past twelve o'clock at noon, which it is submitted is an offence which comes within both branches of sect. 17 of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 27, it being in fact an offence against the tenor of the licence. Although the 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, was passed for regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors on the Lord's-day, yet it was one applicable to the due conduct of the house as intended by the last statute. [He was stopped by the court.]

J. Paterson was heard in reply.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I am of opinion that there should be no rule. The offence created by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 49, is identical with that which had been prohibited by the licence. It is certainly against the tenor and condition of the licence, and no doubt the Legislature framed the 17th section with the view of meeting such a case.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The obvious meaning is, that if a conviction takes place of the commission of one of a certain class of offences since the passing of the 32 & 33 Vict. the offence of which the person is last convicted shall be deemed a second offence with the consequences attached to the committing of a second offence.

Poaching Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 114), s. 2—Unlawfully going on land in search or pursuit of game—Evidence to support conviction.

Appellant, a common carrier between B. and R., was met by a police constable coming along the turnpike road to R. with his horse and cart. The constable, suspecting that the appellant had been unlawfully on land in pursuit of game, asked him if he had any game in his cart, to which he replied that he had only a few rabbits. The constable then searched the cart, and found in a basket, beneath the rabbits, a pheasant, nine partridges (three of which had been shot, and six netted), and two hares (one of which had been shot, and the other trapped). The game was wet, and had been recently killed; and the boots of the appellant (who fainted when the game was discovered) were dirty, although the road was dry. The justices who convicted the appellant found that "no evidence was given on the one hand to show that the game was unlawfully obtained, or on the other hand to show that it was lawfully obtained."

Held, that the foregoing circumstances did not constitute sufficient evidence on which the appellant could be convicted of having obtained game by unlawfully going on land in search or pursuit of game within sect. 2 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114.

Case stated by justices.

This is a case stated by us, the undersigned, three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace for the county of Denbigh, under the stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on questions of law which arose before us as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the county hall in Ruthin, in and for the division of Ruthin, in the county of Denbigh, on the 2nd Dec. 1867, an information preferred by John Dicker, sergeant of police, Ruthin (hereinafter called the respondent), against Hugh Jones, of Bettws Gwerfil Goch, in the county of Merioneth, carrier (hereinafter called the appellant), under sect. 2 of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, intituled the Game Poaching Prevention Act, charging for that he the said Hugh Jones, on the 19th Nov. 1867, in the parish of Llanfwrog, in the county of Denbigh aforesaid, was lawfully searched by him, the said John Dicker, a constable for the said county of Denbigh, in a certain highway, then called "the road from Ruthin to Carrig-y-druidion," the said constable then having good cause to suspect the said Hugh Jones of coming from certain land there where the said Hugh Jones had been then unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, and the said Hugh Jones having in his possession game unlawfully obtained, and the said constable having then and there also lawfully stopped and detained a certain cart, in and upon which he had good cause to suspect game was then and there being carried by the said Hugh Jones, there being then and there found in and upon the said cart certain game, to wit, one pheasant, nine partridges, and two hares (which the said constable then and there seized and detained), contrary to the statute in that case made and provided, was heard and determined by us, the said justices respectively, being then present, and upon such hearing we decided the appellant came within the words of the statute, and he was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him, to forfeit and pay the sum of 3*l.* 2*s.* to be applied according to law, and to pay to the respondent the sum of 1*l.* 18*s.* for his costs in that behalf, and, in default of payment of the said several sums, we adjudged the appellant to be imprisoned in the common gaol at Ruthin, in the said county, for the space of two months.

And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said stat. 20 & 21 Vict. c. 48, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of such our determination as aforesaid for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognisance as required by the said statute in that behalf.

Now, therefore, we the said justices, in compliance with the said application and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case:

Upon the hearing of the said information it appeared that it was laid by the respondent in his character of a police constable, and in pursuance of the directions of the statute, and it was proved on the part of the respondent and found as a fact, that the appellant was a common carrier residing at Bettws (which is partly surrounded by the county of Denbigh), in the county of Merioneth (which adjoins the county of Denbigh), and was in the habit of carrying goods to the markets held in the town of Ruthin, in the county of Denbigh. That on the morning of the 19th Nov. last, the appellant was met by the respondent, a police constable for the county of Denbigh, coming along the turnpike road (in the county of Denbigh) leading from Cerrig-y-druidion and the village of Bettws to the town of Ruthin, with his own horse and cart, and about a mile out of the town of Ruthin, and in the county of Denbigh.

That the respondent suspected the appellant of having been on land taking game, and also of carrying game for himself and others, and this suspicion was in consequence of private information the respondent had received. The respondent asked the appellant if he had any game in his cart, to which he replied that he had no game whatever, only a few rabbits which he had bought. That the respondent searched the cart and found a basket covered over with a cloth, and in the basket were some rabbits, and under the rabbits one pheasant, nine partridges, three of which had been shot, and six had been netted, and two hares, one of which had been shot and the other trapped. That on the game being found by the respondent in the appellant's cart, the appellant fainted. That the game was wet and had been recently killed, and the appellant's boots dirty, although the road was dry, and the game was not visible in the cart. That the highway where the search took place was in the county of Denbigh, and about eight miles from Bettws, where the appellant lived. That the appellant, on being asked where he had the game from, stated that his wife had bought it from some person.

On the part of the appellant, a witness was called who proved that the appellant was a common carrier from Bettws to Ruthin, and that on the morning in question the witness had brought a parcel to him at Bettws, and placed it, at six o'clock in the morning on the 19th Nov., in the cart close to the basket in which the game was afterwards found. That he had seen a piece of the basket only, that a cloth covered the top part, and that the person afterwards accompanied the appellant to a place called Melin-yurg, on the borders of the county of Denbigh, a distance of about one and a half mile from Bettws, but saw no game put into the cart, or the basket disturbed, and that the appellant sometimes worked at a farm in Denbighshire. There was no evidence to show that the game was in the basket at Bettws, nor that it could not have been killed and put in after the appellant entered the county of Denbigh. No evidence was given on the one hand to show that the game was unlawfully obtained, or on the other hand to show that it was lawfully obtained.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the suspicions of the respondent, the search on the highway, and the possession of the game by the appellant, with the other concomitant circumstances, were not sufficient to support a conviction under the circumstances of his being a common carrier, and bound to carry all parcels entrusted to him in the same undisturbed condition in which he received them; that we, the said justices, were wrong in deciding as we had done; that the respondent was not bound to state and prove his grounds of suspicion of trespass, or to state whether or not he suspected the trespass to have been committed in the county of Denbigh or Merioneth; that the respondent not having seen the appellant coming from any land, but merely travelling the high road with his cart, and the latter's clothes not being wet, or any nets or other instruments for taking game found in his possession, we, the said justices, wrongly convicted the appellant, and that the appellant's witness having proved that the basket which, when found in the county of Denbigh, contained the game was in the cart at Bettws, a constable of the county of Denbigh had no right to take the game, nor had we jurisdiction to adjudicate on the information.

The questions for the consideration of the court are, first, whether our decision that the respondent was not bound to state and prove his grounds of suspicion of trespass, or to state whether or not he suspected the trespass to have been committed in the county of Denbigh or Merioneth was right? Second, whether or not it was incumbent on the respondent to show affirmatively that the appellant had been unlawfully on any land in the county of Denbigh in search or pursuit of game, and had so unlawfully become possessed thereof? Third, whether or not there was in point of law evidence from which we might infer that the appellant had obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or that he had in his possession game unlawfully obtained?

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand, but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said complaint is to be dismissed.

25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, s. 2, enacts that—

It shall be lawful for any constable or peace officer, in any county, borough, or place in Great Britain and Ireland, in any highway, street, or public place, to search any person whom he may have good cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game; or any person aiding or abetting such person, and having in his possession any game unlawfully obtained, or any gun, part of gun, or nets, or engines used for the killing or taking game; and also to stop and search any cart or other conveyance in or upon which such constable or peace officer shall have good cause to suspect that any such game or any such article or thing is being carried by any such person, or should there be found any game or any such article or thing as aforesaid upon such person, cart, or other conveyance, to seize and detain such game, article, or thing; and such constable or peace officer shall in such case apply to some justice of the peace for a summons citing such person to appear before two justices of the peace assembled in petty sessions as provided in the 18 & 19 of Her present Majesty, c. 126, s. 9, as far as regards England and Ireland, and before a sheriff or any two justices of the peace in Scotland; and if such person shall have obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or shall have used any such article or thing as aforesaid for unlawfully killing or taking game, or shall have been accessory thereto, such person shall, on being convicted thereof, forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding five pounds, and shall forfeit such game, guns, parts of guns, nets, and engines, and the justices shall direct the same to be sold or destroyed, and the proceeds of such sale, with the amount of the penalty, to be paid to the treasurer of the county or borough where the conviction takes place; and no person who, by direction of a justice in writing, shall sell any game so seized, shall be liable to any penalty for such sale; and if no conviction takes place, the game or any such article or thing as aforesaid, or the value thereof, shall be restored to the person from whom it had been seized.

Morgan Lloyd, for the appellant. In the first place the offence created by the statute is not charged in the information at all. The offence named in the statute is having "obtained game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or having used" any gun, part of gun, nets, or engines "for unlawfully killing or taking game," or "having been accessory thereto;" whereas the offence charged in the information is that the appellant was lawfully searched by a police constable, then having good cause to suspect him of having come from certain land where he had been unlawfully in search and pursuit of game, and that he had in his possession game unlawfully obtained. None of the enumerated instruments for killing game was found upon him; and the only offence of which he could have been guilty, if guilty of any, was that of having "obtained game by unlawfully going on land in search or pursuit of game;" and, as that offence is not charged in the information, the information was bad.

Horatio Lloyd, for the respondent.—There are three questions submitted by the justices for the decision of this court, and the question now raised is not one of them, and cannot therefore be now discussed. [LUSH, J.—Such a question could not be matter of appeal in this form. If the conviction is void on the face of it, the proper remedy is to bring it up and quash it. We must confine ourselves to the questions put to us.]

Morgan Lloyd, in continuation.—Even if the information was good, it is submitted that there was nothing in the evidence to justify a conviction for "having obtained game by unlawfully going on land in search or pursuit of game." The appellant is a common carrier in the habit of carrying goods to Ruthin, and the justices state as a fact that no evidence was given to show that the game was unlawfully obtained. [LUSH, J.—Even supposing the appellant had got the game found in his cart from a poacher who had unlawfully taken it on land within the jurisdiction of the justices, would that be an offence under this Act?] It is submitted that it would not.

Horatio Lloyd for the respondent.—The finding of the justices that there was "no evidence" given to show that the game had been unlawfully obtained, means only that there was no direct evidence. There was quite sufficient indirect evidence to support the conviction. If the appellant had been carrying the game merely as a common carrier nothing would have been easier for him than to have given evidence of the fact of its having been sent by some person to another. Then there is the denial by the appellant that he had any game whatever in his cart, when asked by the police constable; the fainting of the appellant when the game was discovered by the constable; the fact that the game was wet, and had been recently killed; and the dirty boots of the appellant, although the road was dry—circumstances all pointing to the guilt of the appellant. In Brown v. Turner, 13 C.B., N. S., 485, a conviction was upheld under circumstances not materially different. There four labourers were met by a police-constable early one Sunday morning, on the high road. Suspecting from their appearance that they had been poaching, and seeing that there was something bulky in the pocket of one of them, the constable searched him (the other three walking away), and drew from his pocket five wild rabbits, which had been recently killed, and an iron spud; | the constable then followed another, and found in his pocket a net suitable for taking rabbits, and which appeared to have been recently used, and some rabbit's fur and fresh blood on his coat cuffs; the constable proved that a third member of the party had at a subsequent hour on the same morning sold a dead wild rabbit at a beerhouse for 6d.; and the Court of Common Pleas held that the magistrates were justified in inferring from the above evidence, as against three out of the four, that they had been unlawfully on some land in search or pursuit of game within this Act, although there was no proof that either of the parties had been seen off the high road. So in Evans v. Botterill, 3 B. & S. 787; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 272, it was held that it is not necessary to the conviction of a person charged under this Act that he should be shown to have come from some land, and that the presumption of that fact may be drawn from the surrounding circumstances. In that case five men were taken at 6 a. m. on a Sunday morning on a highway carrying bags, in which were found one hare and fifteen rabbits, and also with several nets and stakes used for the fastening down of the nets, but were not proved to have been on any land in pursuit of game; and it was held by this court that these facts constituted sufficient evidence on which the magistrates might have convicted the men of having obtained the game by unlawfully going on land in search of game, or of having used nets and stakes for unlawfully killing and taking game. [LUSH, J.—The section of the Act authorises the constable to search any person whom he may have good cause to suspect of "coming" from any land, where he shall have been unlawfully in search or pursuit of game, &c. At present I do not see any evidence of the appellant having been found so "coming" from any land. Suppose the appellant had himself been poaching the night before, and is found next day with game in his possession, could he, under such circumstances, be said to be "coming" from land where he had been unlawfully pursuing game?] The inference to be drawn from the circumstances of the present case is against such a view as that, for the game is found to be wet and recently killed, and the appellant's boots to have been dirty, though the road was dry. [HANNEN, J.—The justices do not say whether the dirt on the boots was not such as might have been got on the road.]

LUSH, J.—I think we must answer the third question put to us in the negative. I think there was no evidence in point of law from which the justices could infer that the appellant had obtained the game found in his cart, by unlawfully going on land in search or pursuit of game within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114. No doubt the case was one full of suspicion, and the appellant, in all probability, either obtained the game by poaching himself or from some poacher; but that is not the offence created by the statute, which is, that the person suspected "shall have obtained such game by unlawfully going on any land in search or pursuit of game, or shall have used any such article or thing as aforesaid (viz., gun, &c.) for unlawfully killing or taking game, or shall have been accessory thereto," and when "coming from any" such land he may be stopped and searched. Now I do not think there is any evidence here to show that. The facts proved in evidence lead as strongly to one inference as the other, and that is not sufficient to support a conviction. The appellant is proved to be a carrier going from one town to another, and game is found in his cart. It is true that the game is wet and recently killed; but how recently killed does not appear. It might have been killed the previous night, and by another per-sen than the appellant, and if so there would not be an offence within the Act. Therefore, as the facts leave the matter doubtful, the evidence is not, I think, sufficient to warrant a conviction.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Conviction quashed.

HILL AND ANOTHER v. PEEL AND ANOTHER (The Tamworth Election Petition). BROAD AND OTHERS v. FOWLER AND ANOTHER (The Penryn and Falmouth Election Petition). PEGLER v. GURNEY AND ANOTHER (The Southampton Election Petition).

Costs—Election petition—The Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), s. 41.

Where, on the trial of an election petition, an order is made by the presiding judge for the payment of the costs of the successful, by the unsuccessful, party, the successful party is entitled, on taxation of costs, to an indemnity for all costs that were reasonably incurred by him in the ordinary course of a matter of this nature, but not to any extraordinary or unusual expenses incurred in consequence of over caution or over anxiety as to any particular case, or from considerations of any special importance arising from the rank, position, wealth, or character of either of the parties, or any special desire on his part to insure success. Such extraordinary costs as an attorney would not be justified in incurring without distinct and special instructions from his client ought not to be allowed, nor the costs of purely collateral proceedings upon which a party has failed, nor those which may have been occasioned by his default, negligence, or mistake.

There is no objection to the master adopting an uniform standard of allowance for counsel engaged on election petitions as an average for ordinary cases: (Per Borill, C. J. and Brett, J.)

It is reasonable and proper that consultations should be held among the counsel engaged in an election petition, from time to time during the trial thereof, and the fees paid for such consultations ought to be allowed on taxation to the successful party, according to the usual mode of charge in ordinary suits.

As to the costs incurred by the successful party after the presentation of the petition and before the hearing, the parties are entitled to take the judgment of the master on the particular items, if they think fit, instead of submitting them to him in one lump sum.

These three cases had been tried, and in each case the respondent had been successful, and an order had been made by the presiding judge for the payment by the petitioner of the respondent's costs.

In the Tamworth case, the fees paid to counsel by the respondent were, to the leading counsel, 200 guineas with his brief, and a refresher fee of 50 guineas a day for every day after the first; to the junior counsel, 100 guineas with his brief, and six refresher fees at 25 guineas each for six days attendance after the first. Upon taxation of costs, the master allowed in respect of the fee paid to the leading counsel with his brief, 100 guineas, and for refresher fees 25 guineas a day; and in respect of fees paid to the junior counsel, 50 guineas, and refresher fees of 15 guineas a day. The briefs consisted of 103 sheets each, besides various other voluminous documents and papers. For preparing these briefs the respondent's attorney charged 200 guineas, but this was reduced to 100 guineas on taxation. The respondent's attorney also employed a local attorney, whose charges amounted to 80*l.* 19*s.* 8*d.* The whole of this sum was disallowed on taxation.

In the Penryn and Falmouth case, there were two respondents, and the petitioners deposited only one sum of 1000*l.* in the Bank of England, as security for costs, in pursuance of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868. The respondents, thinking that two sums of 1000*l.* ought to have been deposited, moved the court, after having failed before a judge in chambers, to set aside the petition, on the ground of the insufficiency of the recognizance. The court granted a rule, which, however, on cause being shown, was subsequently discharged without any order as to costs. The respondents now sought to put on the petitioners their expenses in these proceedings, but the master disallowed them. The fees paid to counsel were 300 guineas with the brief to the leader, with refresher fees of 50 guineas a day; and to the junior counsel, 150 guineas with the brief, and 30 guineas a day refresher fee. These were reduced by the master to 100 guineas and 25 guineas refresher to the leader, and 75 guineas and 20 guineas refresher to the junior. The master, moreover, allowed an extra 25 guineas to the leader and 20 guineas to the junior, on account of the great distance from London. The respondent's attorney charged 100 guineas for instruction for briefs, and besides that charged a large number of items, having relation to the preparation of evidence. The master considered that these items were already charged for under the head of instructions for briefs, and he accordingly struck them all out, but at the same time allowed 150 guineas instead of 100 guineas for the instructions. In the course of the trial of the petition, fees were paid to counsel on three different occasions for consultations, but the master on taxation refused to allow for more than one consultation.

In the Southampton case the main item disallowed by the master amounted to nearly 1000*l.*, and represented the charges of the respondents' attorney and three clerks for their services at Southampton after the presentation of the petition and before the hearing. This was alleged by the respondents' attorney in his affidavit to have been rendered necessary by the petitioner, who (as the affidavit alleged) was holding out inducements to persons to give evidence of bribery, treating, and other corrupt practices, and was offering large sums of money with a view to procure such evidence. The petitioner made no affidavit in answer to this charge. The master allowed 100 guineas as instructions for brief. The fees paid to counsel were reduced by the master from 200 guineas, with 50 guineas a day refresher, to half that sum, and the refresher fee paid to the junior counsel from 25 to 15 guineas a day. Three consultations were charged for, but the master only allowed one.

In each case a rule was obtained calling on the petitioner to show cause why the master should not be at liberty to review his taxation. For convenience' sake the three rules were argued together.

H. James, Q. C., for the petitioner in the Tamworth petition, showed cause.—As to the counsels' fee, that is in the discretion of the master, and the master having exercised that discretion, the court will not interfere. The respondent has no more right to call upon the petitioner to pay for such eminent counsel than an attorney would have to call on his client to do so in the absence of special instructions. It is for the respondent to show that the master has been wrong, not for the petitioner to show that he has been right. As for the sum allowed for instructions for brief, it is a question of quantum meruit, with which the court ought not to interfere.

H. Lloyd, Q.C., for the petitioners in the Penryn and Falmouth case, showed cause.—It is preposterous to suppose that the respondent ought to have his costs on the unsuccessful appeal that he made to the court to have the petition dismissed.

Mellish, Q.C. and Davey, for the petitioner in the Southampton case, showed cause.—The costs of watching the petitioner's agents ought not to be thrown on the petitioner. The master cannot possibly judge whether such costs were properly incurred or not. [WILLES, J.—I think it would be most improper to allow the expense of this second canvass.] As between attorney and client, the attorney may charge a rich client many things, which he would not be justified in charging a poor one, and in a case of this nature, where the respondent holds the eminent position of Mr. Gurney, many costs might reasonably be incurred in order to insure success; but you cannot take these circumstances into consideration when the costs are to be paid by the opposite side. There is no principle involved in this case; it is a mere question of quantum, and in such cases the court will not interfere. The master has allowed something under the head of instructions for brief, for the costs of getting up the evidence. As to the counsel's fee, the courts have never, in any of the numerous cases brought before them, interfered with the decision of the master. The meaning of the 41st section of 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125 is that the costs are to be taxed in the same way as the costs of a party in a suit, which are to be paid by the other party on the scale of costs as between attorney and client. They cited,

Nichols v. Haslam, 15 Sim. 49;

Smith v. Earl of Effingham, 10 Beav. 378.

Hardinge Giffard, Q.C. (in all three cases, Ledgard with him in the Southampton case) in support of the rules. A party to a proceeding of this kind is entitled to have the assistance of a Queen's counsel as well as a junior counsel, and, considering the distance counsel have to go from London, he could not obtain the assistance of properly qualified counsel, except by payment of such fees as were paid in these cases. The successful party is entitled to an indemnity against all costs reasonably incurred. In taxation, the master ought to have allowed costs as between attorney and client in the Court of Chancery. As to costs on that scale it is said in Morgan v. Davey, on Costs in Chancery p. 1, "Costs as between solicitor and client, payable by one party to another, will not include all costs to which the solicitor would be entitled as against his client. It is impossible to lay down with exactness any rule upon the subject, but generally it would seem that all such costs would be allowed as a solicitor would ordinarily incur in the conduct of his client's business, including those extraordinary costs which may have been occasioned either by the default of the client, as by incurring a contempt, or by his express instructions, as to employ an unusual number of counsel." In the Southampton case, the affidavit charges malpractices against the petitioner and the petitioner has not denied the charge. It must then be assumed that the respondent was justified in incurring charges in counteracting these malpractices. In that case moreover, the master has allowed for the witnesses; but he has refused to allow anything for the inquiries by which the attendance of those witnesses was procured. As to the consultations, considering the nature of these cases and the different aspect they assume from time to time, they are very necessary, and ought to be allowed. The master said they were included in the refresher fee.

[BRETT, J.—That has never been the practice.] He cited.

Young v. Fernie, 1 De G. J. & S. 353; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 590;

Doe dem. Hyde v. The Mayor &c., of Manchester, 12 C.B. 474.

The judgment of Bovill, C.J. and Brett, J. was read by Bovill, C.J.—The principle upon which the costs on election petitions are to be taxed is settled by the 41st section of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868, which enacts that they are to be taxed "according to the same principles as costs between attorney and client are taxed in a suit in the High Court of Chancery." When the costs in these cases were taxed, the master of this court appointed to perform the duties required under the Act obtained the assistance of one of the taxing masters of the Court of Chancery. We have in like manner availed ourselves of the assistance of the senior taxing master of that court, who was kind enough to favour us with his attendance during the argument, and to give us such information as we required as to the practice of the Court of Chancery, and for which we are much indebted to him. The peculiarity of the case arises from the costs being payable as between party and party, and having to be taxed as between attorney and client, and this not absolutely, but only as a suit in Chancery. The mode of taxation in such a case is stated in Mr. Osborn Morgan's and Mr. Davey's work (p. 1) upon costs in Chancery as follows:—"Costs as between solicitor and client payable by one party to another will not include all costs to which the solicitor would be entitled as against his client. It is impossible to lay down with exactness any rule upon the subject, but generally it would seem that all such costs would be allowed as a solicitor would ordinarily incur in the conduct of his client's business, including those extraordinary costs which may have been occasioned either by the default of the client, as by his incurring a contempt, or by his express instructions, as to employ an unusual number of counsel." The rule in the Chancery General Orders as to the fees to be allowed to solicitors for instructions for different proceedings is to be found at p. 404 of Mr. Morgan and Mr. Davey's book, and is as follows: "As to bills, and answers, examinations, affidavits, and petitions, when the larger scale is applicable in lieu of the fixed fees for instructions for and for drawing, the taxing master is to be at liberty to take into his consideration the special circumstances of each case, and at his discretion to make such allowance for work, labour, and expenses properly performed and incurred in or about the preparation of the bill or answer, examination, affidavit or petition, as shall appear to him to be just, having regard to the length of the document, the nature of the suit, the interests of the parties, and the fund or person from which or by whom the costs are to be paid." The 40th Order of the Chancery Consolidated Orders, rule 32, which is to be found at p. 350 of the same book, provides for the taxation between party and party of the costs, inter alia, of procuring evidence by deposition or affidavit, and the attendance of witnesses, and directs the allowance of all such just and reasonable expenses as appear to have been properly incurred, but directs that in "allowing such costs the taxing master shall not allow to such party any costs which do not appear to have been necessary for the attainment of justice or for defending his rights, or which appear to have been incurred through over caution, or negligence, or mistake, or merely at the desire of the party." It appears, therefore, that in Chancery, even as between party and party, a liberal scale of costs is to be allowed on taxation, and when the costs are to be taxed as between attorney and client, it would seem that there should be an extension of this allowance. Even this, however, must be subject to some limitation, and we think the allowance must be confined to such costs, as, having regard to the rules and orders before enunciated, may be said to have been reasonably incurred. In the case of Doe dem. Hyde v. The Mayor of Manchester, 12 C. B. 479, where under a local Act which gave "full costs and expenses" the master had allowed liberal costs as between party and party, and the court construed the Act to mean that the costs were to be taxed as between attorney and client, the order to review the taxation was qualified by confirming it to such costs as had been reasonably expended in the litigation. It is true that the 41st section of the Parliamentary Elections Act 1868 enacts that all costs, charges, and expenses of and incidental to the presentation of a petition under that Act, and to the proceedings consequent thereon, shall be defrayed in such manner as the court or judge may determine, regard being had to any vexatious conduct or unfounded allegations or objections on either side, or the causing of any needless expense by either party. That, however, seems to apply rather to the question what costs are to be allowed than to the mode of taxing costs. The order for costs in each of these cases was general and without qualification on either of the grounds mentioned in this section of the Act of Parliament, and it therefore appears to us that the parties entitled to their costs under the orders were entitled to an indemnity for all costs that were reasonably incurred by them in the ordinary course of a matter of this nature, but not to any extraordinary or unusual expenses incurred in consequence of over-caution or over-anxiety as to any particular case, or from considerations of any special importance arising from the rank, position, wealth or character of either of the parties, or any special desire on his part to insure success. We think also that such extraordinary costs as an attorney would not be justified in incurring without distinct and special instructions from his client ought not to be allowed, nor the costs of purely collateral proceedings upon which a party has failed, nor those which may have been occasioned by his default, negligence, or mistake. A rule very much to this effect was, we believe, adopted by the Court of Session in Scotland in the Dumfriesshire Election Petition, and by the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland upon the Youghal and Belfast Petitions. We are also of opinion that when the election judge or the court orders payment of the costs without qualification, it was the intention of the Legislature that the taxation should be liberal in favour of the successful party, and that the master should tax the costs accordingly. A very wide discretion must necessarily be left to the taxing officer, which must be exercised by him after a careful consideration of the particular circumstances of each case, and, where after properly considering the matter the master has arrived at a decision, it lies upon those who impeach his decision to satisfy the court that he is wrong. Where a principle is involved the court will always entertain the question, and if necessary give directions to the master; but where it is a question of whether the master has exercised his discretion properly, or it is merely a question as to the amount to be allowed, the court is generally unwilling to interfere with the judgment of their officer whose peculiar province it is to investigate and to judge of such matters, unless there are very strong grounds to show that the officer is wrong in the judgment which he has formed. The first question that was argued in these cases was as to the fees allowed to the leading and junior counsel, and in all the cases one uniform fee of 100 guineas was allowed upon the briefs to the leading counsel, and 75 guineas to the junior counsel, being much less in each case than the fees that were actually paid. If these fees were allowed as being an uniform standard of allowance, without reference to the particular case, we think this course would be wrong, and that the master ought to exercise his judgment and discretion in each case; but at the same time we see no objection to the master adopting such a scale as an average for ordinary cases, and unless there be some special circumstances we see no objection to these fees being treated by the master as the proper sums to be allowed. The cases of Tamworth and Penryn seem to us to have been only of the ordinary description. The master appears to have so treated them, with the exception of allowing an additional fee in the latter case on account of the great distance from London; and we think there is no ground upon which we can properly interfere with or review his decision, either in point of principle or as a matter of discretion or amount. The Southampton case appears to us to stand upon a somewhat different footing. The master seems rather to have allowed the fees in that case as in accordance with a general rule, than upon a due consideration of the particular case; and, looking to the affidavits and voluminous briefs in that particular case, we think it will be more satisfactory that the case should be reconsidered by him; and upon the principle which we have laid down. With regard to the refreshers to the different counsel, we see no reason to doubt the principle of the master's decision, or that he has not allowed a sufficient amount in all the cases; but as to the consultations we think that the master in allowing only one consultation has assimilated the practice and the allowance on taxation rather too closely to the practice in ordinary actions at law, in which only one consultation is usually allowed. From the nature of the proceedings on an election petition, and the mode in which they are conducted, we think it most reasonable and proper that consultations should be held from time to time when different points and phases of the case are developed, as they necessarily must be in the course of such inquiries; and we think that such consultations are not only reasonable, but would be really necessary in most cases in the proper conduct of the case. We think also that the fees for the consultations should be allowed according to the usual mode of charge in ordinary suits, and in addition to the refreshers for each day's attendance upon the inquiry. In this respect, therefore, we think the master should review his taxation in each of the three cases, unless the parties are willing to agree upon the amount to be added to the master's allocatur on this head. Another important question raised in each of the cases was as to the costs incurred after the presentation of the petition and before the hearing; and as to these the master seems to have allowed a gross sum in each case, under the head of instructions for brief. In the Tamworth case there could be no objection to his adopting this course, because these preliminary expenses were all charged, in accordance with a practice which has been adopted, in one item as instructions for brief, and in which the details involved in the general charge were stated. The master has exercised his judgment and discretion upon the item and the amount, and reduced it to 100 guineas; and, from the nature of the details of this item and the services stated to have been performed, and from the affidavits, we see no reason to doubt that the master has exercised a right judgment upon it; and we think there are no sufficient grounds shown to induce us to remit this matter to him for review. It is true that Mr. Shaw's charges are disallowed, as well as the charges for railway fares, carriage hire, &c.; but Mr. Shaw's bill is not before us, and from the report of my brother Willes, who tried the case, we are not satisfied that his bill of costs was properly chargeable against the appellant. The railway fares and carriage hire are mere matters of amount with which we cannot interfere. In the Penryn and Falmouth case the respondent's agent had charged, not only 100 guineas as instructions for the brief, but also all the preliminary expenses in detail in addition. The master has struck out the preliminary charges and increased the amount charged as instructions for brief from 100 guineas to 150 guineas, in order to cover in this amount the preliminary expenses which, in his judgment, ought to be allowed. The master in this matter has clearly exercised his judgment and discretion, and upon looking at the bill of costs and the amounts charged for preliminary expenses, and which would be properly chargeable for such preliminary expenses, we see no reason to doubt the propriety of the master's decision, and the rule will, therefore, be discharged in the Penryn case also upon this point. The Southampton case seems to us to be somewhat different. As to the preliminary expenses, the costs and charges amounted to nearly 1000*l.*, and 100 guineas has been allowed. The master has not a very distinct recollection as to the principle on which he acted; and looking to the affidavits and the absence of any answer to them, to the particulars and number of the voters objected to, the length of the briefs as allowed by the master, the number of witnesses and the other circumstances of this case, we think the decision of the master should be reconsidered by him. We think also that the parties are entitled to have his judgment upon the particular items in the preliminary expenses if they think fit, instead of their being included in the allowance of one sum in gross to cover the whole of what the master may think ought to be allowed. In the Penryn and Falmouth case a further question arose as to the costs of an unsuccessful appeal to this court by the sitting member against the decision of my brother Willes at chambers; but that appears to us to have been entirely a collateral matter, and the court having disposed of the question of costs upon the motion which failed, we think the respondent cannot be entitled to them, and that the master was therefore right in disallowing them. The result will be that the rules will be absolute in all the cases to review the taxation as to the consultations, and the rule will also be absolute in the Southampton case, as to the counsel's fees and costs preliminary to the hearing of the petition; and as these rules are part of the proceedings consequent upon the petitions, and incidental thereto, we think the costs of them must also be allowed.

In the Matter of the NORWICH ELECTION PETITION.

WILLES, J.—I concur as to the consultations. I also agree that the rules ought to be discharged as to the Penryn and Tamworth cases. As to the Southampton case, having tried that and also the other cases moved, I am unable to concur in the distinction drawn by the rest of the court in favour of the respondent. I do not doubt that extraordinary pains were taken and expenses incurred, because of the high judicial rank and eminent position of Mr. Russell Gurney—a course natural enough in his case, but which would have been highly unreasonable in the case of an ordinary respondent. I think it would be unjust to saddle such costs upon the petitioner, and I am satisfied that the master has in this case, as in those of Tamworth and Penryn, taken extraordinary pains to be right. Having read his written report of the principle of his decisions, viz., that of allowing in each case, as instructions for brief, such preliminary expenses as he thought the petitioners were entitled to, I cannot concur in a rule that he shall do the same thing over again in the Southampton case. I see no ground for interfering with the master's decision except as to the consultations.

In the Matter of the NORWICH ELECTION PETITION.

TILLET v. STRACEY.

Taxation of costs—Expenses of witnesses, preliminary investigation, and attorneys.

Upon the trial of an election petition alleging that the respondent had been unduly elected, and claiming the seat for the petitioner, who had been the unsuccessful candidate, it was declared that the respondent had been unduly elected, but the petitioner withdrew his demand for a scrutiny. The petitioner's costs were ordered to be paid by the respondent so far as they related to the charges against the latter, but the costs to which the respondent had been put in order to meet the scrutiny were ordered to be paid by the petitioner.

The court refused to interfere with the master's taxation of the petitioner's costs, (1) in disallowing witnesses who were not called, although some of them before a subsequent royal commission admitted they had received bribes; (2) in fixing a lump sum for the costs of preliminary investigation; (3) in allowing a folio and a half as the length of evidence of each witness; (4) in disallowing many of the expenses actually incurred by the attorneys and their clerks.

This was another application to review the taxation of costs upon an election petition.

The following was the affidavit of the managing clerk of the petitioners' attorneys:—

I attended before Master Gordon on the taxation of the bill of costs of the petitioner's attorneys.

The charges in the petition were those of bribery, treating and undue influence. The petition also asked for a scrutiny on various grounds, and claimed the seat. The case was tried before Martin, B., who opened the proceedings on the 14th Jan. 1869, and they were continued on the 15th, 16th, and 18th Jan. 1869. Great difficulty had been anticipated in the proof of agency, but at an early period his Lordship intimated that an agency was sufficiently proved, and thus the petitioner's case was greatly shortened. The petitioner abandoned the request for a scrutiny and the claim for the seat.

The order for costs provided that the respondent should pay the petitioner the costs incidental to the said petition, and to the proceedings consequent thereon, so far as related to the determination and proof that the respondent was not duly elected, and so far as related to the recrimination against the petitioner; and that the petitioner should pay to the respondent the costs of meeting the claim of the petitioner to the seat.

The bill of costs amounted to 3,015*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, of which upwards of 1400*l.* was for money out of pocket. The total amount included a portion of the charges as to the scrutiny as well as to the case for unseating the respondent. The greater part of the case for the scrutiny went also to the case for unseating, inasmuch as most of the electors whose votes were challenged were objected to as being either bribers or bribed. The amount of the petitioner's costs allowed was 703*l.* 3*s.* The claim for the respondent's costs as to the scrutiny amounted to 793*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, and was reduced on taxation to 163*l.* 6*s.*

The number of witnesses actually subpoenaed to prove bribery was upwards of 400. The master allowed but 72 in all. The money actually paid to the witnesses was 377*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, of which the master allowed but 76*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* There was a corresponding reduction of all the items depending on the number of witnesses.

In the Matter of the NORWICH ELECTION PETITION.

The principle on which the master proceeded as to witnesses was as follows:—If a witness had not been examined he would not allow him (except in the cases of five witnesses), unless the brief showed a proof either that the person himself had bribed or been bribed, or of some other person who gave the precise information about which it was proposed to cross-examine the witness.

It is contended on behalf of the petitioner that this rule was wrong. A very large proportion of the witnesses who were subpoenaed to prove bribery were hostile. The manner in which much of the evidence was got up was as follows: We collected the various rumours which were flying about, and sent clerks to investigate the truth of them. Generally we went direct to the person alleged to have been bribed, but he almost invariably denied the fact, and refused to give any evidence. Sometimes we received information from other persons that the person in question had been actually bribed. Sometimes the information was not that he had been actually seen to bribe or to take a bribe, but of circumstances which raised a strong suspicion that he had bribed or taken a bribe; as, for instance, that he had never been known to vote without a bribe; that he had been actively concerned in bribery or taking bribes at former elections; that he asked for a bribe from the petitioner's agents and had been refused, and had afterwards voted for the respondent; that he had been taken up to the poll between three and four o'clock on the polling day by persons acting on behalf of the respondent, who it was believed and in some cases known had been bribing, and with persons believed and in some cases known to have been bribed. In all such cases we made such investigations as we could to test the probable accuracy of our information; we rejected a large number of such cases, and only subpoenaed the witnesses when it appeared probable that something would be got out of them in cross-examination; and we inserted in the brief under the names of the witnesses such information as we had obtained as information for counsel to cross-examine the witnesses upon, without in a great number of cases inserting a separate proof, or incurring the expenses of subpoenaing the persons who gave us the information, considering that on cross-examination the witnesses would admit that our information was correct. Several of such persons did in fact own on the trial that they had been bribed, and I have been informed by Mr. Abel Tillett, solicitor, Norwich, who assisted us in getting up the evidence and in the case generally, and I believe, that upwards of fifty of those who were not called and were disallowed by the master have since admitted, before the Royal Commissioners who have been sent down to Norwich, that they were bribed by the agents of the respondent at the last election. The master also refused to allow twenty-three witnesses who fell within the above-mentioned rule.

The master disallowed the whole of the attendances and charges for getting up the evidence prior to the preparation of the brief, amounting to over 700*l.*, and allowed instead thereof one lump sum of 126*l.* as instructions for brief; and the only basis upon which he ascertained such amount was the number of witnesses he allowed.

In doing this it followed that the master refused to allow all the attendances to investigate cases in which the information turned out wrong. It is submitted that this was wrong, as it was the duty of the solicitors to investigate many such cases, and it was impossible for them to tell without such investigation whether it was worth while to subpoena a witness or not. In many instances the names of the persons upon whom we had attended were left in blank in the bill of costs on account of the rancorous state of party feeling in Norwich. We offered to supply the names sooner than have the attendances disallowed, but the master declined to go into the particular cases of attendances (even those upon the petitioner himself), allowing only a lump sum as hereinbefore stated.

The master, where he allowed witnesses, made only one general allowance of a folio and a half for their evidence with reference to its actual length. In a very great many cases, if not in all, the actual proofs (which were never longer than was believed to be necessary) were much longer than a folio and a half.

The master refused to allow more than two counsel. Four counsel were employed by the respondent, three only by the petitioner.

The master refused to allow more than 100 guineas to the leader, and 75 guineas to the second, as fees with the brief; and 200 guineas and 100 guineas were the amounts actually paid. The master further allowed refreshers of only 25 guineas and 15 guineas a day respectively, the amounts paid being 50 guineas and 25 guineas respectively. The master refused to allow more than one consultation, though the trial lasted three days, and numerous consultations were held and paid for; and as I believe were necessary.

The solicitors to the petitioners were Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, and Co., of 6, Old Jewry, London. They employed the said Mr. Abel Tillett, the nephew of the petitioner, to help them in getting up the case, but solely for that purpose and in that capacity. He was in no sense solicitor to the petitioner, nor had he in any degree the conduct of the petition, though from his local knowledge he could render great assistance. Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, and Co. sent down four and sometimes five clerks, who were incessantly employed from the 25th Nov. 1868, till after the trial of the petition, and who were absolutely necessary to get up the case, prepare the briefs, and carry on the business connected with the trial. Their hotel and other expenses out of pocket amounted to over 128*l.*, their travelling expenses to over 39*l.*, and the general expenses for stationery, telegrams, postages, cab-hire, and the like, to nearly 65*l.* The master disallowed nearly the whole of these charges, treated the case as if Mr. Abel Tillett were the solicitor to the petitioner, and allowed only the attendance of the London solicitor for five days for the trial and his travelling expenses, and the attendance of the country solicitor and two clerks for three days, and for telegrams and incidental expenses, making 76*l.* 13*s.* in all.

The consequence of the very large reductions made by the master in the number of witnesses, and of the allowance of only a folio and a half for each witness, was an immense reduction in the allowances for drawing and copying briefs.

Upon this affidavit Keane, Q. C., on the 24th Nov. last, obtained a rule nisi calling upon the respondent to show cause why the master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of the petitioner's costs in and concerning this petition, on the following grounds: First. The disallowance of the expenses of and the costs as to fifty witnesses who subsequently admitted bribery before the royal commissioners. Secondly. The disallowance of the charges for getting up the evidence prior to the preparation of the brief, and the allowance of 126*l.* as instructions for brief instead thereof; the only basis on which the last-mentioned amount was ascertained being the number of witnesses allowed. Thirdly. The allowance for drawing and copies of one and a half folios for each witness without regard to the actual length. Fourthly. The disallowance of part of the fees paid to two counsel, and of all the fees paid to one counsel, and the disallowance and reduction of the attorneys' charges consequent thereon, and also of the fees for consultations. Fifthly. The treating of Mr. Abel Tillett as the attorney to the petition instead of Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, and Co., and the disallowance in consequence thereof of payments made by the latter.

Mellish, Q. C. and F. M. White showed cause against, and Keane, Q. C. supported the rule.

BOVILL, C. J.—The rule was granted in this case, as in the others concerning which we gave judgment this morning, in order to discuss the principles of taxation. That judgment (see page 99) will conclude some of the disputed points in this case. With regard to the fees for consultations, the rule will be made absolute; but as to the other points on which the rule was granted the petitioner has not satisfied me that the master was wrong. One difficulty in this case was in discriminating between the costs of the successful and unsuccessful parts of the petition. Only one case was prepared and delivered to counsel for both branches of the petition, and it is impossible for us to interfere with the discretion the master has exercised in separating these branches. The first complaint by the petitioner is that the master allowed only the costs of seventy-two witnesses, although 400 were subpoenaed; it seems to me that they were collected most recklessly, and certainly a large number of them never ought to have been subpoenaed at all. It has been found, however, that fifty of those whose expenses were not allowed, when examined subsequently before the royal commissioners, admitted that they had received bribes. This, however, was not known at the time of the taxation, and the master had to determine from what took place at the trial of the petition how many of these 400 were properly summoned; it was not known what these witnesses would prove before they were called, and it was unlikely they would admit bribery without an indemnity. It is difficult for us to say that the master could have done differently; before we interfere it must be made out that he exercised his discretion improperly. The next point is the allowance of 126*l.* for preliminary investigation; and concerning that sum we are in a peculiar difficulty, for we have no means of determining the matter. The master, although he has allowed a lump sum, informs us that he considered all the items charged, and found that many of them related to the scrutiny. We are not, therefore, inclined to interfere with his discretion; at all events, we do not see our way to make an order for the review of the taxation on that ground. Then the master allowed a folio and a half for each witness, without reference to the length of their evidence; that matter, however, cannot be interfered with, and I am not prepared to say it was not as good a plan of computing the proper costs to be allowed as any other. With regard to the other points, the fees to counsel, and the number of counsel allowed, I do not consider, from what I know of the case, that the court would be justified in interfering; we have not the briefs before us, but, from the length of time the trial of the petition lasted, I think the fees allowed by the master for counsel seem to be sufficient. The last point taken by the petitioner is that the master allowed only the expenses of Mr. Abel Tillett, and not those of the London attorneys; but he reports to us that he has made an allowance for the expenses of both, and we will not therefore interfere as to the amount. The consultations, according to our decision in the other cases, will be allowed; therefore on that point the rule will be made absolute.

CLOWES (Administratrix, &c.) v. HUGHES AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.]

SMITH, J. concurred.

BRETT, J.—The only doubt I have entertained in this case was concerning the allowance of 126*l.* for the preliminary investigation; if this sum had been arrived at without going into the items, I think it ought to have been reviewed. But as the master has considered all the items charged, and as most of them had reference to the scrutiny, I cannot say that the master was wrong.

Rule absolute as to fees for consultations; discharged as to other points. Costs for petitioner.

Jan. 18 and Feb. 11.

CLOWES (Administratrix, &c.) v. HUGHES AND ANOTHER.

Mortgage-deed—Clause creating tenancy on mortgagor's default in payment—Alteration of relation between the parties—Previous notice by mortgagee of intention to treat mortgagor as tenant—Mortgagee's right of distress.

Under a clause in a mortgage-deed, that if the mortgagor should at any time make default in any one or more of the several payments therein mentioned and thereby secured, "then immediately, or at any time after any such default, the mortgagor should hold the mortgaged premises as yearly tenant to the mortgagee from the date of the deed, at a yearly rent of the amount and payable as therein mentioned, and that the mortgagee should have the same remedies for recovering the said rent, as if the same had been reserved on a lease," the mortgagee is not, upon default being made by the mortgagor, warranted in treating the latter as a tenant, without having previously given him notice of an intention so to treat him and to change the relation between them from that of mortgagee and mortgagor to that of landlord and tenant; and therefore a distress levied by the mortgagee, without any such notice, upon the goods of a third party upon the mortgagor's premises, for rent alleged to have accrued due since the mortgagor's default, cannot be justified.

So held by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Channell, and Pigott, B.B.), in trover against the defendants by the owner of the goods distrained.

This was an action of trover by the plaintiff as administratrix of the personal estate of Edward Clowes, deceased, to recover the value of certain goods and furniture taken by the defendants under a distress for rent. The declaration contained a count against the defendants for the conversion of the goods by them in Clowes's lifetime, and a second count for a conversion of the goods of the plaintiff as administratrix as aforesaid, and there was also the usual money count.

The defendants pleaded:—1. To the first count, not guilty. 2. Further to the first count, that the goods were not the goods of the said Edward Clowes. 3. Further to the second count, denying that the goods were the goods of the plaintiff as administratrix. 4. To the residue of the declaration, never indebted.

Upon all these pleas issue was joined.

At the trial before Bovill, C.J., at the last Carnarvonshire summer assizes, at Carnarvon, 1869, the following appeared to be the facts of the case.

On the 21st June 1866, one Lewis Davies being indebted to the deceased, Edward Clowes, executed to him, as a security for the debt, a bill of sale of all his household furniture, goods, chattels, and effects, in or about his dwelling-house and premises at Llandrillo, subject to a proviso for redemption, and to an agreement that if Davies should instantly on demand pay to the said E. Clowes, his executors, administrators, or assigns, the principal and interest moneys therein mentioned, the said indenture should be void; with power to the said E. Clowes, his executors, administrators, and assigns, and his or their agent or agents, in case of default in payment of any of the said moneys, upon demand made as aforesaid, to enter upon the said premises, and to remain therein and peaceably, &c., to receive and take into his and their possession, all and every the said furniture, &c., and at his or their pleasure, and without the consent of the said mortgagor, to sell the same in manner therein mentioned.

Subsequently to the date and execution of the said bill of sale, Davies became a member of, and a subscriber for ten shares, in a building society called "the Llanrwst and North Wales Benefit Building Society," of which the defendants were the trustees, and the rules of which society were duly registered and certified under the Act of Parliament in that behalf. By the fifth of such rules it was declared and provided that "every mortgage-deed granted to the society should contain all powers, &c., applicable to a mortgage in such cases, including a power authorising the trustees to proceed to a sale of the hereditaments comprised therein, in case any advance or repayment agreed to be paid by the mortgagor should be in arrear as therein mentioned, and further, that in all cases where the premises mortgaged to the society should be in the occupation of the member occupying the same, he should become annual tenant to the society in respect thereof, at a rent equal to, and payable at such times as the advance repayments agreed to be paid by him should be payable and due.

Subsequently to the giving of the before-mentioned bill of sale to Clowes, Davies executed a mortgage to the said building society of the house and premises in which he resided, and in which the goods comprised in the said bill of sale were. The mortgage-deed was dated the 24th Dec., 1866, and thereby, after reciting (inter alia) that Davies was a member, and had subscribed for ten shares in the said society, and by the said rules was entitled to receive out of the funds thereof 500*l.*, upon a mortgage being executed to the trustees, securing the payments to become due in respect of such shares. Davies assigned the said dwelling-house and a piece of land, at Llandrillo aforesaid, unto and to the use of the defendants (W. E. Hughes and J. Williams, the said trustees), their heirs and assigns, upon trust for sale as therein mentioned, in case of default by Davies, at any time thereafter, in any one or more of the said payments therein specified, and then or thereafter required to be made by the said rules. And, for further securing the payments of the moneys expressed to be thereby secured, it was agreed that if Davies, his heirs, &c., should at any time thereafter make default in any one or more of the said payments, then or thereafter required to be made by the rules of the said society at the time being in force, in respect of the said several payments, whether for subscriptions, redemption money, fines, or otherwise, or in the observance or performance, in all respects, of the same rules, then immediately or at any time after any such default should have been made, the said L. Davies, his executors, administrators, and assigns, should hold the said premises expressed to be thereby conveyed, as yearly tenant, to the said several parties thereto of the fourth part (the defendants), their heirs and assigns, or the trustees or trustee for the time being of the said society, from the day of the date of the said mortgage, at and under the yearly rent of 57*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, payable by two equal portions on the 1st May and 1st November in every year; and that they, the said trustees or trustee for the time being, should have the same remedies for recovering the said rent as if the same had been reserved upon a common lease. And it was thereby declared that the said rent, to be so received by the trustees, should be applied in payment of the moneys for the time being payable by Davies, pursuant to the said rules, in respect of the shares so received by him in advance as aforesaid.

The deceased Clowes was an executing party to the said mortgage-deed, for the purpose of giving to the 500*l.* thereby secured to the defendants, priority, as a first charge upon the said hereditaments, therein comprised, over a prior mortgage security held by him upon the same property.

Davies having subsequently subscribed for another share in the said society, borrowed 50*l.* more from the defendants thereon, and executed to them a further charge for the amount upon his said house and land.

The goods and furniture comprised in Clowes' bill of sale remained, under the provisions thereof, in the possession of Davies in his said dwelling-house, from the date of the said bill of sale in June 1866, until the taking possession of them by the plaintiff next hereinafter mentioned. Clowes died in the month of Feb. 1869, and thereupon the plaintiff, as his administratrix, desiring to realise the security, made the necessary demand upon Davies of payment of the principal and interest due thereon, and in default of payment took possession of the said goods and furniture by putting a bailiff in possession of them upon the said premises, under the bill of sale, upon the 13th April following.

Davies had made default in March 1868 in payment of the moneys required by the said rules to be made by him, and on the 5th May 1869 the defendants levied a distress upon the goods in the dwelling-house comprised in their mortgage-deed of 24th Dec. 1866, for one year's rent, claimed to be due to them on the 1st May 1869, under the provisions of their said mortgage-deed, having on the previous day, the 4th May, served the following notice on the plaintiff's bailiffs in possession of the said goods:

To the legal personal representatives of Edwd. Clowes, late of, &c., and to E. Thomas and Thos. Hallworth, their bailiffs or agents. We, the undersigned, trustees of the Llanrwst and North Wales Benefit Building Society, hereby give you and every of you notice that there is now due and owing to us, as trustees as aforesaid, from Lewis Davies, of Llandrillo, &c. (whose goods and chattels you have seized under a bill of sale executed by the said L. Davies in favour of the said E. Clowes), the sum of 67*l.* 2*s.* 5*d.* for rent and arrears of rent in respect of the dwelling house and premises situate at Llandrillo aforesaid, and now in the occupation of the said L. Davies, whereof you have this notice. Dated the 4th May 1869.

W. E. HUGHES.
ISAIAH WILLIAMS.

Upon this an arrangement was come to, between the respective attorneys for the plaintiff and the defendant, on the 10th May, that the auctioneer should retain out of the sale moneys the sum of 84*l.*, and if within a specified time the plaintiff should bring an action against the defendants, for the purpose of trying their right to distrain, as against the plaintiff under the bill of sale of the same property, then the auctioneer should retain such moneys until a verdict or judgment in such proceedings, and the same moneys should abide the result thereof; but if no proceedings were taken within such time, then the said 84*l.* was to be paid to the defendants. The sale took place on the 12th May, and 84*l.* was retained by the auctioneer, and this action was brought in pursuance of the above arrangement.

It was admitted that, with the exception of the before-mentioned notice of the 4th May 1869 to the plaintiff's men in possession, the defendants had given no intimation whatever to Davies of any intention on their part to change the position in which they stood, the one to the other, of mortgagor and mortgagee, into that of landlord and tenant, and to treat him as a tenant under the before-mentioned clauses of their mortgage-deed of 24th Dec. 1866.

Upon the above facts being stated at the trial by the respective counsel on each side, a verdict was found for the defendants, and leave was reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for her for 76*l.* 5*s.* Accordingly, in Michaelmas Term last (6th Nov.), M. Lloyd, on the part of the plaintiff, obtained a rule to set aside the defendant's verdict, and to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for 76*l.* 5*s.* (unless the defendants consent to the facts being stated in a special case) on the ground that the deed of 24th Dec. 1866 did not give lawful authority to defendants to distrain the goods of a third person. Against that rule

McIntyre and Willis, for the defendants, now showed cause.—Default in payment by Davies under the mortgage-deed to the defendants was made in March 1868. The repayments under that deed were to be 14*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.* quarterly, and the relation of landlord and tenant existed, under the express terms of the deed, immediately on default being made in any one of them, and the rent was then to be paid half yearly in May and November. The distress was made for a year's rent, 57*l.* 11*s.*, which, with the amount due for fines incurred, and the interest due on the 50*l.* further charge, amount in all to 67*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* [MARTIN, B.—Do you contend that if a man has goods lawfully on another man's premises they can be distrained for under an agreement such as that in this case?] Certainly, that is what is contended for on the part of the defendants. [MARTIN, B.—It is contrary to justice and reason. If the owner of premises permits A. to keep goods on them, and then demises the premises to B. at a rent, can he distrain those goods for rent which has become due? It is not as though the goods had been put on the premises after the demise.] But they are allowed to remain there.

CLOWES (Administratrix, &c.) v. HUGHES AND ANOTHER.

[Ex.]

[MARTIN, B.—The plaintiff knew nothing of the arrangement between the defendants and Davies.] The plaintiff's intestate was a party to the defendant's mortgage-deed, and so had notice. He could not be in a better position than a person bringing goods upon demised premises. [MARTIN, B.—How do you make this a demise, which must be from a day certain?] It is made certain by reference to the happening of a certain event. On principle the goods on the premises demised by this deed were liable. There is no distinction between a tenancy so created and an ordinary one, for all tenancies are the creatures of agreement. There may be a fore-hand rent, and to distrain for it is as much an incident of tenancy as distress in respect of past occupation for rent due by effluxion of time. The goods are put there at the party's own risk, and though he may have a remedy against the lessee as for a fraud, the landlord's rights are not thereby affected. As a general rule, everything, with certain well-known exceptions, found on the premises, whether belonging to the tenant or a stranger, is distrainable, the reason being that the landlord has a lien on them in respect of the place in which they are found, and not in respect of the person to whom they belong: (Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 9th edit. p. 395.) If this deed created, as it is confidently submitted it did, the relation of landlord and tenant, and if there may be a lease in futuro, then the incident of distress on all goods on the premises follows as of course. Had Davies removed all his goods and brought other goods there, then if the plaintiff's argument is to prevail, there would be no remedy for the landlord by distress at all. Then it is said that this clause is inconsistent with the clause for payment of the quarterly interest, and so must be rejected on the authority of Walker v. Giles, 6 C. B. 662; 18 L. J. 323, C. P., where it was held that a clause somewhat similar did not operate as a demise so as to sustain an avowry alleging a tenancy under the mortgagees, the general scope of the deed being inconsistent with such a construction. But that case was doubted in the subsequent case in this court of Pinhorn v. Souster, 8 Ex. 763; 22 L. J. 18, Ex., since which latter case it has been clearly established that a mortgagor may, by the mortgage-deed, create a tenancy in himself from the date of the mortgage, provided the deed contains provisions that the amount paid as rent shall, in fact, be paid in satisfaction of the mortgage-debt. In Walker v. Giles there was no such clause as that, but in the present case there is. The present case is distinguishable from Walker v. Giles and Pinhorn v. Souster (ubi sup.), and Turner v. Barnes and others, 2 B. & S. 435; 31 L. J. 170, Q. B.; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 418, for here there is to be no tenancy until default in payment. They cited also

M. Lloyd, and Jos. Sharpe for the plaintiff, contra, in support of their rule. It has been acknowledged by the court that the privilege of distress, as against the goods of third parties, ought not to be extended. No doubt it is competent to make a mortgage security in the form of a lease, the two being contemporaneous, the mortgage being a lease and the lease being a mortgage. But that is not so here. In the first place this deed violates the rule of law with regard to certainty; the tenancy is not to commence unless the mortgagee chooses it to be so. Now it is common learning that all leases whether in presenti or in futuro, "must have a certain commencement and a certain determination:" (Shep. Touch. 267.) Here there is uncertainty as to the commencement. He is to become tenant "immediately upon, or at any time after, making default." An option is to be exercised, and here it was not exercised till the 4th May. Again it is to be "in default of payment." But of payment of what? Why, of any sum of money which the society may by their rules choose to impose. It is void, therefore, for uncertainty. Again, there is inconsistency in the provisions of the deed. At the execution of the deed the mortgagor is not a tenant at all, but on default he is to be tenant from its date; therefore he may be, at one and the same time, tenant and not tenant. As was said by Parke, B., in Pinhorn v. Souster (ubi sup.), this cannot be done. Again, the right to rent from the date of the deed accrues on default in payment of any one of the instalments. So that if default were made in the last instalment, the trustees might, if the clause be good, distrain for the entire rent from the date, which might fivefold exceed the amount actually due. For the same reason as in Walker v. Giles (ubi sup.), this clause in the mortgage-deed is inoperative to create a tenancy. It is only by the court's putting a construction on the clause which the words do not warrant that these goods can be held to be distrainable. At the most it amounts only to a licence, from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, to take the goods of the mortgagor on the premises, in the nature of a distress, and cannot, therefore, extend to give a distress upon goods of a third party. To construe it as a licence would be proper enough between the parties, and would give effect to every word. Again, in order to change the relation between the parties from that of mortgagor and mortgagee to that of landlord and tenant, some notice of an intention on the defendants' part so to change it should have been given to the plaintiff. Here none was given, except that of the 4th May to the bailiffs in possession, and that notice cannot have such an operation as would be necessary for the purpose. They cited also Wyburd v. Tuck, 1 Bos. & Pul. 454.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 11.—The judgment of the Court (Kelly, C. B., and Martin, Channell and Piggot, B.B.) was now delivered as follows by MARTIN, B.—This was an action of trover, which was tried before the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas at the last summer assizes for the county of Carnarvon, when, without calling any witnesses, it was agreed between the parties and counsel on both sides, that the facts should be taken to be as they were stated by counsel, and that a verdict should be entered thereon for the defendants, with leave reserved to the plaintiff to move to set aside that verdict, and to enter a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum mentioned in the rule (unless the defendants consent to the facts being stated in a special case) on the ground that the deed of the 24th Dec. 1866 gave no lawful authority to the defendants to distrain the goods of a third person. The case was argued before us during the preceding Hilary Term, and the facts appear to be as follows: The action was in trover. The plaintiff claimed the goods in question, under a bill of sale dated the 21st June 1866. By the provisions of that deed the goods remained in the possession of Davies, the maker of it, on the premises of which he was the owner and occupier, from the date of the bill of sale to the 13th April 1869. Upon the death of Clowes, the holder of the bill of sale, in February 1869, the plaintiff, as his administratrix, on the 13th April put a man in possession of the goods under the bill of sale, who continued in such possession until after the defendants took possession of the same goods, under a distress, as next mentioned. Now this distress was made by the defendants under a deed bearing date the 24th Dec. 1866, and made between Davies and the defendants, and which was in the nature of a mortgage-deed, whereby, for the better securing the payments expressed to be secured by the deed, it was agreed and declared that if Davies, the mortgagor, "should at any time thereafter make default in any one or more of the several payments therein mentioned, then immediately or at any time after any such default should have been made, Davies should hold the said premises as yearly tenant to the defendants, at and under the yearly rent" therein mentioned, and payable as therein mentioned, and that the defendants "should have the same remedies for recovering the said rent as if the same had been reserved upon a lease." Default in payment was made by Davies in March 1868, and in May 1869, the defendants, who insisted that upon such default Davies became their tenant of the premises, distrained the goods of the plaintiff (who was a stranger so far as the defendants were concerned) upon the premises of Davies, for one year's rent alleged by them to have accrued due, under the terms of the above clause in their mortgage-deed, since the default made by Davies as above mentioned. It does not appear that any notice had ever been given by the defendants to the mortgagor, Davies, of any intention on their part to alter the relation in which the parties respectively stood, the one towards the other, from that of mortgagor and mortgagee to that of landlord and tenant. Now we are all clearly of opinion that, for the purposes of altering the relation in which the parties stood to each other, of mortgagor and mortgagee, and before that clause in the plaintiff's deed of the 24th Dec. 1866, to which I have referred, could be acted upon so as to create a tenancy between the parties, some notice should have been given or some communication have been made by the mortgagees to the mortgagor, of their intention so to treat him. Until that were done, the defendants could not treat the mortgagor as a tenant, and therefore this distress cannot be justified. We give no opinion upon the question whether the goods of the plaintiff were liable to this distress in any case, the mortgage being long subsequent to the bill of sale. The plaintiff's rule, therefore, will be made absolute.

Thursday, Feb. 24.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

AYRES v. ELBOROUGH.

Malicious prosecution—Want of reasonable and probable cause—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 84.

The mere fact that a report and balance sheet prepared and published by the secretary of a public company, contains errors or misstatements, does not afford "reasonable and probable cause" for charging him criminally under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 84, and will be no defence to an action for malicious prosecution brought by him if he has been so charged, unless some proof be given that he made and circulated the report and balance-sheet as a wilful falsehood and with a fraudulent intent.

Action for malicious prosecution.

Murphy and H. R. Mansel Jones, for the plaintiff.

Perry, Serjt., Besley, and Shaw, for the defendant.

The plaintiff was the Secretary of the Northern Railway of Buenos Ayres Company (Limited), and the defendant had formerly been the secretary of that company.

In the month of Oct. 1868, the defendant laid an information before the Lord Mayor, and obtained a summons directed to the plaintiff, charging him with an offence under the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 84, viz., that he, in the month of Sept. 1866, then being a public officer of the said Northern Railway, unlawfully made, circulated, and published, a certain written statement and account, to wit, a report and balance-sheet relating to the said company's affairs, knowing the same to be false in a material particular, with intent to defraud.

The plaintiff attended in obedience to the summons, and the charge against him was dismissed.

This was the malicious prosecution complained of.

It appeared that the defendant had preceded the plaintiff in the office of secretary to the company, but that in April 1866 the board of directors came to a resolution to dispense with his services, and the plaintiff was appointed. In a subsequent conversation with the chairman of the company, the defendant said, "You and Mr. Ayres need not flatter yourselves you will have an easy time of it. I shall never let the matter rest."

In Aug. 1866, the plaintiff prepared a balance-sheet and statement of accounts which were approved by the directors and passed at the annual meeting of the shareholders. The report of the company's affairs submitted by the board to that meeting contained the following paragraph:

"It will be observed that in the revenue account many items appear which have been charged hitherto to capital in the annual balance-sheets. As the whole line has been completed throughout the past financial year, the directors have deemed it right to debit the revenue account with all that is fairly chargeable to it, in order that every shareholder may clearly understand the actual result of the year's working."

The defendant objected to the balance-sheet and statement of accounts on two grounds, alleging, first, that they made the position of the company appear better than it really was, by the omission of certain debentures held as collateral security for a loan which appeared in the accounts, and of a large claim of the contractor which was in dispute; secondly that they made the position of the company appear worse than it really was by placing certain expenditure alleged to be on capital account to revenue.

The chairman and directors justified and explained the accounts to the defendant. In the same year one Mr. Fielden raised similar objections to the accounts, and laid an information before the Lord Mayor against three of the directors of the company, containing nearly the same charges as those subsequently made by the defendant against the plaintiff.

The charge against the directors was dismissed.

On the 26th March 1867, the defendant caused a special general meeting of the company to be convened, and laid before it the whole of his charges against the accounts, when the auditor defended and justified the accounts, and the chairman offered to meet any shareholders at the office to go into the accounts and satisfy them of their correctness.

These explanations were reiterated on different occasions during a course of protracted litigation between the defendant and the company, in Chancery and elsewhere. Nevertheless, in the year 1868 the defendant prosecuted the plaintiff as aforesaid.

To support the present action for malicious prosecution, the plaintiff called the chairman of the company, who gave a reasonable explanation of the report and balance-sheet, which the defendant had impugned.

At the close of the defendant's case,

BLACKBURN, J., said: I believe that the question of "reasonable and probable cause" is for the judge. Now, I ask—What if the accounts were false? The charge against the plaintiff before the magistrates was for circulating, making, and publishing a written account which he knew to be false in a material particular, with intent to defraud; and, assuming that these accounts were wrongly stated, I cannot see what evidence there was before the defendant in 1866 to give him grounds for making this personal charge against Mr. Ayres. The facts, of course, must be found by the jury, but grant in the defendant's favour that the accounts were wrong, and that the amounts were charged to revenue and not to capital, and granted a mistake as to 25,000*l.*, that does not prove that the thing was done as a wilful falsehood with fraudulent intent.

COURT OF BANKRUPTCY.

Thursday, Feb. 17.

(Before the CHIEF JUDGE.)

Re JONES.

*Petition for liquidation—Adverse resolution of creditors
Act of bankruptcy—Nature of petition for adjudication—Practice.*

A petition for liquidation, presented under the 125th section of the B. A. 1869, under which the creditors resolved that the debtor's estate should be wound-up in bankruptcy, is an act of bankruptcy, upon which any creditor may present a petition for adjudication.

In such petition all the facts should be fully stated.

This was an ex parte application on behalf of a creditor seeking to obtain a petition for adjudication against a debtor, and came before the court under the following circumstances:—

On the 26th Jan. 1870 the debtor filed a petition for liquidation under the provisions of the 125th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 and the 252nd General Order of the 1st Jan. 1870, in the form prescribed (No. 106) in the schedule annexed, stating that he was unable to pay his debts, and was desirous of instituting proceedings for liquidation of his affairs by arrangement or composition with his creditors.

The statutory meeting referred to in the 254th General Order was held on the 11th Feb., when the creditors resolved to have the debtor's estate wound-up in bankruptcy, and not by way of liquidation. The resolution was duly registered, and thereupon the applicant on the 16th Feb. presented a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against Jones wherein was contained an allegation that the act of bankruptcy was the filing of the petition for liquidation by arrangement under the 125th section; that a meeting was convened for the 11th Feb.; and that at such meeting the creditors neglected to pass any such resolution as that referred to in the 262nd General Order, or any special or extraordinary resolution under the 266th General Order, in reference to the liquidation of the affairs of the debtor by arrangement or composition.

Upon the presentation of the petition the registrar, before whom the case was heard, expressed his opinion that he had no power to deal with the matter, and that the powers delegated to him by the General Orders of Jan. 1 and Jan. 18, 1870, did not extend to this case, and thereupon he remitted the matter to the Chief Judge.

By the 267th General Order of Jan. 1, 1870, it is provided that "in the event of any neglect on the part of the creditors to pass such resolution, the court may, on the application of any of the creditors, and after notice to the debtor, make an order of adjudication against the debtor, or direct the bankruptcy to be proceeded with as the case may be."

Rooks, solicitor, now applied to the court under the 267th General Order of 1st Jan. 1870, to fix a day for the hearing of the petition in order that notice might be given under that rule to the debtor.

THE CHIEF JUDGE.—I think this matter is clearly within the power delegated to the registrars. This is the first case of the kind, and I shall not hesitate to give the applicant some little trouble in order that this case may be quite correct as a precedent. The petition must, I think, be amended. A petition of this nature ought not to be too curt; the allegations ought to be comprehensive. All dates should be supplied, and it should be stated what action the creditors did take, and what was the nature of the resolution passed by the creditors. It must also state that the meeting was duly convened and held. When the petition shall have been amended, or a new petition presented there will be no difficulty, and the registrar will answer the petition; but the applicant must produce before the registrar office copies of the debtor's petition and of the resolution. The stamp upon the present petition will be allowed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.—IN ADMIRALTY.

THE LADY FRANKLIN.

(Before DAVIS, J.)

Bill of lading—Mistake—Lien.

A bill of lading was given for goods shipped on board the Lady Franklin, but these goods had been shipped on board another vessel which was lost. The bill was given under a mistake by a common agent, but the ships did not belong to the same owner.

Held, that the consignees had no lien upon the Lady Franklin for the goods mentioned in the bill of lading which had not been delivered, a bill of lading being merely an acknowledgment and prima facie evidence of the receipt of goods, not conclusive but open to contradiction by parol testimony.

DAVIS, J.—The libel in this case alleges that the libellants, in the month of Nov. 1863, by their agent, Edward Sanderson, caused to be delivered at Milwaukee, to the steamer Lady Franklin, 340 barrels of flour, to be transported to Port Sarnia, on the St. Clair river, for which shipment they received a bill of lading, but that 290 barrels of the flour were never delivered, and, as a consequence of this state of things, they claim a maritime lien on the vessel for the value of this flour. The answer denies that the flour in controversy was ever delivered to the master, or shipped on board of the steamer. The facts in the case, which raise the question to be decided, are few, and not seriously controverted. There were, in 1863, a line of steamers engaged in the lake service from Milwaukee to Port Sarnia, and running in connection with the Grand Trunk Railway — of which the Lady Franklin was one; but each boat had separate owners, and there was no joint undertaking that any one of the boats should be responsible for the breach of a contract or misconduct of another. This line of steamers had a particular warehouse in Milwaukee, owned by Goodrich, at which they stopped, which was used to receive and store freight for them, of which Courtenay was the agent, who also acted as agent for the boats in engaging and shipping freight. The cargo of flour in dispute was received by Courtenay for the libellants through Sanderson, their agent, with an agreement to ship it for them on one of this line of steamers; and, in point of fact, fifty barrels were shipped on the Antelope, one of the line, and received by the libellants. The remaining 290 barrels, for which the lien is claimed on the Franklin, were also shipped on the 7th Nov. by the Water Witch, another boat in the same line, and consigned to the libellants, but were not received by them, because the boat foundered at sea. Notwithstanding these shipments, a clerk in the warehouse, under Courtenay, in the absence of Courtenay, in ignorance that the flour had been previously shipped on the Antelope and Water Witch, but supposing it still in the warehouse for shipment, by mistake gave to Sanderson the bill of lading attached to the libel. The attempt made in the prosecution of this libel to charge this vessel for the non-delivery of a cargo which she never received, and, therefore, could not deliver, because of a false bill of lading, cannot be successful, and we are somewhat surprised that the point is pressed here. Courtenay was a warehouseman in Milwaukee, and, although he acted as agent for the different steamers of the Grand Trunk line, he did not receive the flour to be sent by one particular steamer in preference to another. His engagement had this meaning, and nothing more—to forward the flour with all practical expedition by the first suitable steamer of the line which arrived in port that would carry it. Having actually shipped it in good condition in advance of the arrival of the Franklin in port, by seaworthy steamers, against which nothing is alleged, he discharged his obligations to the libellants. It would be strange, indeed, if the owners of the Franklin were made to suffer because the common agent of all the boats had, through inadvertence, given a receipt for merchandise not on the boat, or in the warehouse even, but which was then on board other boats on its way to its destination. The case is not embarrassed by any question of a bona fide purchase on the strength of the bill of lading, for the libellants themselves were the real shippers. Such is the claim of the libel, and it is supported by the evidence, for Sanderson swears the flour belonged to the libellants on its delivery at the warehouse. In so far as a bill of lading is a contract, it cannot be explained by parol; but if a contract, it is also a receipt, and in that regard it may be explained, especially when it is used as the foundation of a suit between the original parties to it—the shippers of the merchandise and the owner of the vessel. The principle is elementary, and needs the citation of no authority to sustain it. In this case the bill of lading acknowledges the receipt of so much flour, and is prima facie evidence of the fact. It is, however, not conclusive on the point, but may be contradicted by oral testimony. The doctrine that the obligation between ship and cargo is mutual and reciprocal, and does not attach until the cargo is on board, or in the custody of the master, has been so often discussed and so long settled, that it would be useless labour to restate it on the principles which lie at its foundation. The case of the schooner Freeman v. Buckingham, decided by this court, 18 Howard, 192, is decisive of this case. It is true the bill of lading there was obtained fraudulently, while here it was given by mistake; but the principle is the same, and the court held in that case that there could be no lien, notwithstanding the bill of lading. The court say “there was no cargo to which the ship could be bound, and there was no contract for the performance of which the ship could stand as security.” The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS FROM THE COMMON PLEAS.

Monday, Feb. 7, 1870.

(Before KELLY, C. B., MARTIN, B., MELLOR, LUSH, and HANNEN, JJ., and CLEASBY, B.)

FOLEY v. THE UNITED FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY OF SYDNEY.

Insurance on chartered freight—At and from—Commencement of voyage upon which freight is to be earned.

The defendants insured the plaintiff's ship at and from Mauritius to Rice ports, and at and thence to a port or ports of call in Europe, on chartered freight valued at 1150l. By the charter-party the ship was to “sail and proceed on her present voyage from Calcutta to Mauritius, and having discharged her cargo there, proceed to Akyab,” to load and carry thence a cargo to Europe. The ship was lost in Port Louis, Mauritius, before she had discharged the whole of the cargo which she brought from Calcutta:

Held, that the loss was within the terms of the policy, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover his insurance upon the chartered freight.

This was a bill of exceptions to the ruling of Bovill, C. J. at Nisi Prius. It appeared from the judgment roll and the exceptions that the declaration was upon a policy of insurance upon chartered freight valued at 1150l. The premium paid was 84l. 10s. 6d., and the policy, which was in the usual form, contained the words, “whether lost or not lost, at and from Mauritius to Rice ports, and at and thence to a port or ports of call and discharge in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, on chartered freight, valued 1150l.; including the risk of craft and running down as annexed, on board the good ship Edmund Graham, whereof is master or whoever else shall go for master in the said ship, or by whatsoever name or names the same ship, or the master thereof is or shall be named or called, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship as above, and shall so continue and endure during her abode there, upon the said ship, &c.; and further until the said ship with all her ordnance, tackle, apparel, &c., and goods and merchandises whatsoever shall be arrived at as above upon the said ship, &c., until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety, and upon the goods and merchandises until the same be there discharged and safely landed. And it shall be lawful for the said ship, &c. in this voyage to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports or places whatsoever, without prejudice to this insurance.”

The declaration proceeded: “And the plaintiff thereupon paid to the said company the sum of 84l. 10s. 6d as a premium for the said insurance, and the said ship was by a certain charter-party let and hired for certain chartered freight payable for the use of the said ship upon the said insured voyage. And the plaintiff was then and thence until, and at the time of the loss hereinafter mentioned, interested in the said subject-matter of insurance to the full amount of all the moneys by him insured thereon, and the said policy was made for the use and benefit, and by the authority of the person or persons so interested as aforesaid, and the said ship was in good safety at Mauritius; and afterwards, during the continuance of the said risk, the said vessel and the said chartered freight was, by the perils insured against, wholly lost; and all conditions precedent necessary to entitle the plaintiff to be paid by the defendants the said sum so insured by them as aforesaid, have been performed and fulfilled. Yet the defendants have not paid the same. And the plaintiff also sues the defendants for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiff for money had and received by the defendants for the use of the plaintiff, and for interest upon money due from the defendants to the plaintiff, and forborne at interest by the plaintiff to the defendants at their request. And for money found to be due from the defendants to the plaintiff upon accounts stated between them.

The first five pleas traversed the allegations in the first count.

And for a plea to the last count of the declaration the defendants paid into court the sum of 84*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*

The jury found for the plaintiff for 1210*l.* beyond the sum paid into court.

At the trial it appeared by the plaintiff's evidence that the said ship Edmund Graham sailed from Calcutta with a cargo of rice in bags on the 10th Jan. 1868, and arrived at Port Louis, Mauritius on the 20th Feb. 1868, and was there anchored in good safety, and immediately proceeded to discharge her cargo. That on the 11th March 1868, when about 6500 bags of grain had been discharged from the said vessel, and about 9000 bags residue of the cargo were still on board, there was a violent hurricane at Port Louis aforesaid, from the effects of which the said ship parted from her anchor and was driven ashore and became a total wreck. The Lord Chief Justice directed the jury that if they believed the evidence, the policy had attached at the Mauritius at the time of the loss, and that the defendants were liable. Counsel for the defendants excepted to his Lordship's ruling.

The following is the material part of the charter-party:

It is this day mutually agreed between Captain W. H. Daviss, master, and Messrs. Gladstone, Wyllie, and Co. agents of the good ship or vessel called the Edmund Graham, 887 tons register, or thereabouts, now lying in the river Hooghly, on the one part, and Messrs. Wattenback, Heilgers, and Co., agents for Messrs. Burot, Gerber, and Co., of Akyab, merchants and charterers, on the other part.

That the said ship, being tight, staunch, and strong, in every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed on her present voyage to Mauritius, and having discharged her cargo there, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Akyab for orders (which are to be given within twenty-four hours), to load there or at Rangoon or Bassem (one port only), or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and shall load from the said charterers or their agents a full and complete cargo of rice in bags, which the said charterers bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture; and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Cork or Falmouth for orders (which shall be delivered within forty-eight hours after arrival there, otherwise demurrage at 30*l.* per day to accrue), to discharge at a safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both included, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver her cargo with all reasonable despatch on being paid freight.

Thirty-five running days (Sundays excepted) are to be allowed the said charterers (if the ship is not sooner despatched) for loading the said ship, to commence and be computed from the day on which the ship shall be ready to receive cargo, the master giving charterers notice of such readiness in writing; charterers to have the option of keeping the said ship ten working days on demurrage over and above said laying days at 200 rupees (two hundred) per day, to be paid daily as incurred. The vessel to be consigned at the port of discharge to freighters' agents free of commission on this charter-party. Freighters to have the option of cancelling the charter-party if the vessel does not arrive at Akyab on or before the 1st May 1868. Captain to sign bills of lading at any rate provided the aggregate amount equals the chartered rate. The owners of the ship to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage. Sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced to the master if required by him by freighters or their agents at the port of loading at current rate of exchange for the due appropriation of which the advancers shall not be responsible, not exceeding 600*l.* free of interest, but subject to a commission of 2½ per cent. and cost of insurance, such advance to be on account of the chartered freight from which it is to be deducted at settlement of the same, and is to be indorsed in bills of lading if required by the freighters or their agents. This charter-party is subject to an address commission of 2½ per cent. on the freight earned to be paid to the charterers or their agents at port of loading. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement, the estimated amount of freight.

Dated in Calcutta this 21st Dec. 1867.

Quain, Q. C. (with him J. C. Mathew) argued for the defendants.—The charter-party here on its face shows that another charter for a cargo from Calcutta to Mauritius was in existence; this charter takes the ship up at Mauritius at the termination of the other, and the contract upon the previous charter was not completed until the cargo was discharged. The question is when did this policy upon chartered freight first attach? We say that whatever may be the case with the ship, the policy upon the freight did not attach until the ship broke ground upon the voyage by which she was to earn the freight; she need not perhaps have actually set sail, but she must be ready to receive the cargo, and her cargo must be ready for her. In this case the inward cargo had not been discharged when she was lost. The rule is laid down in Arnould, vol. 1 (3rd edit.), p. 412, "That where a cargo has been contracted for, and is ready to be shipped on board at the time of the loss, and the ship being otherwise in a condition to receive the cargo is only prevented from doing so by the intervention of the perils insured against, the policy on freight attaches, and the underwriters are liable for the loss of the whole freight that would have been earned on the voyage, even though no part of the cargo has ever been shipped on board at all." The words "at and from" apply quite differently to policies on goods and ship and to policies on freight. There is a difference also between policies on ordinary freight, and on chartered freight; the cases on freight, strictly and properly so called (reward, that is, to be earned for the shipowner by the carriage of the merchant's goods), establish the rule, according to Arnould, p. 418, that, "unless therefore some goods were in fact shipped on board or only prevented from so being by the intervention of the loss, the shipowner's inchoate right to freight, as the price of the carriage of such goods, could obviously not have accrued." But in cases of chartered freight (p. 419), if "she has once broken ground upon the voyage on which freight is to be earned under the charter-party, and is prevented by the perils insured against from earning the freight, the assured is entitled to recover the whole amount insured upon freight, quite irrespective of the question whether at the time of loss she had taken any goods on board for voyage insured, or whether any were contracted to be shipped." When was the inception of this voyage? The ship must have broken ground upon the voyage on which freight was to be earned under the charter-party; that voyage is described in the charter-party here as "having discharged her cargo there" (at Mauritius), "shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to Akyab," shall load there, "and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Cork," "and discharge at a safe port in the United Kingdom or in the continent." We do not contend that breaking ground means necessarily leaving the place from which the voyage begins, but the other cargo must have been discharged, as in Devaux v. J'Anson, 5 Bing. N. C. 519, which, however, was a case concerning ordinary freight. The case of Thompson v. Taylor, 6 T. R. 478, was a decision upon chartered freight; there the voyage described in the charter-party was from London to Teneriffe, there to take on board a cargo and proceed to Barbadoes; the ship was taken as a prize before she arrived at Teneriffe; the policy on the freight for the carriage of this cargo was held to attach from the sailing of the ship from London; but Lord Kenyon said, p. 481, "The property against the loss of which the assured wished to be indemnified is that which he had a right to receive under the charter-party; and it seems now admitted that if the contract had its inception, if anything were done under it by the plaintiff who let his ship to hire, his right to freight commenced. That depends on the words of the charter-party." Now it is shown on the face of this charter that there was another charter from Calcutta to Mauritius; and at the time of the ship's loss she was in the performance of another voyage from that which was the subject of this charter-party. [HANNEN, J.—That does not appear. MARTIN, P.—Or suppose she was doubly covered at the time of the loss.] This charter cannot be otherwise interpreted but that there was another charter from Calcutta, and there is nothing in it to show an intention to insure a previous voyage. Manifestly one charter was to be in succession to the other. In no decided case was a policy upon freight held to attach during the existence of a contract upon a preliminary charter. Our argument is that in the case of a policy upon chartered freight, "at" must mean at the place where the ship is ready to take the cargo which will earn the freight. In Barber v. Fleming, a case recently decided, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 59, the loss was clearly within the policy because the ship got on shore when in ballast on her way, with the sole object to earn her freight. Thompson v. Taylor was followed by Horncastle v. Suart 7 East, 400, in which it was held that an insurance on freight at and from Dominica to London attached while the ship lay at Dominica delivering her outward cargo, but that decision was upon the ground that the contract of affreightment by the charter-party from London to Dominica and back was one entire contract. So also Davidson v. Willasey, 1 M. & Sel. 313. And in Forbes v. Cowie 1 Camp. 519, Lord Ellenborough referred to Horncastle v. Suart; he said "there, however, there was one charter-party for the outward and homeward voyage, and the freight was entire. That is the only ground upon which the decision can be sustained." In Forbes v. Aspinall, 13 East, 323, which was a case where the ordinary and not chartered freight was in question, it was said that "if the voyage has commenced in which the freight is to be earned, and be stopped by any of those perils, the assured will be entitled to recover to the full amount." In his judgment in Barber v. Fleming p. 71, Blackburn, J. cites the following passage from Phillips on Insurance, sect. 335 which is a strong authority against the plaintiff's contention in this case; "if the prior passage is merely preliminary to those for which the vessel is chartered, having no cargo deliverable at A. or any intermediate port, and the object in the passage to A is merely to prosecute the voyage thence to B, the interest in the whole freight under the charter-party accrues on the commencement of the first passage." And Blackburn, J. afterwards guards himself from saying that "if the owners had been carrying freight from Bombay to Howland's Island (which is exactly the case here from Calcutta to Mauritius) that might not raise a different question" from that which Barber v. Fleming decided. Moreover, it appears by the charter-party that the freighters were to have the option of cancelling the charter-party if the vessel did not arrive at Akyab by the 1st May 1868; therefore the subject of the policy was contingent upon an event which did not take place, and the plaintiff had no insurable interest in the policy.

Sir G. Honyman Q.C. (with him Watkin Williams) appeared for the plaintiff, but was not heard.

KELLY, C. B.—The plaintiff insured upon chartered freight at and from Mauritius to Rice ports, and at and thence to a port of call in the United Kingdom or continent. This chartered freight was to be earned by the ship Edmund Graham, which was lying at the date of the charter-party in the Hooghly; she was to sail and proceed on her then present voyage to Mauritius, and having discharged her cargo there, to sail and proceed to Akyab for orders, and to load there or at another of the Rice ports. The ship was lost at Port Louis, Mauritius, before all her cargo from Calcutta was discharged. It is now insisted that her loss was not within the policy and charter-party. Mr. Quain has argued that the policy upon which the action was brought attached only on the ship's sailing out of port; it was enough, however, for him to contend that it did not attach until the cargo from Calcutta was discharged, and the ship was ready to earn the chartered freight. The question for us is whether, upon the ordinary and true construction of the policy, she was at Mauritius when she was lost. It seems to me that it would be a strained construction of the policy to subdivide the period during which the ship was at Port Louis into two portions, and to say that she shall not be insured for more than one of those portions. But the case is also put on another and different ground—it is said that the interest and risk only attach when the voyage commences, that is, at least, after the other cargo has been discharged. If so, it would only amount to this, that insurance could not be effected on freight to be earned upon any voyage not actually commenced if any other cargo is at the time on board. The cases of Thompson v. Taylor and Barber v. Fleming show that the risk upon chartered freight may commence earlier than the beginning of the voyage upon which the freight is to be earned, whatever be the language of the policy. Upon this point these two cases are conclusive. The real doctrine is, that if the voyage has commenced by which chartered freight is to be ultimately earned, there is an inchoate title to the insurance upon the freight, provided that the language of the policy and charter-party will permit it. In the case of Barber v. Fleming the voyage upon which the ship was lost was from Bombay to Howland's Island, where the policy was de facto to attach, the risk insured against being upon chartered freight on the voyage at and from Howland's Island to the United Kingdom; the beginning of the earnment of the freight was at Howland's Island, but still by the terms of the policy the vessel was to proceed from Bombay to Howland's Island and thence to the port of final discharge, just in the same way as by this policy the ship was to proceed from Calcutta to Mauritius, and thence to the Rice ports. The loss took place before the ship's arrival at Howland's island, and if Mr. Quain's argument could be supported that policy would have been void. Nevertheless, it was held that the plaintiff could recover against the underwriters. Certainly the ship there was sailing in ballast, and here there was a cargo from Calcutta to Mauritius; but if we look at the other case I have mentioned we find conclusive authority on this point. There the ship was chartered to proceed from London to Teneriffe, and there to take a cargo. There, as here, the freight could not begin to be earned until the ship arrived at the intermediate port; it was held, nevertheless, that a policy of insurance on the freight for that cargo attached from the sailing of the ship from London. Lord Kenyon put the question upon clear and intelligible grounds. After distinguishing the case from Tonge v. Watts he said "The property, against the loss of which the assured wished to be indemnified, is that which he had a right to receive under the charter-party; and it seems now admitted that if the contract had its inception, if anything were done under it by the plaintiff who let his ship to hire, his right to freight commenced. That depends upon the words of the charter-party." Now here from this charter-party it appears that the voyage was to commence from Calcutta, the ship "shall with all convenient speed, sail and proceed on her present voyage to Mauritius, and having discharged her cargo there, shall with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Akyab," there to load, &c. The inchoate right to the insurance on freight from Akyab attached when the voyage was commenced for the purpose of going to the place where the freight was to be earned. The owner of the ship might have incurred expense to put the ship in a condition to proceed from Mauritius to the Rice ports. I think, therefore, that on the principle of the insurance cases the loss took place within the period covered by the policy, and there is left for us to consider only the plain and simple question, what is the plain meaning of the words and terms here used? "At and from Mauritius" in the ordinary and natural signification of the expression imports the whole time from the arrival of the ship at Mauritius to her departure, together with the subsequent voyage. The loss was, therefore, within the terms of the policy, and the judgment must be affirmed.

MARTIN B.—I am of the same opinion, and it seems to me to be a question of the meaning of the simple words in the policy. On the 2nd March 1868, this policy was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendants on chartered freight, valued at 1150*l.* at and from Mauritius to Rice ports. In words as plain as can be written, the insurer undertook his risk upon the policy as soon as the ship reached Mauritius, provided that at the time and place mentioned the freight was lost by the perils insured against. The charter-party recites the agreement between the captain and the agents of the owners of the ship Edmund Graham on the one part, and the agents of the charterers on the other. The contract is that the ship being tight, staunch, and strong, in every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed on her present voyage to Mauritius, and, having discharged her cargo, then proceed to Akyab to load a cargo for a port in the United Kingdom or Continent. Now, if the test of the underwriter's risk was the commencement of the voyage upon which the freight was to be earned, the two cases cited by my Lord would be sufficient to show that the loss here took place within the limits of the policy; but in my opinion it is not necessary to consider that test, for the words "at and from" certainly include the time during which the ship was discharging her cargo. What the plaintiff wanted to insure was the loss of the chartered freight. What occurred? The ship arrived safely at Mauritius, and was as much lost "at Mauritius" as if the cargo had been entirely discharged. Why should not the plaintiff be indemnified? This is, I think, about as plain a case as there possibly could be, and there cannot be any ground for not applying to it the reasonable meaning of the words used. If an authority were wanted, which I think is not, that of Cockburn, C.J., in Barber v. Fleming is sufficient. In every word of his judgment I concur, for I think it good law and good sense. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

Disappearance of a person—Absence of all tidings—Presumption of death.

The authorities at law and equity as to the presumption of death in the case of a person who has not been heard of reviewed and considered, and the law upon the point settled.

A person who has not been heard of in any manner for seven years, will be presumed to be dead at the end of those seven years; but it will not be presumed that he died at any particular moment, nor that he has lived any given time after the latest moment when he is proved to have been alive.

This was an appeal from a decision of James, V.C., who declared that Nicholas Phené Mill, who had not been heard of for upwards of seven years, must be taken to have survived the testator in the matter, his uncle Francis Phené, and that the fund in court, which had been paid in by the trustees, must be paid out to his representative.

The hearing before his Honour is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 107, where the facts are sufficiently stated. In the judgment of Giffard, L. J., the circumstances relating to the disappearance of Nicholas Phené Mill are more fully referred to.

Bristowe, Q. C. and Everitt supported the appeal.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Bagshawe, for the respondent, the administrator of N. P. Mill.

Edwards and Langworthy for parties in the same interests as the appellants.

C. J. Hill for the trustees who had paid in the fund.

Everitt having replied, judgment was reserved until the 14th Jan., when Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—This is an appeal from so much of an order of James, V.C. as directs the residue of a fund, which is standing in court to “the account of the share intended for Nicholas Phené Mill,” to be paid to his administrator. The order was made upon the hypothesis that Nicholas Phené Mill survived Francis Phené, the testator. The learned Vice-Chancellor, in making the order stated that he did so in deference to the authority of three cases which have been decided by Kindersley, V.C., and a fourth by Malins, V.C.; but at the same time he dissented from their opinions, and expressed a wish that the whole matter should be brought before the Court of Appeal.

The testator died on the 5th Jan. 1861. According to one view of the evidence Nicholas Phené Mill was last heard of in Aug. 1858; according to another view, about seven months previously to the testator's death. That he survived the testator was treated by the Vice-Chancellor, but in deference only to the four cases referred to, as to be presumed. It will be desirable, therefore, to examine those cases, and such others as bear materially on the subject, before dealing with the evidence more particularly.

The cases decided by Kindersley, V.C. were Lambe v. Orton, 6 Jur. N. S. 61; Dunn v. Snowden, 2 Dr. and Sm. 201; and Thomas v. Thomas, 2 Dr. & Sm. 298. They were all decided on the same general principles. The propositions enunciated were in substance these—first, that the law presumes a person who has not been heard of for seven years to be dead, but, in the absence of special circumstances, draws no presumption from that fact as to the particular period at which he died; secondly, that a person alive at a certain period of time is, according to the ordinary presumption of law, to be presumed to be alive at the expiration of any reasonable period afterwards; thirdly, that the onus of proving death at any particular period within the seven years lies with the party alleging death at such particular period.

The case decided by Malins, V.C. was Benham's Trust (sup.) He adopted and acted on the decisions of Kindersley, V.C., but went somewhat further, laying it down “that if you cannot presume death at any particular period during the seven years, then at the end or expiration of the seven years you must presume for the first time that the person was dead, and you must also presume that within that time he was alive.” Benham's Trust was appealed from, and Rolt, L.J. in Nov. 1867 discharged the Vice-Chancellor's order, directing further inquiries, and simply stating, according to the only report I am aware of (14 W. R. 180), “that there was no evidence for the court to act upon, and that it was a case not of presumption, but of proof.” In Dowley v. Wingfield, 14 Sim. 277, the testator died in Sept. 1833; one of his two sons went abroad in Sept. 1830, and was heard of for the last time about twenty months previously to his father's death. The court ordered a share of the father's residue bequeathed to him to be transferred to his brother, as the sole next of kin of the father living at the father's death. Security to refund was taken. In Mason v. Mason, 1 Mer. 308, the father and son were shipwrecked together. The rules of the civil law and of the Code Napoléon were relied on. Sir Wm. Grant said: “There are many instances in which principles of law have been adopted from the civilians by our English courts of justice, but none that I know of in which they have adopted presumptions of fact from the rules of the civil law. In the present case I do not see what presumption is to be raised; and since it is impossible you should demonstrate, I think that if it were sent for an issue, you must fail for want of proof. An issue was directed whether the son was living at the death of the father; nothing appears to have come of it. In Underwood v. Wing, 4 D. M. & G. 683, which was also a case of commorientes, a testator bequeathed personal estate to J. W. in the event of his wife dying in his lifetime. The testator and his wife were shipwrecked and drowned at sea. On the question being raised between the next of kin of the testator and J. W., who claimed under the will, it was held, first, that the onus of proof that the husband survived his wife was upon J. W. Secondly, that it was necessary to produce positive evidence in order to enable the court to pronounce in favour of the survivorship; and, thirdly, that no such evidence having been produced, the next of kin were entitled. Underwood v. Wing was heard before Lord Cranworth, Wightman, J., and Martin, B. Wightman, J., in the course of delivering judgment, stated: “If there be satisfactory evidence to show that the one survived the other, the tribunal ought so to decide independent of age or sex, and if there be no evidence the case is the same as a great variety of other cases, more frequent formerly than at present, where no evidence exists, and of consequence no judgment can be formed;” and he afterwards added, “We think there is no conclusion of law on the subject—in point of fact we think it unlikely that both actually did die at the same moment of time, but there is no evidence to show which was the survivor.” In Wing v. Augrave, 8 H. of L. Cas. 183, another branch of the same case, the House of Lords concurred in the view which had been taken by Lord Cranworth and the learned judges who sat with him. In Green's Settlement, L. Rep. 1 Eq. 288, Mr. Green was murdered in the Indian Mutiny on the 3rd June, 1857, Mrs. Green on the 16th Nov. following. Mr. and Mrs. Green's child escaped with its native nurse on the same 3rd June, but was never afterwards distinctly heard of. After the lapse of seven years and upwards, a petition was presented, and the present Lord Chancellor, then Vice-Chancellor, delivered the following judgment: “I think the rule which the court should follow in this case is analagous to that laid down in Underwood v. Wing. The whole question is, on whom is the onus of proof thrown? The lady, on the devolution of whose estate the question arises, is shown to have died on the 16th Nov., her husband is shown to have died before her; a number of persons claim as her relatives, and prove their kindred within a certain degree, and, so far as now appears, there is no one nearer in kindred. On the other hand the representative of another person claims the property also, and shows that the person through whom he claims was nearer of kin than the petitioner, and would have been entitled if he had survived his mother. But a person claiming under such a title must go further, and must show, not only that the person through whom he claims would have been entitled if he had survived, but that he actually was entitled, or, in other words, that he did survive. I am of opinion also that in this case there was some evidence to go to a jury, that the child died in the mother's lifetime, but I do not rest my decision on this evidence. I prefer to rely on the grounds which I have before stated.” There are three other cases in equity—viz., Lakin v. Lakin, L. Rep. 34 Beav. 443; Re Beasley's Trusts, 7 Eq. 498; and Re Henderson, referred to in that case. In all of these the period of the death was inferred as a matter of fact from the circumstances proved, not in any sense presumed. This appears to be the state of the authorities in the equity courts.

The leading case, however, is one at law—viz., Nepean v. Doe, which is reported before the King's Bench, in 5 Barn. & Ad. 86, and before the Exchequer Chamber in 2 M. & W. 894. In that case the lessor of the plaintiff claimed as grantee in reversion of a copyhold estate on the death of Matthew Knight. Matthew Knight went to America; the last account that was heard of him was by a letter written by him from Charleston, and received in England in May 1807; ejectment was brought within twenty-five years from the date he was last heard of, and within twenty from the date of the right accruing, if he was to be taken to have died at the end of the seven years from 1807. The Court of Queen's Bench was of opinion that the lessor of the plaintiff, who gave no other evidence of Matthew Knight's death than his absence, failed in establishing that his death took place within twenty years before the ejectment brought. With reference to the argument of inconvenience Lord Denman said, "If, for the sake of preventing inconvenience, we were arbitrarily to lay down a rule that seven years' absence abroad, the party not having been heard of, was prima facie evidence of his death at the end of the seven years, such a rule would in the very great majority of cases, nay, in almost every case, cause the fact to be found against the truth, and as the rule would be applicable to all cases in which the time of death became material, it would in many be productive of much inconvenience and injustice." The Exchequer Chamber adopted the doctrine of the Court of King's Bench in these terms, viz.: "We adopt the doctrine of the Court of King's Bench, that the presumption of law relates only to the fact of death, and that the time of death, whenever it is material, must be a subject of distinct proof." It is obvious from these passages that there is an inconsistency between that which the courts of King's Bench and Exchequer Chamber laid down and what I have quoted from the judgment of Malins, V. C. as going beyond what was laid down by Kindersley, V. C. The Vice-Chancellor Kindersley, however, seems to have founded his opinion on certain portions of these two judgments; there are, therefore, other parts of them which it will be desirable to quote and examine. Thus in the Court of King's Bench it is stated: "There is no doubt that the lessor of the plaintiff must recover by the strength of his own title, and in order to do so must prove that he had a right to enter on the lands sought to be recovered within twenty years before the ejectment brought; and consequently, as the presumption is that a person once alive continues so until the contrary is shown, the lessor of the plaintiff was bound to prove, first, the death of Matthew Knight, and, secondly, that it took place within twenty years before ejectment brought;" and in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber the following are the material passages bearing on this part of the subject: "The court is called on to review the decision of the Court of King's Bench in Nepean v. Doe. The doctrine there laid down is, that where a person goes abroad, and is not heard of for seven years, the law presumes the fact that such person is dead, but not that he died at the beginning or the end of any particular period during those seven years; and that, if it be important to anyone to establish the precise time of such person's death, he must do so by evidence of some sort to be laid before the jury for that purpose, beyond the mere lapse of seven years since such person was last heard of. After fully considering the argument at the bar, we are all of opinion that the doctrine so laid down is correct. It is conformable to the provisions of the statute of Jac. 1 relating to bigamy, and more particularly to the statute of 19 Car. 2, c. 6, relating to this very matter, the words of which distinctly point at the presumption of the fact of death, but not of the time; it is conformable also to decisions on questions of bigamy and on policies of insurance, and it is supported and confirmed by the case of Rex v. The Inhabitants of Harborne. It is true the law presumes that a person shown to be alive at a given time remains alive until the contrary be shown, for which reason the onus of showing the death of Matthew Knight lay in this case on the lessor of the plaintiff. He has shown the death by proving the absence of Matthew Knight, and his not having been heard of for seven years; whence arises at the end of those seven years another presumption of law, namely, that he is not then alive, but the onus is also cast on the lessor of the plaintiff by showing that he has commenced his action within twenty years after his right of entry accrued, that is after the actual death of Matthew Knight. Now when nothing is heard of a person for seven years, it is obviously a matter of complete uncertainty at what point of time in those seven years he died; of all the points of time the last day is the most improbable, and most inconsistent with the ground of presuming the fact of death. That presumption arises from the great lapse of time since the party has been heard of, because it is considered extraordinary, if he was alive, that he should not be heard of. In other words it is presumed that his not being heard of has been occasioned by his death, which presumption arises from the considerable time that has elapsed. If you assume that he was alive on the last day but one of the seven years, then there is nothing extraordinary in his not having been heard of on the last day, and the previous extraordinary lapse of time, during which he was not heard of, has become immaterial by reason of the assumption that he was living so lately. The presumption of the fact of death seems, therefore, to lead to the conclusion that the death took place some considerable time before the expiration of the seven years."

Kindersley, V. C. appears to have acted on the passages in both these judgments, which are to the effect that the onus of proving the death of Matthew Knight lay on the plaintiff, because the law presumes that a person shown to be alive at a given time remains alive until the contrary be shown. Those passages are not essential to the conclusions arrived at, or sound in point of reasoning. The other parts of the same judgments go to prove that there is not, and ought not to be, any such presumption of law; if there was such a presumption, it would be no ground for throwing the onus of proof on the plaintiffs where seven years had elapsed from the date of the last proof of existence; on the contrary, it would carry the period of death, as suggested and laid down by Malins, V. C., to the end of the seven years; but both the decisions are that it did not, and because it did not the plaintiff failed, and did not recover the property he sought. In the recent case of Reg. v. Lumley, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 454, it was held, consistently with another judgment delivered by Lord Denman in Rex v. The Inhabitants of Harborne, 2 Ad. & Ell. 540, that there was no presumption of law in favour of the continuance of a life up to a particular period; but that it was a question for the jury as a matter of fact. The case was heard before the Chief Baron, Byles, Lush, and Brett, J.J. and Cleasby, B., and Lush, J. delivered the judgment of the court in these terms: "We are of opinion that the direction to the jury in this case, viz., that there being no circumstances leading to any reasonable inference that he had died, Victor must be presumed to have been living at the date of the second marriage was erroneous. In an indictment for bigamy it is incumbent on the prosecution to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the husband or wife, as the case may be, was alive at the date of the second marriage. That is surely a question of fact. The existence of the party at an antecedent period may, or may not, afford a reasonable inference that he was living at the subsequent date. If, for example, it were proved that he was in good health on the day preceding the second marriage, the inference would be strong, almost irresistible, that he was living on the latter day, and the jury would, in all probability, find that he was so. If, on the other hand, it were proved that he was then in a dying condition, and nothing further was proved, they would probably decline to draw such an inference. Thus the question is entirely for the jury; the law makes no presumption either way. The cases cited of Rex v. Twynning, Reg. v. Harborne, and Nepean v. Doe appear to us to establish this proposition. Where the only evidence is that the party was living at a period which is more than seven years prior to the second marriage, there is no question for the jury. The provision in the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57 then comes into operation, and exonerates the prisoner from criminal liability, though the first husband or wife be proved to have been living at the time when the second marriage was contracted. The Legislature, by this provision, sanctions a presumption that a person who has not been heard of for seven years is dead, but the provision affords no ground for the converse proposition, viz., that when a party has been seen or heard of within seven years, a presumption arises that he is still living. That, as we have said, is always a question of fact."

Re PHENE'S TRUSTS.

True it is that Reg. v. Lumley was a criminal case, and that the seven years had not elapsed from the date of the first husband having been last heard of; but though a jury might be more ready to draw an inference in a civil than in a criminal proceeding, it cannot be that the rules of evidence in each case should be so far different as that there should be a positive legal presumption in the one proceeding, and no legal presumption in the other. A prosecutor and a person seeking to recover property each have to prove their case, and in each instance the object is to arrive at, and act on, the real truth. Lord Denman, who delivered both judgments in Nepean v. Doe, thus expressed himself in Rex v. The Inhabitants of Harborne: "I must take this opportunity of saying that nothing can be more absurd than the notion that there is to be any rigid presumption of law on such questions of fact, without reference to accompanying circumstances, such, for instance, as the age or health of the party. There can be no such strict presumption of law. In Nepean v. Doe the question arose much as in Rex v. Twynning. The claimant was not barred if the party were presumed not dead till the expiration of the seven years from the last intelligence. The learned judge who tried the cause held that there was a legal presumption of life until that time, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, because, if there was a legal presumption there was nothing to be submitted to the jury. But this court held that no legal presumption existed, and set the verdict aside. That is quite consistent with the view which we take in the present case, and Rex v. Twynning is explained in the same way. I am aware that in the latter case Bailey, J., founds his decision on the ground of contrary presumptions; but I think that the only questions in such cases are, what evidence is admissible, and what inference may fairly be drawn from it?" Other learned judges concurred in this opinion. The notion of a legal presumption in favour of life originated, I believe, with the civil law, and we have Sir William Grant's opinion in Mason v. Mason as to adopting presumptions of fact from that law. It is a general well-founded rule that a person seeking to recover property must establish his title by affirmative proof. This was one of the grounds of decision in Nepean v. Doe, and to assert, as an exception to the rule, that the onus of proving death at any particular period, either within the seven years or otherwise, should be with the party alleging death at such particular period, and not with the person to whose title that fact is essential, is not consistent with the judgment of the present Lord Chancellor, when Vice-Chancellor, in Re Greenwood, or with the dictum of Rolt, L. J., when he said, in Re Benham's Trusts, that the question was one not of presumption, but of proof; or with the real substance of the actual decisions, or the sound parts of the reasoning in Nepean v. Doe, or with the judgments in Rex v. The Inhabitants of Harborne, and Reg. v. Lumley, or with the principles to be deduced from the judgment in Underwood v. Wing. The true proposition is, that those who found a right upon a person having survived a particular period, must establish that fact affirmatively by evidence. The evidence will necessarily differ in different cases, but sufficient evidence there must be, or the person asserting title will fail.

This case happens to be one of an alleged number of a class of legatees. A legatee's survivorship of a testator is requisite to clothe him with that character, is a tacit condition annexed by law to every ordinary immediate gift by will, and it follows that the representatives of a person alleged to be a legatee must prove, as against the other members of the class who prove their survivorship, that he survived the testator; otherwise he was not a legatee at all. For these reasons, and upon a review of the authorities and the judgments on which they rest, I am of opinion that there is no presumption of law as to the particular period at which Nicholas Phéné Mill died—that it is a matter of fact to be proved by evidence, and that the onus of proof rests on his representative.

This brings me to an examination of the evidence. At the hearing a further inquiry as to the facts was offered, and declined by each of the parties. It was not admitted by the appellants that Nicholas Phéné Mill was the Nicholas Mill referred to in the communications from the American officials, but these communications were not objected to, and were read and commented on by both sides. There are three affidavits—the earliest in point of date is that of Nicholas Phéné Mill's mother. She states that she is the widow of William Mill the elder, that she left England many years ago to reside abroad, that Nicholas Phéné Mill was born at Ostend in the year 1829, that on the 19th Aug. 1853 he left home, and went to reside in America, that he wrote letters to her and her family from America, that she received from him a letter addressed from on board the United States frigate Roanoke, dated the 15th Aug. 1858; that neither she, nor, as she believes, any member of the family has heard from him since, and that she believes him to be dead. She speaks of inquiries that have been made for him. The next affidavit is that of the petitioner in the court below. He is a brother of Nicholas Phéné Mill. He speaks of his brothers and sisters, and says that the last that has been, or can be, ascertained or heard about Nicholas Phéné Mill is that, being a sergeant of marines in the United States naval service, and unmarried, he deserted from the Roanoke United States frigate on the 16th June 1860. He further says that he was himself in America from Aug. 1853 till April 1862; speaks of many fruitless inquiries and advertisements, and adds that his information as to Nicholas Phené Mill's desertion was derived from an official letter written in answer to one from his solicitors to the Government authorities in America. The last affidavit is that of the clerk to the petitioner's solicitors. He speaks of letters of administration being granted to the petitioner, and proves the correspondence with the Government officials in America. There were two letters from the petitioner's solicitors; each was answered. The answer to the second was the most explicit, and the only one necessary to refer to—it is indorsed on the letter to which it is an answer, and is in these terms:—

Nat. Department, Bureau Equipment and Recruiting, Washington, Dec. 11, 1867.

Nicholas Mill was a sergeant in the Marine Corps, and deserted June 16th, 1860, while on leave from New York to join the Philadelphia Station. He has not been heard of from since that date.

M. SMITH, Chief of Bureau.

This was in answer to a letter which it is stated that Nicholas Phené Mill wrote to his mother on the 15th Aug. 1858, from on board the United States frigate, Roanoke, Boston Navy Yard, Massachusetts, stating he expected to be long absent, but would write on his return from his voyage.

If this correspondence is excluded there is no other evidence than that Nicholas Phené Mill was last heard of in 1858; there would, therefore, be no sufficient evidence of his having survived the testator, nor does the admission of the correspondence supply the necessary proofs; for though I assume that the Nicholas Mill was the Nicholas Phené Mill who wrote from the Roanoke, I cannot infer from the statement of his desertion on the 16th June 1860, that he was alive when the testator died in Jan. 1861. I should not do so if it was a simple statement of desertion and no more; but the statement is not simply that he deserted, but that he deserted while on leave from New York, to join the Philadelphia Station, June 16th 1860, and has not been heard of "from since that date;" the reasonable conclusion from which is that he never re-appeared after he went on leave, that his leave was up on or before the 16th June 1860, and that so his name was on the books as a deserter. If I am to draw a conclusion at all, I should infer that a person in the position of a sergeant having nothing against his character would not desert, and that he had died while on leave, and so was not heard of by the authorities. It is enough, however, for me to state that, in my opinion, the burden of proof is on the representative of Nicholas Phené Mill, and that Nicholas Phené Mill's representative has not proved affirmatively that Nicholas Phene Mill survived the testator, a proof which I consider essential to his title.

The order of the Vice-Chancellor must be discharged, and an order made as prayed by the petition of appeal, but the costs below and here must come out of the share.

WILKINSON v. LINDGREN.

Will—Construction—Charitable gift—Uncertainty—Resulting trust.

A testatrix, after bequeathing certain sums to various religious and charitable institutions by name, gave the residue of her personal estate to trustees upon trust to divide the same, to and amongst the different institutions, or to any other religious institution or purposes as they (the trustees) might think proper, which disposition she left entirely to their discretion:

Held, that the word "religious" applied to "purposes" as well as "institution," and that the residuary clause, therefore, contained a good charitable bequest.

This was a suit for the administration of the estate of Mary Davison, which now came on for further consideration.

The testatrix, by her will which bore date the 5th March 1840, after bequeathing certain sums to various religious and charitable institutions, specifically named in the will, gave the residue of her personal estate to T. Fletcher and J. Wilkinson, whom she appointed executors of her will, upon trust to divide the same "to and amongst the different institutions or to any other religious institution or purposes as they, the said T. Fletcher and J. Wilkinson, may think proper, which disposition I leave entirely to their discretion."

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and C. Hall, for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the will, submitted that the residuary bequest was either a good charitable bequest, or that the trustees had a discretion as to the disposal of the residue, whether they would pay it to the charitable institutions or to the next of kin.

Roxburgh, Q. C., and Phear, for the defendants, the next of kin, contended that the bequest, being for general purposes at the discretion of the trustees was void, and that there was, therefore, a resulting trust for the next of kin. They cited Morice v. The Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 399; 10 Ves. 522.

Lord Romilly held, on the authority of Morice v. The Bishop of Durham, that the residuary bequest was void for uncertainty, and that there was a resulting trust for the next of kin.

The religious institutions, which had not been represented at the hearing of the case on the 28th June, obtained leave to be heard, and the case was re-argued on the 13th July.

Southgate, Q. C. and Bunting, for the institutions, contended that the word "religious" applied to "purposes" as well as "institutions," and that there was, therefore, a good charitable bequest. They cited

Baker v. Sutton, 1 Keen, 224.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Phear, for the next of kin, contended that the alternative gift was for any other purposes and was void.

July 14.—Lord ROMILLY.—Upon consideration I think that the conclusion at which I arrived the other day was wrong. I do not think that I can properly hold that the word "religious" applies to "institutions" and not to "purposes." This would be an arbitrary way of reading the sentence for the purpose of creating an intestacy. There must, therefore, be a declaration that there was a good charitable bequest of the residue.

Thursday, Jan. 20.

Re THE CAMBRIAN RAILWAYS COMPANY;Ex parte JONES AND PARRY.Railway company—Act restraining proceedings without leave of court—Unpaid vendors—Leave to sue.The 36th section of the Cambrian Railways Act 1868 provides that after the passing of the Act no actions, suits, &c., against the company, with certain exceptions therein specified, shall be continued or commenced during the period of five years, unless with the leave of the High Court of Chancery.On a motion by an unpaid vendor for leave to file a bill for specific performance :Held, that the court would grant leave only if it were shown that the company had the means of paying and refused to pay.Motion accordingly refused, but without costs, and without prejudice to any further application after the expiration of six months.

This was a motion by unpaid vendors for leave to file a bill for specific performance against the Cambrian Railways Company, notwithstanding the provisions of the 36th section of the Cambrian Railways Act 1868, by which it is provided that from and after the passing of the Act, and except as by the Act provided, no actions, suits, or other proceedings against the company, or affecting the property of the company, except proceedings against the company as carriers of goods or passengers, or in respect of liabilities contracted after the passing of the Act, shall be continued or commenced during the period of five years, unless with the leave of the High Court of Chancery, to be obtained on summons or motion in a summary way, and upon such terms as the court may impose; provided that the costs of any action or suit, or other proceedings against the company, or affecting their property, which shall be discontinued pursuant to this Act, shall be in the discretion of the court, and, if allowed, may be added to the debt.

A railway company, which was afterwards incorporated with the Cambrian Railways Company, took possession in 1863, under their compulsory powers, of certain lands in the county of Cardigan belonging to C. R. Jones and Ann Parry, who after the date of the amalgamation, viz., in 1866, entered into a formal contract with the Cambrian Railways Company for the sale of the land, at the price of 475*l.*, to the company; and by the contract it was agreed that the purchase-money should bear interest at the rate of five per cent. from the time when possession had been taken of the land. The title had been approved, and a draft conveyance agreed upon, but the company were unable to complete.

Osborne Morgan, Q. C. and E. G. Herbert, in support of the motion, submitted that the amount of the purchase-money being small the payment of it would not be inconvenient to the company, and that the court ought to give leave to the applicants to file their bill, as it was a great hardship for them to be deprived of their money. They cited Griffith v. The Cambrian Railway Company, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 290;Symes v. The Cambrian Railway Company, 3 W. Notes 284.

Jessel, Q. C. and A. C. Humphreys, for the company, were not called upon.

Lord ROMILLY.—I cannot take into account the smallness of the amount of the purchase-money. The object of the Cambrian Railways Act 1868 was to protect the company from the expenses of litigation;

the case of the present applicants does not differ from that of the other unpaid vendors, and if I were to give them leave to file a bill I should be obliged to give the same leave to every other unpaid vendor, and the object of the Act would be defeated. The court will give leave to institute a suit against the company only when it is shown that the company have the means of paying and refuse to pay. The motion must, therefore be refused, but without costs, and without prejudice to a renewal of the application after the expiration of six months, if the applicants shall be so advised.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 19 and 20.

BAREHAM v. HALL.Practice—Nuisance—25 & 26 Vict. c. 42—Jurisdiction.A bill to restrain a nuisance is within the provisions of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42, and, unless the case is an exceptional one, the court will not require the plaintiff to establish his right before a jury at law.A brick-kiln, sufficiently near a dwelling-house to affect it with smoke, is a nuisance, and the owner's prescriptive right to another kiln, nearer to the house, and almost in a line with the kiln complained of, cannot be urged as a reason for the court's not granting an injunction.

This bill was filed for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using two brick-kilns, called respectively the new kiln and the old kiln, in such a way as to be a nuisance to the plaintiff, his family, and property.

The facts were shortly these:—The new kiln had been recently constructed by the defendant at a distance of about 100 yards in front of the plaintiff's house. The old kiln had been worked by the defendant for upwards of fifty years. It stood nearer to the house, and almost in a line with the new kiln, and the plaintiff's evidence went to show that when the wind blew from the quarter in which the kilns were situated it carried the smoke from both kilns over the plaintiff's house and grounds.

BAREHAM v. HALL.

[V.C. S.]

The case generally made by the bill was that the two kilns together constituted a sufficient nuisance to call for relief from this court. At the bar, however, the plaintiff abandoned so much of his case as related to the old kiln, being of opinion that the uninterrupted user of it by the defendant for so many years had legalised his otherwise untenable position.

The cause now came on by way of motion for a decree for a perpetual injunction. The evidence with respect to the alleged nuisance was very voluminous and contradictory, but the legal point in dispute mainly turned upon the defendant's right to an issue to have the question tried before a jury at common law.

Greene, Q. C. and Hadden, for the plaintiff, were stopped by the court.

Karslake, Q. C., and B. B. Rogers for the defendant contended that the kiln could not be considered a nuisance, or at any rate a sufficient nuisance to call for the interference of the court. It was no ordinary kiln, but a Dutch one, and the evidence went to show that there was neither smoke nor effluvia emitted from it. But even if there were, considering what the plaintiff had come to endure and must continue to endure from the old kiln, he could not complain of the mere addition of the new kiln as a nuisance. Further, the defendant was entitled to have an issue granted to try the question of nuisance. The Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 42), which was framed with a view to the convenience of the suitors of this court generally, empowered the court in cases of disputed fact (like the present) which could be more conveniently tried by a jury at common law, to grant an issue for that purpose. The recent authorities on the subject went to show that where the court was satisfied that the administration of justice could be more conveniently exercised by a court of law, it granted an issue; in fact it had been held in a similar case, Crumph v. Lambert, L. Rep. 3 Eq. 409; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133, by Lord Chelmsford, overruling the Master of the Rolls, that if a defendant wished an issue he was entitled to it as a matter of right. The case had not been reported on appeal, but that was the effect of the decision. They also referred to Morgan's Chancery Practice.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I will not trouble you, Mr. Greene, to argue the question of the plaintiffs' right to an injunction, but I should like to hear you upon the point affecting the defendant's right to have an issue granted.

Greene, Q. C., submitted that the modern practice and authorities were entirely opposed to granting an issue except in cases of manifest convenience to the parties in the suit, and then only when it was at the wish of all the parties. The word "conveniently" in the Act of 1862 had reference to the convenience of the suitors in the particular case in which the application was made, and not to the interests of the general body of the suitors of the court. The Act provided in most positive terms that this court should decide every question of law and fact arising out of a cause before it; and in an exceptional clause it also provided for certain exceptional cases, but the present was not one of them. Lord Westbury, in Young v. Fernie, 1 De G. J. & S. 353; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 861, in construing the statute, laid it down as a rule that all cases of this description were for the future to be heard and decided by this court. That case had been followed by other authorities, and, in fact, the rule as laid down by Lord Westbury had become the recognised practice of the court. He also cited

Inchbald v. Barrington, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 388;
The Directors of the Imperial Gas Light and Coke Company v. Broadbent, 7 H. of L. Cas. 607.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case, the question is, whether the brick-kiln (which may be called the second brick-kiln, or the new brick-kiln) built within one hundred yards and in front of the plaintiff's house is, or is not a nuisance. Primâ facie, a brick-kiln within a hundred yards in front of a mansion-house, would be a nuisance unless the process used for burning the bricks was one of an unusual kind. This is a Dutch brick-kiln, and it has been argued, that the injury and nuisance from a kiln of this description is less than the nuisance from an ordinary brick-kiln. That argument is answered to my mind by the weight of evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, which shows, that whatever difference of construction there may be between a Dutch brick-kiln and an ordinary brick-kiln, yet that burning bricks in a Dutch kiln occasions smoke and effluvia which to a house sufficiently near to be affected by it, is a nuisance. Mr. Dugald Campbell, a gentleman who has been for twenty years the Lecturer on Chemistry at the University College in London, and who is familiar with the working of brick-kilns of both constructions, has given evidence on the subject, and in his affidavit, he says, "No kiln that I have ever seen or read any description of, or with the construction of which I am acquainted, consumes its own smoke, or nearly so, and in particular, I say most positively, that it is impossible for a Dutch kiln, or a kiln constructed on the principle thereof, to do so. In fact there is no peculiarity or difference in this respect, viz., that of consumption or emission of smoke and effluvia, between the Dutch kiln and an ordinary or rectangular kiln commonly used in Nottinghamshire, Suffolk, or other English counties. In that respect they are all alike, and those called Dutch kilns emit as much smoke and effluvia as other kilns of the same capacity and number of furnaces." The positive evidence of the witnesses for the plaintiff as to the actual existence of a degree of smoke and vapour from this brick-kiln, proves that it is as offensive as might have been expected. It has been said, with respect to the scientific evidence, that Mr. Campbell never saw this brick-kiln; but to my mind that has no weight whatever, for the evidence of the plaintiff's other witnesses, persons living in the neighbourhood, shows that what Mr. Campbell, from his knowledge of brick-kilns says might have been expected, actually occurs. The plaintiff's evidence, however, is met by that of witnesses on the part of the defendant, who swear that owing either to the peculiar construction of this Dutch kiln, or something else, no smoke, but only a slight flickering blue vapour, issues from it. To that evidence I attach little or no importance. I think that if this Dutch kiln is worked in the ordinary way, it is impossible that it can be used without emitting the usual amount of smoke and effluvia which occurs in the burning of bricks, and that these witnesses, though they may have seen nothing but a slight blue vapour, have seen it only when the kiln was newly lighted. I have no hesitation therefore in saying that a kiln of this description, within a hundred yards of a man's house is clearly a nuisance. I have observed during the argument, that in questions of this kind, you may get an indefinite number of people to give negative evidence, to say that they have seen no smoke, have smelt

BAREHAM v. HALL.

[V.C. S.]

nothing, and have observed no injury; but the positive evidence of a man who swears to the degree of injury is of much greater value to my mind. I do not think it necessary to read the passages of the plaintiff's affidavit in which he swears to what he has suffered. The facts themselves show that what he has suffered was likely to ensue. It is said, however, and this is rather a question of law than otherwise, that long before the new brick-kiln was built, there existed what is now the old brick-kiln, and which is rather nearer the plaintiff's house, that that has been submitted to for years before the plaintiff took possession of the house, and that the addition of this Dutch kiln considering what the plaintiff had come to endure from the old kiln, cannot be complained of as a nuisance. That is an argument that to my mind will not bear stating or examining into. To say that because there is one brick-kiln which must be submitted to as a nuisance, the addition of another kiln must also be submitted to is preposterous. The defendant has no right to set-off the existence of the nuisance against the fact that he has doubled the nuisance by erecting an additional kiln. Upon this point the evidence is that these kilns are sometimes worked alternately, and sometimes together. The fact that they are sometimes worked together is quite enough to justify the plaintiff in coming to this court for its assistance. Therefore I can see nothing in the defendant's case, so far as it relates to the previous existence of the old kiln, that justifies the use of the new kiln to the extent stated in the evidence. No doubt the court is bound to be very cautious in coming to decision in this case, because it is not now dealing with the question whether there should be an interim injunction until the hearing of the cause. These parties, I think, with great good sense, have agreed to have the question between them determined once and for all, and, with that view, have asked the court now to decide on the merits of the case, as at the actual hearing. The injunction, therefore, to be granted, if the plaintiff is entitled to one, will be a perpetual injunction. Under the old practice, wherever the right of a plaintiff seeking an injunction in this court depended upon a purely legal right, the court almost invariably left the defendant who was sought to be restrained to his remedy of having the legal question discussed at law; and for that purpose it was almost the invariable course of the court to grant an injunction, but to put the plaintiff on terms to bring an action, or otherwise to put the question in a course for the decision of a court of law. Fortunately for the public that practice has been put an end to. The oppressive effect of the old law was such that Lord Cottenham, a judge of the highest learning and experience, once said that he thought there was hardly any case of injunction in which, if it was sought to make the injunction perpetual, the court could deprive the defendant, if he wished it, of having his right tried by an action at law. The Act of Parliament of 1862 has enacted in positive terms that this court shall decide every question of law and of fact arising in a cause before it, and of which it has cognisance. My duty, therefore, is to decide this question; and if I had any doubt upon my mind, my duty would be to have it decided by a jury summoned before this court. The Act of Parliament, however, in a clause of exception, provides that where the court sees that it may be more convenient to the parties—for instance, in the saving of expense or delay—to send the case to be tried at the assizes, it is authorised to pursue that course. The present case, however, does not appear to me to be in any respect an exceptional one. In Young v. Fernie, (sup.), which was a case of very great importance, involving the validity of a patent, and in which there were issues of fact to be determined, my opinion was that those issues could be tried before a jury in London or Middlesex with a greater chance of the jury arriving at a proper decision than if I had summoned a jury in my own court. Lord Westbury, however, upon appeal, reversed my order directing the issues to be tried in London or Middlesex, and, in so doing, stated what I now consider to be the undoubted law of the court; and I am very glad that it is the law of the court. What Lord Westbury said was this: "I construe the statute as laying down the rule for the future, that these things shall be heard and determined in this court. The proviso operates by way of exception only to the rule; and in order to bring a case within the proviso, the court must be satisfied that the administration of justice in the particular suit may be more conveniently exercised and promoted by directing issues to be tried by a jury at the assizes, or at any sitting in London or Middlesex for the trial of issues in the common law courts, than by completing the hearing and the inquiry before itself. In a patent case particularly, and in this case, having regard to the nature of the questions raised, I do not think that anything more inconvenient can be suggested than that, where there are mixed questions of law and fact—the one bound up with the other and scarcely capable of being separated—an attempt should be made to cut the cause in halves, and to send one half of it to be tried by a jury in a court of common law, reserving the other half for determination in this court. It is impossible that any satisfactory conclusion can be arrived at by that mode of dividing an investigation, which should be one and entire. Such a division often renders necessary a great number of proceedings, a great number of shiftings to and fro, and very frequently much expense arising from misapprehension, which might have been avoided had the court where the matter originated—the Court of Chancery—kept the whole proceedings in its own hands." In this case I consider myself, therefore, bound to keep the matter in my own hands, and if I had sufficient doubt upon the question to justify me in putting the parties to the expense of summoning a jury, a jury should be summoned; but upon the weight of evidence, as I have before observed, I am satisfied that this brick kiln constitutes a nuisance. Other cases, besides the one I have just referred to, have been cited in the course of the arguments, and undoubtedly there is what would appear to be a great conflict of authority, but when the matter is accurately examined, and when due weight is given to the circumstances under which the various decisions have been pronounced, I do not think there is so much real discrepancy as at first sight seems apparent. For instance, in the case of Eaden v. Firth (sup.) before the present Lord Chancellor, when Vice-Chancellor, there are some things which are not very reconcilable with what I have just read, but it is to be observed that that case was decided without the Vice-Chancellor having had an opportunity of knowing what was done in Young v. Fernie, and without that case being cited at all. In the next place, that case was decided under these very singular circumstances. The plaintiff did not ask for relief against a nuisance causing actual damage to himself or to his property, but merely to be relieved from what he apprehended might prove a nuisance. The Vice-Chancellor in that case directed an issue to be tried at the Liverpool assizes, and I must assume, as the matter went no further, that the parties were content with that decision, and thought that a trial at the Liverpool assizes was the best course. I consider that the parties in a suit have a right to judge for themselves as to the course to be taken; and if in the present case—both parties had agreed in asking me to allow the matter to be tried by a jury at any assizes, before a court of common law, I should have been very much disposed to comply with their wish, but here the wish is expressed only by one party, and that party the defendant. I ought to observe upon another case which has been referred to, I mean that case which came first before the Master of the Rolls, and afterwards before Lord Chelmsford. There the Master of the Rolls, having come to a conclusion satisfactory to his own mind, that there was a nuisance to an extent entitling the plaintiff to the assistance of the court, granted an injunction. When the case came on upon appeal before Lord Chelmsford, the evidence did not seem to have satisfied him that there was a nuisance, and the weight of the evidence not being sufficient, and the weight of the authority of the Master of the Rolls apparently not being sufficient, he reversed the decree. I am only informed, however, of that reversal. I cannot find any report of the case on appeal, and, in the absence of that, I must believe that there was something more before the Lord Chancellor than there was before the Master of the Rolls. When one judge finds that the mind of another judge, who has previously elaborately examined the matter, has been satisfied on a question of fact, it must be something prodigiously strong that would induce the second judge (however high his appellate jurisdiction) to attribute no weight whatever to the circumstance that the matter had been already fairly concluded, though in a way not satisfactory to his own mind. What is to be considered is, whether there were such circumstances as justified an entire reversal of a decree by a judge, who on such a matter had satisfied his own mind, and I must consider that there was something of the kind. In the present state of the reported decision I can find nothing to my mind in the decision of the Master of the Rolls that is not sound law, and a sound conclusion on the facts that were before him. That case was cited to show that, however strong the opinion of the court below may be upon the facts, if the defendant asks an issue, he is entitled to it as a right. I do not believe that Lord Chelmsford ever decided that it was a right. The Act of Parliament has said that it is a matter for the consideration of the court. It is quite possible, for instance, that if the present case were to go to the Court of Appeal, that that court might not find its mind satisfied, and might direct a trial before a jury, but that jury would be summoned before the Court of Appeal, or in such way as the court may direct. The duty which I have to perform is to decide whether, according to my conscience, this plaintiff has suffered injury from the acts which are complained of. Upon the evidence before me I consider that the plaintiff has sustained substantial injury to his health and comfort, and is therefore entitled to a perpetual injunction, and to the costs of the suit. The order will be for an injunction to restrain the defendant from using the new kiln; from burning any other bricks in any other than the old kiln, so as to be a nuisance to the plaintiff; and from using the old kiln, so as to increase the amount of smoke or other effluvia to the injury of the plaintiff.

Re THE ESTATES COMPANY (LIMITED "AND REDUCED.")

Companies Act 1867—30 & 31 Vict. c. 131—Order 20—Company (limited and reduced)—Reduction of capital—Change of name.

Upon an application by a company ("limited and reduced") under the Companies Act 1867, for an order for the reduction of its capital, the court, in granting the order, directed that the words "and reduced," should continue to form part of the name of the company until the date of its dissolution or winding-up.

This was an application under the Companies Act 1867, for an order to reduce the nominal capital of the above company from 500,000*l.* to 250,000*l.*, and to strike out from the title of the company the words "and reduced." The company had power by its articles of association to raise its capital to 100,000*l.*, but that power had never been exercised. The company was stated to be in a prosperous condition.

The application was opposed by only one person, a creditor for 35*l.*, which sum it was proposed to pay into court.

Wickens, in support of the application, submitted that he was entitled under the above Act to the order, and also to ask the court to fix a date at which the words, "and reduced," might be discontinued as part of the title of the company. The 20th order under the Act directed that when the court made an order confirming a reduction, such order should fix the date, until which the words "and reduced" were to be deemed part of the name of the company as mentioned in the 10th section of the Act. He referred to Re Sharp, Stewart, and Co., L. Rep. 5 Eq. 155; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 197.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider that the words "and reduced" are even more important as forming part of the title of the company than the word "limited." In making, therefore, the order for the reduction of the capital, I shall direct that the date of the dissolution, or previous winding-up of the company, be fixed as the time until which the words "and reduced" shall continue to form part of the title of the company.

YOUNG v. DALLIMORE.

Practice—32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 4, cl. 3—Defaulting trustee—Attachment.

A defaulting trustee, who has disregarded an order for payment of trust moneys into court, is not protected from attachment by the Debtors' Act 1869.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff in the above suit that the defendant, a defaulting trustee, might be attached for non-payment of a sum of 410*l.* 8*s.* 7*d.*, which had been ordered to be paid by him into court under a decree made in the suit.

An application for attachment had already been made to the clerk of records and writs; but he being in some doubt whether, having regard to the provisions of the Debtors Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), the order could be drawn up as formerly, the question had been adjourned into court.

Woodroffe, for the motion, submitted that the 3rd clause of the 4th section of the Act expressly excepted from the operation of the Act cases like the present.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that the case clearly came within the exceptions of the Act, and directed that the usual order for attachment should be drawn up by the clerk of records and writs.

Re BRADFORD NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Practice—Company—Winding-up—Locus standi of opponents.

A canal company sought to be wound-up on its own petition:

Held, that the corporation of the town through which the canal passed, and a canal company whose canal communicated with the canal of the petitioners, had a right to appear and be heard in opposition to the petition.

This was a petition for the winding-up of the Company of Proprietors of the Bradford Navigation, a company incorporated by Act of Parliament in 1771.

The company had been in 1867 restrained by an injunction (Attorney-General v. Bradford Navigation Company, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 71; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 248), from diverting into the canal, or allowing to pass into the same, or collecting or keeping, or continuing therein, any filth, sewage, or polluted matter or water, so as to be a nuisance to the inhabitants of the streets, or any of the streets of the town of Bradford; and since that time they had ceased to take water from a stream which had formerly polluted the water of the canal, and the canal had been emptied and had become disused.

The petition was presented by the company, and alleged that the company could not obtain a supply of water from any other source than the polluted stream except at a ruinous expense. The petition was not served on any person.

The corporation of Bradford, and the Aire and Calder Canal Company (the proprietors of a canal communicating with the Bradford Canal), appeared by counsel to oppose the petition.

Pearson, Q.C., and Hastings, for the petitioners, objected that the opponents had no locus standi, as they were neither creditors nor contributories (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, ss. 82, 85, 89, 91). They had no more interest in the matter than the public in general, and the public could only be represented by the Attorney-General.

Cole, Q.C., and Freeling for the corporation of Bradford, and Glasse, Q.C., and Streeten, for the Aire and Calder Canal Company were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is an application to wind-up a company established by Act of Parliament for the purpose of making a canal through the large and important town of Bradford. It appears that, for reasons which may be perfectly good and sufficient, the company, who are the petitioners, desire to be wound-up; the petition has not been served on anybody, and if there are no creditors or contributories who object, there will be no one to oppose it except the court. All these cases must depend upon their own special circumstances; in this case the canal runs through the town of Bradford, and it communicates with the Leeds and Liverpool Canal, which again, at a distance of thirteen miles, communicates with the canal of the Aire and Calder Company, so that the three canals must be considered as forming a continuous line of communication. Under these circumstances, I think it is plain, that, though they may not come strictly within the words of the Act, as either creditors or contributories, I must hear both the corporation and the Aire and Calder Company, if they choose to appear and oppose the petition.

Where the only person entitled to a trust-fund paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act had gone to America, and had not been heard of since 1868, service of the notice of the payment into court required to be given by the trustees under Cons. Ord. xli. r. 4 was dispensed with.

In this case a trust-fund had been paid into court by the trustees under the Trustee Relief Act on the ground that they were unable to find the person beneficially entitled to the fund.

The trustees stated in their affidavit under the Act that James Walters was the only person beneficially entitled to the fund; that he went to America in the year 1866 and enlisted in the army; that he corresponded with his father till the year 1868; and when last heard of was in Louisiana, but that since that time his father had not heard from him, and had been unable to obtain any information respecting him. Under these circumstances

Nalder asked that service of the notice of the payment into court required by Cons. Ord. xli. r. 4, to be given by the trustees to the persons interested in or entitled to the fund might in this case be dispensed with, and cited

THE DYERS' COMPANY v. KING.

Light and air—Injunction.

Where a plaintiff complains that the defendants are obstructing his light and air by their newly-erected buildings, it is no valid answer to say, though it may be said truly, that by reason of the removal of neighbouring buildings the plaintiff is in the enjoyment of the same amount of light and air as he had before the defendants commenced their alterations.

Semble, if the light and air which the plaintiff had acquired by prescription had been so far in excess of what he required for the reasonably comfortable enjoyment of his house, that the defendants' proceedings could not have sensibly interfered with his comfort and enjoyment, he could not have obtained an injunction.

This was a motion for decree.

At the north-west corner of the intersection of Dowgate-hill, in the City of London, which runs north and south, with College-street, which runs east and west, the plaintiffs, the Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of Dyers of the City of London, were at the commencement of this suit, and had been for more than 150 years previously, owners in fee of a piece of land bounded on the east by Dowgate-hill and on the south by College-street.

THE DYERS' COMPANY v. KING.

Prior to 1839, Dyers' Hall stood on part of this plot of land. In 1839 Dyers' Hall was taken down, and a new building was erected on part of the site, and opened as a hall and offices in Oct. 1840. The new building was set back, so as to leave an area in front of it from 4ft. 9in. to 5ft. 6in. wide.

On the south side of College-street, and opposite the western portion of the plaintiffs' buildings, was a house 33ft. 4in. high, the property of the Innholders' Company. College-street here was 14ft. 3in. wide. On the east of the buildings of the Innholders Company, and opposite the middle portion of the plaintiffs' buildings, there stood for twenty years prior to Feb. 1869, a building 85ft. 4in. in height belonging to the Merchant Taylors' Company. On the east of the last-mentioned building, and extending to the south-west corner of the intersection of College-street and Dowgate-hill, there stood, prior to Feb. 1869, another building 23ft. in height, also belonging to the Merchant Taylors' Company.

In Feb. 1869, the defendant John King, to whom the Merchant Taylors' Company had agreed to let the two last-mentioned buildings on lease, began to pull down the same, and had at the date of the commencement of this suit laid foundations for the erection of warehouses on their site to the height of 74ft. from the level of College-street.

The bill was filed on the 25th June 1869, by the Dyers' Company against King praying that the defendants might be restrained from erecting any building on the land so leased to him, so as to darken, hinder, or obstruct the free access of light and air to the windows of the plaintiffs' building, as such access was enjoyed by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in title, and other the occupiers of the said building previously to the taking down by the defendant of the houses or buildings which formerly stood on the ground so leased to the defendant.

An injunction was moved for and granted on the 15th July 1869.

The defendant moved to dissolve the injunction, but the Vice-Chancellor, on the 3rd Aug. 1869, made no order on the motion, except that the costs be reserved to the hearing.

On the 25th Sept. 1869, the defendant filed his answer, wherein he stated that in 1856 the plaintiffs pulled down a building which stood on the east of Dyers' Hall, between that and Dowgate-hill, and in consideration of a large sum paid to them by the corporation of the City of London they set back the new building 5ft. 8in. to the north, so as to be in a line with the front of new Dyers' Hall.

He further said that the Merchant Taylors' Company, his intended lessors, in 1860, sold to the South-Eastern Railway Company a piece of land at the south-west corner of the intersection of the two streets, and that they also afterwards sold to John Kemp Welch another adjoining piece of land, south of the last, and bounded on the east by Dowgate-hill, which Welch re-sold to the South-Eastern Railway Company, and that both those pieces of land had since been thrown into the public way of Dowgate-hill, whereby the width of Dowgate-hill south of the intersection had been increased from 22ft. to 40ft.

Defendant also said that with the consent of the Merchant Taylors' Company, his intended lessors, he had agreed to give up 7ft. more of ground on the south side of College-street, next Dowgate-hill; and that by these means the junction of College-street and Dowgate-hill had been brought 25ft. nearer the eastern end of Dyers' Hall than it was before; the opening of College-street at the west of the intersection had been increased from 13ft. to 30ft., and the opening of Dowgate-hill on the south of the intersection had been increased from 40ft. to 47ft.

Defendant said (paragraph 10), "I believe that in consequence of the alterations hereinbefore-mentioned the plaintiffs have since the year 1856 had and enjoyed a larger quantity of light and air coming to Dyers' Hall and the rooms therein, than they enjoyed in 1840, or at any period prior to 1856."

He also said that such access of light and air to Dyers' Hall as was enjoyed by the plaintiffs was derived to some extent from the passage of light and air over the buildings of the Merchant Taylors' Company; yet he believed such access of light and air was then and still was mainly derived from the passage of light and air over the buildings belonging to the Innholders' Company.

Clarke v. Clark, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 403; and the authorities referred to in Staight v. Burn (ubi sup.)

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I will not trouble you, Mr. Kay. I cannot quite agree with Mr. Freeling on the question of fact, because, in truth, as I look at it, there is no fact substantially in dispute between these parties. The case resolves itself into a question of law; because, as I understand the case as put by the counsel at the bar, and upon all the evidence, it is this: That, assuming the plaintiffs in the month of May 1869, when this thing was begun, to have had, up to that time and for twenty years previously, the light which they enjoyed at that time, the building which the defendants are about to erect would be a very material and serious obstruction to and interference with that light. Assuming them to have made out their legal right to the quantity of light which they enjoyed up to and at the time of the filing of their bill, then their suggested answer (and that is the only point I have to consider assuming it to be admitted or proved on both sides up to the points I have stated), the substantial question which arises on the defence is this: They say, "True it is that we are now going this year very materially to diminish your light as you enjoyed it last year, but your right to light—the right to which you are entitled for the use of your house—is a right which must have existed for twenty years. Your right is a right to that amount of light which you had twenty years ago; and, no matter from what quarter that light came, you had a right to light over all your neighbour's houses; but only to that amount of light which you could show to have been enjoyed by you for twenty years before the bill filed; and you have no right to complain if, taking into consideration all that we are going to do, and all that everybody has done in the interval, you will still in the result have as much light as you had when you started twenty years ago." Certainly I find myself utterly unable to accede to that statement of the legal principle so suggested. The right is a right as between the owner of the dominant tenement and the owner of every servient tenement—he has a right to as much light to and for the use of his house over his neighbour's land as he enjoyed twenty years ago; and the neighbour has no right to deprive him of the light which has so come to and for the use of the house over the neighbour's land, because the owner of the dominant tenement has either by purchase from, or by the free gift of, any other person, or by the operation of any Act of Parliament, obtained other light in addition to that which he had a prescriptive right to. Of course in one aspect of the case, it might be very material to take into consideration the light which he had so acquired because, if the light which he had so acquired, in addition to the prescriptive right, was so much in excess of anything he required for the reasonably comfortable enjoyment of the premises as he enjoyed them, you might say, "What is the use of your complaining, you have plenty of light, and what I am going to do will not interfere with you, because when it is done you will have as much light as any reasonable being can ask for," unless he wanted to interfere with his neighbours capriciously and vexatiously. That is not the case here. It is conceded that there was no great access of light in the street. I suppose that, even in 1869, or in the beginning of this year, the people living in Dyers' Hall would have been very glad to have had more light than they had at that time. That being so, that view of the case does not arise; and I certainly cannot think that the owner of this house, any more than the owner of any other house there, can say, "You are going to be interfered with by my erection, but then there is compensation for you; there is an equivalent given you here by somebody else." That is not, in my mind, a just view of the case. The legal principle failing, it is not necessary for me to go into the evidence as to whether there is, in truth, the compensation. If it were necessary to go into it, it would require considerable argument to satisfy me that, in point of fact, the compensation is given, having regard to the nature of the case. I do not go into it at all. I think the case fails in point of law upon the defence with regard to the equivalent, and that the plaintiffs, therefore, are entitled to the decree as asked; of course, with the costs of the suit, which will include the costs of the plaintiffs' motion to dissolve.

ROSKILL v. WHITWORTH.

[V.C. J.]

ROSKILL v. WHITWORTH.

Motion for direction of issues at law—25 & 26 Vict. c. 42 (Sir John Rolt's Act).

A bill was filed against the owner of a steam hammer to restrain its working, on the ground of its being a nuisance to the plaintiffs. The defendant went to great expense in modifying the working of the hammer with a view to remedying the nuisance. On a motion by the defendants to have issues tried at law as to whether since the hammer had been so worked as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs; and, secondly, as to whether the alterations it had been so worked, the motion was refused on the ground that the alterations made were a partial admission of the nuisance complained of in the bill, and that the plaintiff had been put to great expense in preparing evidence, which would in that case be thrown away.

This was an application on the part of the defendant Sir Joseph Whitworth that certain issues might be directed to be tried by a special jury at the next summer assizes at Manchester.

The facts were as follows:—

In May 1868 the Whitworth Engineering Company (Limited) set up a very large and powerful steam hammer in one of the most thickly inhabited parts of Manchester, and close to the Roman Catholic Church of St. Augustine, and to the adjoining schools and priest's house. A bill was filed to restrain the defendants from using the hammer so as to occasion an injury or nuisance to the plaintiffs, who were the trustees and the priest of the church.

In June 1869 an interlocutory injunction being applied for, upon the defendants giving an undertaking not to work the hammer before nine a.m., nor after seven p.m., the motion was directed to stand over until the hearing of the cause.

Since the interlocutory motion the defendant has spent large sums of money in making alterations in the hammer, by means of which the nuisance (as contended) had so completely abated as to render the plaintiff's evidence inapplicable. Under these circumstances the defendant now applied to have the following issues tried at the summer assizes at Manchester: First. Whether the hammer has been so worked as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs? Secondly. Whether, since the alterations, it has been so worked as to occasion a nuisance to the plaintiffs.

Little, Q. C. and Lindley, in support of the motion, submitted that this was clearly a case for a trial by jury. It was a simple case of fact. Was the hammer a nuisance, or was it not? It would be very different if there was a matter of fact and a matter of law in dispute. In this case the quantum of nuisance has to be ascertained, a large number of witnesses have to be examined, and it would be necessary for a jury to have a view of the premises; besides, great expense would be saved by sending these issues to be tried by a jury. There is no statutory impediment to this course; by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42 (Sir John Rolt's Act) power is expressly given to the court to direct issues whenever it shall appear that any question of fact may be more conveniently tried by a jury at the assizes, or at any sitting in London or Middlesex. The authorities are in our favour:

George v. Whitmore, 26 Beav. 557;
Eaden v. Firth, 1 H. & M. 573;
Davenport v. Golberg, 2 H. & M. 282;
Young v. Fernie, 1 De G. J. & S. 353.

Kay, Q. C. and H. Humphreys, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—I ought not to accede to this application. The fact that two issues are tendered shows a strong probability that at the time of filing the bill the hammer was a nuisance. All that the plaintiffs are bound to show to entitle them to relief is that the hammer was a nuisance at the time the bill was filed. The plaintiffs have been put to very great expense in collecting evidence to this effect, all of which, if I were to allow these issues to be tried, would be thrown away. If the defendant intended to ask for issues, he should have done so last June when the interlocutory motion for an injunction was made. The mere fact that the defendant has made alterations by which the nuisance is diminished or put an end to, does not entitle him to have these issues tried by a jury, though it may have an important bearing on the case when it is brought to a hearing. It was a nuisance, and may, perhaps, have ceased to be so. I am not satisfied that there is any substantial matter of fact to be tried. I shall, therefore, avoid the great expense incurred by a trial at the assizes by refusing, at this stage of the cause, to indulge the defendant in the luxury of the expense of having the issue tried at law. The motion must be refused with costs.

WOODWARD v. BUCHANAN.

Contract—Work done and materials supplied—Evidence—Collateral issue.In an action for work done and materials supplied to the defendant in respect of certain dwelling houses, the question being whether the defendant was really the owner and person interested in the houses, it wasHeld competent to the plaintiff to call other tradesmen as witnesses to prove that the defendant had personally given orders to them to do work and supply materials in respect of the same houses.

This was a case stated on appeal by the judge of the County Court of Gloucestershire, as follows :

This was an action brought by James Woodward, a plumber and glazier in Gloucester, against James Buchanan, a solicitor of the same city, for 31*l.* 17*s.* 5*d.*, being the balance of an alleged account for work done and materials supplied from the 30th Dec. 1866 to the 5th July 1867, in respect of some dwelling-houses and premises situate in Vauxhall-road and Twyver-street, near Gloucester.

The first portion of the plaintiff's account related to the dwelling-houses in Vauxhall-road, which at the commencement of the work being done and the materials supplied, were being erected by one George Lewis, and amounted to 18*l.* 6*s.* 7*d.* for work done and materials supplied from the 30th Dec. 1866, to the 2nd April 1867, and the remaining portion thereof to the dwelling-houses in Twyver-street, which at the commencement of the work being done and the materials being supplied were being erected by one William Burgoyne, and amounts to 23*l.* 11*s.* for work done and materials supplied from the 28th May 1867, to the 5th July 1867, of which last-mentioned sum the defendant paid to the plaintiff, on the 7th May 1867, 10*l.* on account of, and at the request of, William Burgoyne.

George Lewis and William Burgoyne originally applied to the plaintiff to do the work and supply the materials in respect of which he brings this action, but after he had done a small portion of the work he refused to do any more work or supply any more materials. He was then informed by George Lewis and William Burgoyne that they were erecting the houses for the defendant, whereupon (as was alleged by the plaintiff but denied by the defendant) he applied to the defendant, and received from him personal orders to do the work and supply the materials in respect of which he seeks to recover.

The defendant was the owner of the two parcels of land upon which the houses were to be erected, and at the time of the trial of this action it was proved by him that in the month of Oct. 1866, he contracted to sell the parcel in Vauxhall-road to George Lewis, and the parcel in Twyver-street to William Burgoyne. No money was paid either by George Lewis or by William Burgoyne, nor did they at any time have any copy or copies of the said alleged contracts, or of any documents connected with the alleged contracts of sale. On the 25th Feb. 1867 the defendant conveyed the parcels of land respectively to George Lewis and William Burgoyne, and on the same day the parcels respectively, with the houses then partly erected thereon, were mortgaged by George Lewis and William Burgoyne to the defendant.

The whole of these transactions were managed and conducted by the defendant.

Between the months of Oct. 1866 and the 23rd of Feb. 1867, the defendant gave to George Lewis and William Burgoyne respectively, money from time to time to pay labourers employed on the houses, and also paid on their respective orders of requests several accounts due to different tradesmen, and the two mortgages above mentioned were alleged to have been ultimately taken from George Lewis and William Burgoyne respectively, for the money due from them respectively to the defendant for such money and payments, and at the trial it was alleged that the defendant had fully accounted for the whole of the moneys for which the mortgages were given to him, and that he had no money in hand at the time of the alleged claim of the plaintiff belonging to George Lewis or William Burgoyne, or either of them.

The parcels of land so alleged to have been sold to George Lewis and William Burgoyne were subsequently sold by the defendant.

The cause was heard at Gloucester on the 29th of June 1869, before the judge of the said court and a jury, who found a verdict for the plaintiff for 26*l.* 11*s.* 10*d.*

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that credit had been given to George Lewis and William Burgoyne; that the defendant was simply mortgagee not in possession of the premises; that he had not given any orders or made any promises to the plaintiff; and that if he had made any promise to pay him it was made on account of the debt or default of George Lewis or of William Burgoyne, and was therefore void, because it was not in writing as required by the Statute of Frauds.

Evidence was given in support of such contention of the defendant.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the defendant was really owner and personally interested in the premises; that George Lewis and William Burgoyne were simply his agents; that if he was mortgagee, he was the mortgagee in possession; that he had acted as the owner; and that he had given orders to the plaintiff as well as to other persons to do work upon the parcels of land.

Evidence was given in support of such contention of the plaintiff; and in addition to other witnesses the following persons were called:—John Knight, Thomas Webb, Joseph William Baber, James Tandy, and William Philips, all of whom alleged, and the defendant denied that they had received orders from the defendant personally to do work or to supply materials upon or for the said dwelling-houses.

It was objected on behalf of the defendant that this evidence was inadmissible. The County Court judge admitted the evidence.

The question for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench was whether the judge of the County Court was right in admitting the evidence of witnesses in support of the plaintiff's case with the object of showing that the defendant had made promises, or had given orders, directions, or instructions to them, or any or either of them, with reference to work done or materials supplied in respect of the before-mentioned dwelling-houses, or any or either of them, the plaintiff not being present when any of the alleged promises, orders, directions, or instructions were given.

Jelf, for the appellant, contended that the evidence of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff to prove the orders, &c., given by the defendant, was improperly admitted by the learned judge. Evidence to show that the defendant had held himself out to others as the owner of the houses did not bear properly upon the issue between the parties in the case—viz., whether the plaintiff had received orders from the defendant to do the work. [LUSH, J.—Was not the issue this, whether the defendant was really the principal in the transaction?] The evidence admitted was collateral to the issue, and should have been rejected. "The rule," says Taylor on Evidence, vol. 1, p. 333, "confining evidence to the points in issue not only precludes the litigant parties from proving any facts not distinctly controverted by the pleadings, but it limits the mode of proving even the issues themselves. Thus it excludes all evidence of collateral facts which are incapable of affording any reasonable presumption as to the principal matters in dispute; and the reason is that such evidence tends needlessly to consume the public time, to draw away the minds of the jurors from the points in issue, and to excite prejudice and mislead; moreover, the adverse party, having had no notice of such evidence, is not prepared to rebut it." [HANNEN, J.—If meat had been supplied to a particular house by a butcher, could he not, in seeking to recover the amount from the person whom he alleges to be the occupier and to have given the orders, call other tradesmen to show that they also had received orders from the same person to supply goods to that house? Such evidence does not appear to be very remote from the issue.] In Barden v. De Keverberg, 2 M. & W. 61, where goods had been supplied by plaintiff to a married woman, who pleaded her coverture, it was held that evidence of the defendant's dealings with other tradesmen, to whom it was alleged she had held herself out as a single woman, was not admissible unless her representations to them were so made as to come to the plaintiff's knowledge. Parke, B. said, "If evidence of her dealings with other parties was admissible, it could only be so on the ground of her having represented herself to them as a feme sole, so as it might reach the plaintiff's ears." In Smith v. Wilkins, 6 C. & P. 180, it was held that if in an action for goods sold the question be whether credit was given to the defendant's wife or to her father, evidence that other persons had given credit to the father is not receivable. Again, in Hollingham v. Head, 4 C. B. N. S. 388, in an action for goods sold and delivered, the question being whether the sale was absolute or subject to a condition, it was held that it was not competent to the defendant to call witnesses to prove that the plaintiff had made contracts with other persons subject to the condition suggested. The judge having allowed the plaintiff to be asked, on cross-examination, whether he had not made such conditional contracts with others, with a view of testing his credit or the accuracy of his memory, it was doubted by the court whether it was proper even to that extent. "The question," said Willes, J., "is whether in an action for goods sold and delivered it is competent to the defendant to set up, by way of defence, that the plaintiff has entered into contracts with third persons in a particular form, with the view of thereby inducing the jury to come to the conclusion that the contract sued upon was not as represented by the plaintiff. I am clearly of opinion that it was not competent to the defendant to do so. I am of opinion that the evidence was properly disallowed as not being relevant to the issue. It is not easy in all cases to draw the line, and to define with accuracy where probability ceases and speculation begins; but we are bound to lay down the rule to the best of our ability. No doubt the rule as to confining the evidence to that which is relevant and pertinent to the issue, is one of great importance, not only as regards the particular case, but also with reference to saving the time of the court and preventing the minds of the jury from being drawn away from the real point they have to decide." The same learned judge asks, "Does the fact of a person having once or many times in his life done a particular act in a particular way make it more probable that he had done the same thing in the same way upon another and different occasion? To admit such speculative evidence would, I think, be fraught with great danger. . . . If such evidence were held admissible, it would be difficult to say that the defendant might not, in any case where the question was whether or not there had been a sale of goods on credit, call witnesses to prove that the plaintiff had dealt with other persons upon a certain credit; or in an action for an assault, that the plaintiff might not give evidence of former assaults committed by the defendant upon other persons, or upon other persons of a particular class, for the purpose of showing that he was a quarrelsome individual, and therefore that it was highly probable that the particular charge of assault was well founded. The extent to which this sort of thing might be carried is inconceivable." The opinions of Byles and Williams, JJ. were to the same effect. Howard v. Sheward, 36 L. J., C. P., 42; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 183, was also referred to. On these authorities it is submitted that the evidence received was inadmissible. [LUSH, J.—If the defendant had been heard to say that Lewis and Burgoyne were his agents, and that he himself was the party interested in the house, could not evidence of that statement have been given at the trial? If so, why should not conduct on his part which tends to show that he was the real owner be also admissible?]

Gray, Q. C. (with whom was Sawyer), for the respondent, was not called upon.

MELLOR, J.—We are of opinion that it has not been made out that the evidence of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff in the County Court was collateral to the issue there raised between the parties. The issue was whether the houses were being built, and the work done and materials supplied for the defendant, and it was quite legitimate and pertinent to that issue to call as witnesses other tradesmen who had received orders in respect to these same houses from the defendant. If they had received orders from the defendant in respect of different houses and not the same, the authorities cited on behalf of the defendant might be sufficient to show that their evidence could not be given in support of the plaintiff's case. Under the circumstances of the case, we all think that the evidence of these witnesses was properly received as being perfectly relevant to the issue, and in itself strong to show that the defendant was really the owner of the houses.

Toll—Turnpike-road—Artificial manure carried in dealer's cart—Superphosphate of lime—5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 18, s. 1.

Sect. 1 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 18, exempts from toll on turnpike roads, carriages "when employed in carrying or conveying only dung, soil, compost, or manure, for land, save and except lime."

This exemption includes superphosphate of lime carried for manure in the waggon of the dealer from whom it has been purchased.

Case stated by justices.

This is a case stated by us, the undersigned, two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace in and for the division of Salisbury Amesbury, in the county of Wilts, under the statute 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of the court on a question of law which arose before us as hereafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at Salisbury, in and for the division of Salisbury, in the county of Wilts, on the 22nd June 1869, an information was preferred by John Tucker (hereinafter called the respondent), against Thos. Foster (hereinafter called the appellant) under the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 18, s. 1, which provided that from and after the 1st Jan. 1836 no toll shall be demanded or taken on any turnpike road for or in respect of any horse, beast, cattle, or carriage when employed in carrying any dung, soil, compost, or manure for land (save and except lime), and the necessary implements used for filling the manure, and the cloth that may have been used for covering any hay, clover, or straw which may have been conveyed, charging that the said Thos. Foster, of the parish of Coombe Bissett, in the county of Wilts, being the collector of tolls at a certain turnpike gate there situate, called "the Coombe Bissett gate," did demand and take of and from one John Trimby the sum of 1s. as and for the toll payable for the passing through the said gate of a waggon drawn by two horses, he, the said John Trimby being exempt from the payment thereof, and claiming such exemption by reason of the said waggon and horses being employed in conveying only manure for land contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and was heard and determined by us, the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before us of the said offence, and we adjudged him to pay a fine of 20s., and the sum of 9s. for costs, to be paid forthwith. In default of payment it was ordered that the same should be levied by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the appellant, and in default of sufficient distress that the said appellant should be imprisoned in the house of correction at Devizes, in the said county of Wilts for fourteen days, unless the said several sums, and all costs and charges attending such distress, should be sooner paid.

And whereas the appellant being dissatisfied with our determination upon the hearing of the said information, as being erroneous in point of law, hath, pursuant to sect. 2 of the said statute, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, duly applied to us in writing to state and sign a case, setting forth the facts and the grounds of our determination as aforesaid, for the opinion of this court, and hath duly entered into a recognizance as required by that statute in that behalf.

Now, therefore, we, the said justices, in compliance with the said application, and the provisions of the said statute, do hereby state and sign the following case:

That John Rebbeck, a farmer, living at Ebbesborne, in the county of Wilts, had ordered from Charles Prangle, a dealer in artificial manures, a load of manufactured manure, namely superphosphate of lime, for his land.

That on the 18th June inst., the said artificial manure was forwarded to the said John Rebbeck, in a waggon drawn by two horses, belonging to the said Charles Prangle, and driven by his carter, John Trimby; that the said John Trimby passed with such waggon and horses, loaded with the said artificial manure, through the turnpike gate at Coombe Bissett aforesaid, of which the appellant is the toll collector; that the said appellant demanded a toll of one shilling; that the said John Trimby claimed exemption on the ground that he was carrying the manure to Mr. Rebbeck, and that on the appellant refusing to let him pass, he paid the toll.

The above facts were also admitted by the appellant's attorney before us.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the said artificial manure was liable to toll, inasmuch as it was manufactured merchandise, and had not passed from the dealer's hands; that the said Charles Prangle was not as such manufacturer and dealer entitled to any exemption from toll.

We however being of opinion that it was manure for land, which was exempt from toll when on its carriage to land, whether carried by the owner of the land or the person of whom it was purchased, gave our determination against the appellant in the manner before stated.

It was admitted by the appellant that the proceedings heard before us were legal and regular, and that if the said manure was liable to toll the said conviction was properly made.

The question of law arising on the above statement for the opinion of the court, therefore, is, whether imported or artificial manure, being conveyed to the farmer by the manufacturer and seller, is exempt from toll.

If the court should be of opinion that the said conviction was legally and properly made, and the appellant is liable as aforesaid, then the said conviction is to stand; but if the court should be of opinion otherwise, then the said complaint is to be dismissed.

Given under our hands this 9th day of Nov., 1869, at Salisbury, in the county of Wilts aforesaid.

EDWARD HINXMAN.

HENRY J. H. SWAYNE.

A. de Rutzen for the appellant.—There are two questions involved in the case, (1) whether a waggon belonging to the manufacturer and seller of artificial manure is exempt from toll under the enactment. Sect. 1 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 18, that "no toll shall be demanded or taken on any turnpike road for or in respect of any horse, beast, cattle, or carriage when employed in carrying or conveying only dung, soil, compost, or manure for land (save and except lime), and the necessary implements used for getting the manure, &c." It is no doubt said by Lord Campbell, C. J., in Reg. v. Freke, 5 El. & Bl. 949, that "the object of the exempting clause was to benefit agriculture; and the agriculturist gains as much by the exemption of the party who sells to him as by an immediate exemption of himself;" but this must be regarded merely as an obiter dictum, and was not necessary to the determination of the case. There is a second question, whether superphosphate of lime can be considered one of the sorts of manure exempted where the section says, "save and except lime." [HANNEN, J.—The section says "lime," superphosphate of lime is chemically a different substance.]

Snowden, for the respondent, was not called upon.

LUSH, J.—I do not think we need trouble the other side in this case. The words of sect. 1 of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 18, are very general; and the manure in the present case, superphosphate of lime, not coming within the exception "lime," we must give effect to the words of the enactment, and hold it exempt from toll. The opinion of this court, as expressed in Reg. v. Freke (ubi. sup.), was that it is immaterial whether the manure is being conveyed in the cart of the dealer or not.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

REG. v. PEARSON.

Assault—Question of title to land—Jurisdiction of justices—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 42, 46.

Sect. 46 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 (sect. 42 of which Act gives justices power of summarily convicting for assaults), which provides that nothing therein contained "shall authorise any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom," takes away from justices all jurisdiction to determine cases of assault where any such question is shown to arise, and they cannot inquire into or adjudicate upon an excess of force or violence which may be used in the assertion of a title to lands.

This was a rule to quash a conviction brought up by certiorari.

The conviction was made under the hands of George Cressy Hill and Chas. Rowland Morewood, Esqrs., two justices of the county of Derby, dated 7th May last, whereby the defendant John Pearson was convicted for that he did unlawfully assault Robt. Turner contrary to the form of the statute.

The affidavit of the defendant set forth as follows:—

I am the owner of real estate in South Wingfield to a considerable extent, and I hold a conveyance to myself of a piece of land situate at South Wingfield aforesaid, over and in respect of which Robt. Turner, of South Wingfield, butler, on or before the 25th April last, claimed certain rights or privileges, which rights I, the said John Pearson, claiming to be the owner of the said piece of land disputed, and do now dispute.

The said Robt. Turner is the owner, as I am informed and believe, of land and buildings adjoining the said piece of land mentioned in the first paragraph of this affidavit, and on the 29th April last I went to the said piece of land mentioned in the first paragraph of this affidavit, and found thereon a quantity of bricks which the said Robt. Turner had, as I was informed and believed, carted or caused to be carted thereupon, and which said bricks I was informed were intended to be used by the said Robt. Turner for building purposes. I, not having a servant with me to do so, myself took some of the bricks and threw them over a wall near to the said piece of land, intending thereby to assert that the placing of the said bricks upon the said piece of land was a trespass. After I had thrown some of the said bricks over the said wall the said Robert Turner came to me and seized a brick I held, and endeavoured to pull it out of my hand, and so prevent me from throwing the said bricks as last aforesaid, upon which I pushed him off from me, and with the force of the push he, the said Robert Turner, staggered backwards, down to the sloping side of an old sawpit, partly filled up with some materials, such sawpit being within four or five feet of where the said Robert Turner was standing, but the said Robert Turner did not fall down or lose his feet, although, as I am informed, he stated that he had to put out his hand to the ground to prevent himself from falling down or losing his feet; and I further say that I should not have touched the said Robert Turner if he had not, as aforesaid, endeavoured to force the said brick out of my hand.

On the 29th April I consulted Messrs. Wilson and Burkinshaw as my solicitors as to taking such steps as they might deem expedient, to vindicate my title to the said first hereinafore-mentioned piece of land, but left them without coming to any determination as to the steps to be taken, they advising me that it would be better for me to defend any proceedings which, from what had been said by the said Robert Turner, they my said solicitors and myself thought it probable would be instituted by the said Robert Turner, than that I should institute proceedings against him as plaintiff.

• On Friday, the 13th April, I received a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

Alfreton, 29th April, 1869.

Dear Sir,—Mr. Robert Turner has been at my office today in reference to his having this day laid some bricks on, and which he temporarily deposited on, a certain piece of uninclosed ground at South Wingfield, but with the intention of using such bricks for the improvement of his property which it adjoins. Mr. Turner states that you went to him, and the men engaged, and forcibly ejected Mr. Turner from off the uninclosed piece of land and violently assaulted him. Mr. Turner wishes to know by what authority or under what title you claim to dispute his using the piece of land in question.—Yours truly,

BENJAMIN SAMUEL RICHARDS.

John Pearson, Esq.

And which said letter I believe came from the office of the said Benjamin Samuel Richards, now lately deceased, who was then acting as clerk to the justices in the Alfreton petty sessional division within which South Wingfield aforesaid is situate. On the same day on which I received the last-mentioned letter I again consulted my said solicitors, and produced to them the said last-mentioned letter, who on Saturday, the 1st May, wrote, and sent by post, as I am informed and believe, to the said Benjamin Samuel Richards, a letter, of which the following is a copy, namely,

Alfreton, May 1 1869.

Dear Sir,—Your letter of the 29th ult., addressed to Mr. Pearson, of Wingfield, has been handed by him to us, with instructions to reply thereto. Your letter seems to be written under a misapprehension of the facts. The land on which your client trespassed by laying of bricks thereon was land belonging to Mr. Pearson, to which he is able to deduce his title in the usual manner, in case the conduct of your client was intended to assert claim to the land as against Mr. Pearson. Mr. Pearson observing that your client had placed bricks on the said land was in confirmation of the information which he gave to your client that he was trespassing on the land, proceeding to remove from the land some of the bricks, when he was forcibly interfered with by your client with the object of preventing him so doing, and the alleged assault mentioned in your letter was the action of Mr. Pearson in repelling with no more than the necessary force your client, when he so forcibly interfered with Mr. Pearson, and in fact resisting an assault upon himself, respecting which and the trespass before mentioned Mr. Pearson had already consulted us before the date of our letter. If you have any further communication to make on the subject, we request you will make it to ourselves.—We are, yours truly,

WILSON and BURKINSHAW.

B. S. Richards, Esq.

I directed my said solicitors to reply to the aforesaid letter of the said Benjamin Samuel Richards as aforesaid, because I understood from the letter, and more especially from the latter part of such letter, in which it is said, "Mr. Turner wishes to know by what authority or under what title you claim using the piece of land in question," that the said Robert Turner and the said Benjamin Samuel Richards, as his solicitor, contemplated instituting civil proceedings respecting the said piece of land, or the acts hereinbefore mentioned; and, because, moreover, immediately after the happening of the events mentioned in the second paragraph of this affidavit, the said Robert Turner threatened me, saying to me the following words, "I'll clap a writ on your back for this," or words to the like effect.

Late on the evening of Tuesday, the 4th day of May last, I was served with the magistrates' summons dated the 1st of May. I instructed the said John Burkinshaw, as my attorney, to appear on my behalf in answer to such summons, to show to the justices that a question as to the title to the said piece of land arose, and on my behalf to submit to the said justices that under the circumstances the change mentioned in the said summons ought not to be adjudicated upon by them.

On the 7th May the defendant's attorney attended and offered evidence as to the dispute of title, and contended that they had no jurisdiction to go on with the case, and quoted 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 46. The justices, however, taking the advice of Mr. Richards, the attorney of the complainant, said they would hear the case, and finally convicted the defendant.

24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, enacts that—

Where any person shall unlawfully assault or beat any other person, two justices of the peace upon complaint by or on behalf of the party aggrieved, may hear and determine such offence, and the offender shall, upon conviction thereof before them, at the discretion of the justices, either be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned with or without hard labour for any term not exceeding two months, or else shall forfeit and pay such fine as shall appear to them to be meet, not exceeding, together with costs (if ordered), the sum of five pounds; and if such fine as shall be so awarded, together with the costs (if ordered) shall not be paid, either immediately after the conviction, or within such period as the said justices shall at the time of the conviction appoint, they may commit the offender to the common gaol or house of correction, there to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any term not exceeding two months, unless such fine and costs be sooner paid.

Sect. 46 provides—

That in case the justices shall find the assault or battery complained of to have been accompanied by any attempt to commit felony, or shall be of opinion that the same is, from any other circumstance, a fit subject for a prosecution by indictment, they shall abstain from any adjudication thereupon, and shall deal with the case in all respects in the same manner as if they had no authority finally to hear and determine the same; provided also that nothing herein contained shall authorise any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom, or as to any bankruptcy or insolvency, or any execution under the process of any court of justice.

Robinson, Serjt., now showed cause against the rule, and contended that notwithstanding title came in question, still the magistrates had jurisdiction to adjudicate upon and punish the assault where it was shown to them that excessive force or violence had been used in the assertion of the alleged right. [LUSH, J.—The proviso in sect. 46 is very wide—"that nothing herein contained shall authorise any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any lands, &c." Does not that override the whole preceding part of the [Act?] It is submitted that it does not take away the jurisdiction which justices previously had to adjudicate in cases where excessive violence was used. It was not the intention of the Act to take away any jurisdiction which they formerly had, but rather to enlarge it. The information in the present case charged only a common assault, and where excessive violence is used in the vindication of an asserted right, the magistrates may surely treat the excess as a common assault, and adjudicate upon it alone. [LUSH, J.—Granting that there was such an excess as would have been indictable, can the magistrates adjudicate upon that matter summarily, where the dispute arises out of a title to lands? This is what I doubt.] There is nothing in the affidavit to show that the question of title was raised before the magistrates. [LUSH, J.—The letter of the respondent's attorney was before them, in which the complaint is chiefly of the trespass. HANNEN, J.—And I cannot see how the excess of violence can be separated from the original assault, which was committed in the assertion of a title to land]. Re Thompson, 30 L. J. 19, M. C.; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 409, was referred to.

G. Bruce, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

LUSH, J.—I think we need not trouble the other side. I am of opinion that the rule must be made absolute. It appears very clearly from the facts laid before us in the affidavit and not contradicted by any statement on the other side, that the assault, the subject of the charge before the magistrates, was committed in the course of an assertion of title on behalf of the defendant. The prosecutor had entered upon land which he had claimed to be his, and in order to get him off the land the assault in question was committed, not wantonly or for the purpose of injuring the prosecutor, but as an act asserting the defendant's right to the land and his right to turn every one else off it; and it further appears that that was brought to the notice of the magistrates. That being so, I am of opinion, on the construction of the 46th section of the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, that the jurisdiction of the magistrates was at an end, and that they had no right to determine whether the act done was excessive or not. I think the words of the 46th section which show that are beyond all doubt. The jurisdiction which the magistrates have to deal summarily with the case of an assault committed is given by the previous sections of the same Act. Then comes the 46th, which contains these provisions:—"That nothing herein contained shall authorise any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom." The section does not say that the jurisdiction of the magistrates shall be ousted so far as the question may turn on a disputed title to lands; but that nothing therein contained shall give them jurisdiction to determine any case where such a question shall arise. I think, therefore, as a question of title to lands arose in this case, and the fact was brought to the notice of the magistrates, they should have held their hands, and come to the conclusion that they had no jurisdiction to determine the matter. They did not do that, however, but, acting on the advice of their clerk, seem to have gone against their own better judgment. I must say it is much to be regretted that they did act on his advice, when it was brought to their knowledge that he was the solicitor of the prosecutor in the case, and therefore an interested party. It appears that he had written to the defendant, threatening proceedings, besides acting as the prosecutor's solicitor in the hearing of the case before them. I think I ought not to omit the opportunity of saying that when this was brought to the notice of the justices they should not have acted on his advice. If they had acted on their own opinion they would have done properly, and not have suffered themselves to be led into error. Under the circumstances of the case we can do nothing else than quash the conviction.

HANNEN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

G. Bruce asked for costs against the justices, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, though in ordinary cases it was not usual to grant them.

LUSH, J.—We are not disposed to give costs against the justices, where they have acted bonâ fide. If the other party had himself appeared before us the case would be different.

Conviction quashed.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH and E. LUMLEY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, May 5, 1869.

DOUGLAS v. DOUGLAS.

Gift of chattel—Donor and donee—Chattel in possession of third party—No delivery or change of possession—Expression of desire on part of donor—Revocable at donor's pleasure—Vesting of property—Out and out gift—Action of detinue.

In 1850 G. quitted England for Australia, leaving behind him, in the charge and custody of his wife (the defendant), a sword which had come into his possession and ownership on the death of his father, a general in the army, to whom it had been originally presented by the officers of his regiment. G.'s only son having died, G. wrote a letter, from Australia, to his brother H. (the plaintiff) in England, dated 14th Sept. 1863, expressing a desire for him to have possession of the sword, in the following terms: "You only anticipate my wish that you should have charge of our father's sword, which, of course, you will keep in our family if I should not have a son to inherit, which does not seem very probable. I have inclosed an order unsealed to Mary" (the defendant, G.'s wife) "to hand it over to you." This order was as follows: "On receipt of this letter you will be so good as to deliver our father's sword to my brother Henry;" and in a subsequent letter to the plaintiff of 28th Sept. 1863, G. said, "I shall expect a long letter in reply from you. Tell me how the old sword looks." These letters and order were communicated to the defendant, and applications were made to her by the plaintiff for delivery of the sword to him, but without success. G.

died in Australia in Dec. 1865, having made a will there in 1864, of which he appointed another brother W. executor, who proved the same in that country, and who, in a letter to the plaintiff, announcing the death of their brother G., said, with regard to the possession of the sword by the defendant, "She is not the proper custodian of our father's sword." The defendant still declined to part with the sword, claiming to keep it for her daughter as a memento of G., her father; and in detinue by the plaintiff to recover the sword or its value, and damages for its detention, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C. B., and Martin, Bramwell, and Pigott, BB.), making absolute a rule to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant, that the words of the letter of the 14th Sept. 1863 were not words of gift at all, but amounted merely to a desire by G. that the plaintiff should have charge of the sword, a charge which was revocable at G.'s pleasure, and did not constitute an out and out gift, or pass any property in the sword to the plaintiff.

Flower's case, Noy's Rep. 67, discussed and explained.

This was an action of detinue of a sword of the value of 200*l.*; and by the declaration the plaintiff claimed a return of the sword or its value, and 20*l.* for the detention.

The defendant pleaded several pleas, to wit: 1. Non detinet. 2. Denial of its being the sword of the plaintiff. 3. The Statute of Limitations. On all these pleas issue was joined.

The question in the case was whether the property in the sword, which was the subject of the action, had passed to the plaintiff so as to entitle him to maintain the action for its recovery; and at the trial before Cleasby, B. the following appeared to be the facts of the case:

The sword in question had originally belonged to and was the property of the late General Sir William Douglas, having been presented to him many years ago by the officers of his regiment. At his death it passed into the possession and ownership of his eldest son Captain George Douglas, formerly an officer in the army. That gentleman, having left the army and separated himself from his wife, went in 1850 to Australia, where he died in the month of Dec. 1865, having by his last will and testament, made and executed in that country in the year 1864, appointed his brother, Mr. W. A. Douglas, and a Mr. McDonald, his executors. This will was proved in Australia by W. A. Douglas alone, the other executor, Mr. McDonald, having renounced probate. Upon Captain George Douglas leaving England in 1850, the sword was left behind him in this country, and was kept together with a will made by him at that date before going to Australia, which last mentioned will was, of course, revoked by the subsequent will made by Captain Douglas in Australia in 1864. As hereafter mentioned the sword, on Captain Douglas's departure, remained in the charge and custody of his wife, the defendant in the present action. An only son of Captain George Douglas having died, that gentleman wrote a letter from Australia to his brother Henry, the plaintiff, dated 14th Sept. 1863, in which he expressed a desire for him to have possession of the sword, as follows: "You only anticipate my wish that you should have charge of your father's sword, which of course you will keep in our family, if I should not have a son to inherit, which does not now seem very probable," and, he added, "I have inclosed an order unsealed to Mary" (his wife, the defendant), "to hand it over to you." The order which was inclosed was as follows: "On the receipt of this letter you will be so good as to deliver our father's sword to my brother Henry." In a subsequent letter from Captain George Douglas to the plaintiff, the former said: "I shall expect a long letter in reply from you. Tell me how the old sword looks."

The above letters and order were communicated to the wife (the defendant), and several applications were from time to time made to her, by the plaintiff, for the delivery to him of the sword, but without success. So things went on, and nothing more was done until after the death of Capt. Geo. Douglas, which event occurred in Australia, in Dec. 1865. The death was announced to the plaintiff in a letter written from Australia to him by his brother, W. A. Douglas, the executor of the will, made by Geo. Douglas in 1864, in which letter the facts of such will, and of his (W. A. Douglas's) being the executor were announced. In that letter also, after stating that he could have no objection to the defendant, or her daughter Emma, taking any little thing which they might wish to keep as a memento of the deceased, W. A. Douglas proceeded to say, with reference to the sword in question; "but she is not the proper custodian of our father's sword."

News of the death of Capt. Geo. Douglas arrived in England in the spring of 1866, and in reply to an application to her, by the plaintiff, for the sword, the defendant on the 11th March in that year, wrote the following letter:

York House, Bognor, March 11, 1866.

My dear Henry,—Touching the sword, you are in error in thinking that I promised to send it to you. I said I would see at the time of his unhappy death. Emma had finished, and was on the point of dispatching, a long letter to her father, in which she asked him, as she had nothing belonging to him, to give her the sword, which, had he lived, would have come into her dear brother's possession. She cannot of course help feeling that George would make a most unnatural will in not leaving her even the slightest memento. George has not, I believe, in his will, made any mention of the sword, and I cannot help feeling that Emma is entitled to keep it—at any rate for the present—though were anything to happen to her, I would at once send it to you. Years ago when I asked George if I should send it to him, he said no, it was far safer with me than with him.

The plaintiff renewing his application for the delivery up to him of the sword, and the defendant still declining to part with it, and claiming to keep it as belonging to her daughter, the plaintiff brought the present action, and at the trial, before Cleasby, B., as before-mentioned, he obtained a verdict. A rule was subsequently moved for and obtained on behalf of the defendant to set that verdict aside and to enter a nonsuit or a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that there was no evidence that the sword was the property of the plaintiff as alleged, and no evidence to show that the property in the sword passed from the defendant's late husband to the plaintiff; and against that rule Denman, Q. C., and Thrupp, for the plaintiff, now showed cause, and contended that although there might be here and there some dicta adverse to the plaintiff's claim, yet, looking at the older cases and dicta on the subject, they would submit there was clear evidence to show that on the second plea of the property not being the plaintiff's, the latter was entitled to succeed. The question, in all these cases, is not whether the property in the chattel was irrevocably in the plaintiff against all the world, but whether it was the property of the plaintiff as against the defendant. The principle, in such cases, laid down by Selwyn, in his Nisi Prius, p. 580, 13th edit., was applicable. He there says, "It has been said that as this action proceeds on the ground of property in the plaintiff at the time of action brought, it cannot be maintained if the defendant take the goods tortiously, for by the trespass the property of the plaintiff is divested;" but the learned author adds, in a note, that the contrary opinion would now seem better founded, and he goes on in the text, at p. 582, to say that "property in the plaintiff, without his ever having had possession is sufficient;" and he adds, "So, if I deliver goods to A. to deliver to B., B. may have detinue, for the property is vested in him by the delivery to his use" (citing 1 Roll. Abr. 606 A. pl. 1.) To the same effect as that is the case of Gledstane v. Hewitt, 1 Cr. & J. 565; 1 Tyrw. 445. The case of Broadbent v. Ledward, 11 A. & E. 209, is an authority to show that the plaintiff has a right to recover, as against the defendant; and Browne v. Fosbrooke, 18 C. B., N. S., 515; 34 L. J. 164, C. P., though it may be relied on contra, for the dictum that delivery or deed is necessary to the maintenance of the action, yet is in many parts of the judgment favourable to the plaintiff's claim. Erle, C.J., at p. 526, says, "Possession is a word of ambiguous meaning, and though in most cases it is considered to import the manual custody of the chattel, yet a man may also be said to be in possession of an article which he has not at the moment about his person;" and to the same effect are the judgments of Keating and M. Smith, JJ. in that case. In Ward v. Audland, 16 M. & W. 862, Parke, B. doubted the correctness of the holding in Irons v. Smallpiece, 2 B. & Ald. 551, and that latter case was treated by Crompton, J., in Winter v. Winter, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 639, as practically overruled. [KELLY, C. B.—We are not called on to decide whether Irons v. Smallpiece was well or ill decided. The question here turns on the words of the letter] These words it is submitted constituted an absolute gift to the plaintiff during his brother George's life; and à fortiori, now that he is dead, a gift not revocable except on the contingency, which never occurred, of George's having a son to inherit. There was a clear intention on George's part to transfer the property to the plaintiff, accompanied by a letter to the holder, the defendant. She wrongfully retained it against the wish of her husband, and in so doing was a wrongdoer and cannot take advantage of such a wrong. [BRAMWELL, B.—Had George come back to England and said, "Give me back the sword you have had charge of," could the plaintiff have retained it?] As against George the gift may not have been irrevocable had he survived; but as against his widow it is so, and it does not lie in her mouth to set up her right as custodian. The words constituted an actual right. They cited also in support of their argument

KELLY, C. B.—I do not think that we are called upon, at present, to say whether we should overrule the case of Irons v. Smallpiece, or whether a gift, not made by deed, and unaccompanied by transfer is invalid in law. Whenever that question shall come before me, I feel bound to say I shall require a much higher authority than the note of an editor, however learned or eminent, to induce me to overrule a decision of Lord Tenterden and his brethren in the Court of Queen's Bench. With regard to the text books which have been cited, they are founded upon cases to which they expressly refer, which contain nothing whatever to support the proposition in the form in which it is laid down. They only give the example of the case in Noy, which is quoted as showing that personal property may pass by way of gift without delivery. But it is not said how the gift was made. The only question here is, whether, looking to the terms of the letter, and all the surrounding circumstances admitted in evidence as applying to that question, there are any words of gift which vested the property in this sword in the plaintiff, either during the life of his brother George, or upon his death. The words are these: "You have only anticipated my wish that you should have charge of our father's sword, which of course you will keep in your family should I not have a son to inherit, which does not now seem very probable." Now in the first place, are there here any words of a gift at all? "You shall have charge of the sword," that merely is, "You are to have possession of the sword." Does the letter go on to say that the sword is to become his own? On the contrary, it says, "which, of course, you will keep in your family should I not have a son to inherit." The meaning is, "If I should have a son the sword is not to be yours, but will remain when I die to my son hereafter." As long therefore as he lived he might have a son. It is perfectly clear that no property passed, or was ever intended to pass to the brother Henry, the now plaintiff. Then was it intended, under these words, if he should have no son, that the property in the sword should pass to his brother Henry at his death? It might possibly be so intended. I do not say that such is the construction of the whole letter taken together; but it might possibly be contended that, under these words, "which, of course you will keep in the family should I not have a son to inherit," the property would be vested in the plaintiff. He would have no power to keep it in the event of his brother George having a son. If such a construction could be put on an instrument of this nature, that it conveyed property to one to whom the letter was written, after the death of the writer, it would be in effect to repeal the Wills Act altogether. Looking, therefore, to the language of the letter itself, it appears to me, beyond all question, that no present property was immediately vested in the receiver of the letter, and he could not, under any instrument of this nature, without delivery of possession, take the property in this article on the death of his brother. Under these circumstances, while I entertain great personal regret that it should be so, I am obliged to hold that the plaintiff is not entitled to the sword, and that this rule should be made absolute.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. In the first instance it seems to me that it is necessary clearly to understand the nature of a gift, which, as I apprehend its meaning, as applied to this matter, is that the owner of a present chattel transfers from his own power the property in that chattel, so that the ownership of the donor shall cease, and the ownership of the donee shall commence: (see Sheppard's Touchstone) The real question in this case is, does the letter of the 14th Sept. 1863 show that Capt. Geo. Douglas meant that the property in this sword, which is assumed to have been in him, should pass from him, and vest in the plaintiff? So far from that being the case, I am of opinion that it shows the very contrary. The words of the letter are these: "You have anticipated my wish that you should have charge of our father's sword." I collect from that that the plain meaning is this—the sword was considered by the family as having a value, and George Douglas had written to the plaintiff, saying that he thought, under the circumstances that existed, that he, the plaintiff, was the proper party to have charge of it. "You have already anticipated my wish that you should have charge of our father's sword, which of course you will keep in our family should I not have a son to inherit, which does not now seem very probable." It seems to me that that clearly shows that what he meant was that the Douglas family was the proper family to remain in possession of it, and that, in the event of his having a son, he should inherit it, and if he came back to England, and desired to have back the sword, he could claim it. Now that is no gift, because a gift is a transfer of the property. Coupling this letter with his usealed letter to his wife, it comes to nothing more than an expression of his desire that the plaintiff should have possession of the sword, and retain it so long as he, George Douglas, thought fit, and it was his wish that he should retain it. That seems to me the plain and obvious meaning of this letter, and in my judgment the plaintiff has failed to establish that it ever was a gift to him at all. Then with regard to the other points, one is as to whether possession is necessary to complete a gift. I have a strong notion that all the cases are reconcileable when they are closely looked at. But with respect to the case which Mr. Denman cited from Noy, as showing that the property in the chattel passed without possession by gift, what is the meaning of "waging his law?" It was that in certain cases of actions a defendant might come in and swear he was not indebted to the plaintiff, and that was an answer to the action. Those who remember the law as it was forty years ago, will know that that was the reason why, before that was abolished, indebitatus assumpsit was always used for the recovery of a debt. It will be found in all the old books that the reason for that was, that thereby was taken away from the defendant the possibility of "waging his law." So in Flowers' case, which has been cited, the question was whether a man might wage his law. The facts were these:—A. borrowed 100*l.* of F.; that is, a lending of 100*l.* to A., and a debt. There was a day of payment, and A. brought the 100*l.* and began to throw it down on the table; but F. said "Hold!" A., who was his nephew, tendered the money, and F. said, "I will not have it." Therefore what took place was that A., having come to pay the 100*l.* offered, tendered the money to F., and said, "here is your money for you," and F. said, "No, I will not have it." The question was, was that a payment of the money? It is clear it was. He offered the money, it was then a tender, but F. would not take it. That was a gift of the money, and A. put it in his pocket, and the court said it was a good gift by parol, being cast upon the table; and it was not therefore merely a tender of the money, it was, in effect, a payment, and therefore the giving it back again was a good gift by parol. If, then, it was in the possession of F., A. might well wage his law, for he might conscientiously then have come forward and sworn that he did not owe F. any money. But that has no bearing upon the present matter.

SMITH v. HOWARD.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the terms of this letter clearly do not come within the definition of a gift, and I agree with the definition given by my brother Martin. I may, I think, test it in this way. Suppose George Douglas had come back to England and set up a house for himself, either upon the death of the present defendant, or otherwise, and said "I am the eldest son," I think, beyond doubt, he would have been entitled to demand the sword back. But suppose the defendant had become indebted, and a fi. fa. had issued against her chattels, could it be doubted that George would have been entitled to demand the sword? I choose that criterion to show that George never did, by the language he used, intend to part with the property in the sword, but merely that the younger brother being in England, in which the family were, the family having the custody of it, he left it over to the younger brother. That would not give a right to such an action as this which must be maintainable either in respect of a property in the chattel, or in respect of the possession which has been taken by the possessor, who is a wrongdoer. It seems to me, therefore, that this action is not maintainable. With respect to the case in Noy, I think that the illustration given of that is an accurate one. If there had been only an offer, and it had not been accepted, that would not have done. In such a case it would have required a release. But be that as it may be, "Waging his law" in the case cited, I am inclined to think does not mean that he might have that privilege, but that he could conscientiously so swear.

PIGOTT, B.—I have come to the same conclusion as the rest of the court. I do not think that any terms in the letters have come up to an intention to make a gift out and out of this sword to the brother. He gives him the charge of it, it is true, but he says, "You keep it in the family, should I not have a son to inherit it, which does not now seem very probable." It is clear that he intended to reserve his right to resume it. Looking at the surrounding circumstances, it seems to me only an intention to give the charge of the sword to the plaintiff. If he chose to resume it in one event, he certainly would have reserved the right, and, therefore, he would have a perfect title to it.

SMITH v. HOWARD.

Negligence—Fellow servant—Liability of master.

The plaintiff was employed by defendant to work at a steam saw. It was necessary that he should have an assistant in the performance of his work, and M., the defendant's foreman, engaged a boy for this purpose, who proved to be incompetent, and who, although plaintiff complained to M. of his incompetency, was retained in his service. It was M.'s duty as foreman to engage or discharge the person employed for the purpose of assisting plaintiff. An accident happened to the plaintiff while working at the steam saw, through the incompetence of the boy, and for the injuries occasioned thereby he brought an action against the defendant, his employer:

Held, that (in the absence of any evidence to show that M. was incompetent for the position of foreman) the plaintiff could not recover; it being M.'s duty to engage and discharge the boy, his retaining him after knowing of his incompetence, was merely an act of negligence by plaintiff's fellow-servant for which the defendant was not responsible.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for injuries sustained under the following circumstances. The defendant was plaintiff's employer. The plaintiff's duty was to work at a circular steam saw, and a boy was employed to assist him in his work. The accident occurred while he was thus employed through the incompetence of this boy for work of the nature which he had to perform. The boy was engaged by a man named McLaren, who was the defendant's foreman.

[Ex.]

SMITH v. HOWARD.

[Ex.]

It was McLaren's duty as foreman to engage or discharge the person employed for the purpose of assisting the plaintiff. It appeared that shortly before the accident the plaintiff had complained to McLaren, who had promised to provide him with more efficient assistance. The learned judge at the trial, upon proof of the above facts, nonsuited the plaintiff, but took the opinion of the jury as to the damages, and reserved leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for such damages.

A rule nisi had been obtained accordingly, against which Hawkins, Q. C. and Popham Pyke showed cause. These were stopped by the court, who called on Herschell and Nasmyth in support of the rule.—The fact that the plaintiff was himself acquainted with the incompetence of the boy, is no bar to his recovery. In the case of Holmes v. Clarke, 6 H. & N. 349, it was held that where machinery is required by Act of Parliament, to be protected so as to guard the persons working near from danger, and a servant complains of the want of protection, and continues to work in the mill near the machinery on the faith of a promise by the master that the required protection shall be afforded, the master will be responsible if any accident occurs to the servant in the interval from the want of such protection, unless the accident has been caused by the negligence of the servant himself. That decision was affirmed in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, 7 H. & N. 937. No sound distinction can be drawn between unfenced machinery and an incompetent workman in this respect, and therefore that case concludes the present. But, putting aside the question of contributory negligence, the question arises whether the master is liable in the present case. It is submitted that he is. The general principle no doubt is that a master is not liable to a servant for injuries resulting from the negligence of his fellow servant while engaged in the course of a common employment; but that rule is subject to the qualification that the master must not have been guilty of any personal negligence. So in Tarrant v. Webb, 25 L. J. 261, C.P., it is laid down that the master is bound to use due care in the selection of competent servants, and is liable for negligence in employing incompetent persons. So in the case of the Bartons-hill Coal Company v. Reid, 3 Macq. H. of L. 266, it is laid down, per Lord Cranworth, that servants must be supposed to have the risk of the service in their contemplation, when they voluntarily undertake it and agree to accept the stipulated remuneration; if therefore one of them suffers from the wrongful act or carelessness of another the master will not be responsible, but that this, however, supposes that the master has secured proper servants and proper machinery for the conduct of the work. So also in Bartons-hill Coal Company v. McGuire, 3 Macq. H. of L. 144, 300, it is laid down that when the injury caused by the negligence or unskilfulness of a servant is sustained not by the public but by another servant acting in the same employment, the master is not liable unless there be proof of general incompetency on the part of the servant causing the injury, or of insufficiency or defectiveness in the machinery furnished by the master. In the case of Wilson v. Merry, L. Rep. 1 Sc. & Ir. App. 827, the accident occurred through a defect in the system of ventilation in a mine caused by a platform which had been erected while the mine was being worked under the superintendence of one Nash, who was employed by the respondents for the purpose of sinking the pit, and making arrangements underground for working it. It was held that the master was bound to the servant in the event of his not personally superintending and directing the work, to select proper and competent persons to do so. The principle of all the cases is, therefore, that the master is bound to use care to employ competent workmen, and if he has done so he is not liable for damage arising through the negligence of one of their number to another. Here the boy was incompetent. It is true the master did not engage him, but it is contended that he cannot discharge himself of his duty to take due care to employ competent servants by delegating his functions in this respect. If he leaves the appointment of his servants to a foreman, he is liable if such foreman employs incompetent persons. Even if this were otherwise it is submitted that there was evidence to go to the jury of the incompetence and unfitness of McLaren the foreman. His appointment of so manifestly incompetent a person as the boy was, is evidence of considerable weight tending to show that he was not a fit person to have entrusted to him the whole superintendence of the work.

KELLY, C. B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The law is well established that a servant cannot maintain an action for injuries occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant in the course of a common employment. The plaintiff brings this action against the defendant by reason of a boy having been employed to act as his assistant, who was incompetent. That boy was employed by his fellow servant, and this employment of an incompetent person is the breach of duty of which the plaintiff complains. It is shown that the plaintiff made a complaint, not to defendant, but to McLaren, of the boy's incompetence, thus showing that he recognised him as the person whose business it was to engage and discharge the person from whose incompetence the accident arose. This is really then only a case of one servant sustaining injury from the negligence of another. It is said that there is a qualification of the ordinary rule to this extent, viz., that if the servant complains to the master of the incompetence of a fellow workman or the unfitness of a piece of machinery, and is induced to go on working by a promise that the ground of complaint shall be remedied, the master may then make himself liable if an accident arises from his neglect to comply with his undertaking. But here the only complaint made was to the foreman. I think the suggested qualification of the ordinary rule, if correct, only applies where the complaint is made to the master himself. It was urged that the real cause of action was for employing an incompetent foreman, but I do not think that there was any evidence of that; the only suggested cause of action of which there was any evidence was employing an incompetent boy. This was done by the plaintiff's fellow servant, and therefore the ordinary rule applies.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. But for the case in the Exchequer Chamber I should have thought that this was clearly a case of contributory negligence, and that when the plaintiff found that an incompetent person was employed he ought to have refused to go on until a competent person was provided. But after that case I do not wish to put my judgment on that ground, but on the other ground which has been mentioned by my Lord. I recollect the introduction of the doctrine of the non-liability of the master for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. I confess I hardly understand the exact principles on which it rests; it is certainly an exception to the general rule. The same sort of arguments were used against it that Mr. Herschell has used to-day, but it is now clear law that in the case of negligence of a person in the same employment the master is not liable, and this doctrine has been carried very far indeed. It has been put on the ground of a supposed implied contract; but that seems to me rather fanciful, I confess. There are certain exceptions to the rule, and it has been contended that it is the master's duty to employ competent persons to manage his business, and if he does not, he must be responsible for accidents arising from their incompetence; but it is not alleged in the declaration, or proved that this foreman was not perfectly competent; if so, his employing an incompetent boy was merely negligence, and for this the master is not responsible.

CHANNELL, B.—I think the verdict was right. The general rule is that the master is responsible for negligence of his servant in the scope of his employment. An exception has been engrafted on it in comparatively modern times. An exception has been again engrafted on the rule, viz., that the master is not relieved from responsibility when it is shown that he has been guilty of employing an incompetent person, or of other personal negligence; but of this there is really no evidence here. I do not throw any doubt on the case of Holmes v. Clark, but I do not think it clashes with our present decision.

Rule discharged.

ROBERTS v. THE BURY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

Contract to erect works—Renunciation—Justification—Due diligence.

The plaintiff contracted to erect certain works by a stipulated day, and it was agreed that the defendant's architect should have power, if he saw fit, to suspend the progress of the works, or to add to the works originally contemplated. Power was given to the defendant's architect to enlarge the time for completion, if by reason of any additions to the works originally contemplated, or for any other just cause arising with the defendants or their architect, or for certain other reasons, the plaintiff should have been, in the opinion of the architect, unduly delayed or impeded. Power was reserved to the defendants to determine the contract and enter on the works if the plaintiff did not, in the opinion of the defendant's architect, use due diligence and make due progress so as to complete the works by the day stipulated. The defendants and their architect made considerable delay in furnishing the plaintiff with the original plans, and they subsequently made considerable additions to them. The architect did not, however, enlarge the time for the completion of the works. Before the completion of the works, and before the day fixed in the contract for completion, the architect reported to the defendants that the plaintiff was not using due diligence and making sufficient progress, so as to complete the works by the time originally agreed upon. The defendants accordingly gave the plaintiff notice that they determined the contract, and they then entered and took possession of the works.

To an action for refusing to permit the plaintiff to complete the performance of his contract, and wrongfully preventing and discharging him from completing the same and wholly, wrongfully and finally renouncing the said contract, the defendants pleaded as a justification that the plaintiff was not in the opinion of the architect using due diligence and making due progress, so as to complete the works by the day stipulated:

Held (per Kelly, C. B., Channell, B., and Blackburn and Mellor J.J., dissentientibus, Pigott and Cleasby, B.B.), reversing the decision of the court below, that a replication alleging that the architect did not grant an extension of time, and that the alleged failure of the plaintiff to use due diligence and make due progress was caused by the delays and defaults of the defendants and their architect, was a good answer to the plea.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Court of Common Pleas.

The pleadings will be found fully set out in the report of the case in the court below (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 173).

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 5—KELLY, C.B.—I now proceed to deliver the judgment of my brother Channell and myself. In this case we should have been content to have simply adopted the judgment of my brother Blackburn, in which we in substance concur, and observing that, inasmuch as it is admitted on the record that the alleged failure by the plaintiff to use such diligence and to make such progress as to enable him to complete the work by the day specified, was caused by the failure of the defendants and their architect to supply plans and set out the land necessary to enable the plaintiff to commence the work, the rule of law applies, which exonerates one of two contracting parties from the performance of a contract when the performance of it is prevented and rendered impossible by the wrongful act of the other contracting party. But, inasmuch as the argument for the defendants and the judgment of the court below assume that, by the terms of the contract, the architect had power to determine whether the delay of the plaintiff to proceed with the works, so as to complete them by the day specified, had or had not been caused by the failure of the defendants to supply the necessary plans and set out the land; and, further, that that power was conferred upon him by the 24th clause, it becomes necessary to consider the real meaning and effect of that clause, which we think will be found to confer no such power, and to have no operation whatever upon the real question in this case. The record shows that the plaintiff contracted with the defendants to erect certain buildings upon their lands, the defendants setting out the land and supplying plans for that purpose; and that, before the plaintiff could commence the execution of these works, the defendants, under the 27th clause of the conditions appended to the contract, entered upon and took possession of the works, and refused to permit the plaintiff to proceed with the performance of his contract; and he alleges that he has thereby lost large profits, which he would have acquired by the execution of the works. The defendants pleaded a justification under the before-mentioned 27th clause, alleging that the plaintiff failed in the due performance of certain parts of the undertaking, and did not, in the opinion and according to the determination of the architect, exercise due diligence and make such due progress as is provided in the 27th clause, and as would have enabled the works to be effectually and efficiently completed at the time, and in the manner provided by the agreement; and thereupon the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff under the clause in question, that they determined the contract, and would proceed to carry on the works themselves. To this the plaintiff has replied that his alleged failure and non-exercise of due diligence and not making such due progress, were caused and occasioned by the delay and default of the defendants and their architect, in supplying plans and drawings, and in setting out the lands and defining the roads, and giving such particulars as would enable the contractor to commence the works. There are two other replications, which from the view we take of the case, become immaterial, and which need not be further noticed. To the above replication there is a demurrer and two rejoinders, to the effect that the non-exercise by the plaintiff of such due diligence, and the not making such due progress, "were not in the opinion and according to the determination of the architect, caused and occasioned by the acts and orders, or by the negligence or defaults of the defendants or their architect;" and further that the said opinion and determination of the architect were formed after due consideration of the facts and circumstances relating to such failure. And to these rejoinders there is also a demurrer. We are of opinion, looking to the whole record, that the single question which arises is, whether, by the terms of the contract, if a delay shall take place on the part of the plaintiff, which, in the opinion of the architect would disable the plaintiff to complete the works, by the 2nd Oct. 1865, but that delay is caused by a breach of contract on the part of the defendants in not supplying plans or setting out the land upon which the buildings are to be erected, the architect has power to determine that the delay was not so caused by the defendants, and so, whatever may be the truth of the case, enable the defendants to put an end to the contract, and enter and take possession of the plaintiff's materials, under the 27th clause. If the contract has conferred such a power upon him, it may be that the rejoinders sufficiently allege that he has exercised it, and determined against the plaintiff. But if he has no such power, it seems to us beyond all doubt that the well-established rule of law, contended for by the plaintiff, applies to this case, viz., that the plaintiff's breach of contract is excused by reason of its having been caused by the defendants' breach of contract, and that the defendants cannot therefore acquire, by means of their own wrongful act or default, the right to enforce the provisions of the 27th clause. The contract provides that, if the plaintiff shall not, in the opinion of the architect, make due progress, the defendants may determine the contract; and the defendants allege that the plaintiff did not, in the opinion of the architect, make such progress. The plaintiff replies that he was prevented from making such progress by the breach of contract of the defendants. Thus, the contract prima facie entitling the defendants to put an end to it, the law says, that the defendants having themselves prevented the plaintiff from making such progress, the defendants shall not take advantage of their own wrong, and put an end to the contract under the 27th clause. Now the replication directly avers that the defendants have prevented the plaintiff from making the required progress. And this the defendants do not deny, but they rejoin, that the defendants have not, in the opinion and according to the determination of the architect, prevented the plaintiff from making due progress. This raises the question, whether the effect of the contract is to confer a power upon the architect to determine, and to bind the plaintiff by his determination, that the defendants have not by their own wrongful act or default prevented the plaintiff from proceeding with the works, though, in truth and in fact they have so prevented him. Now, in considering this question, we agree that we are not to assume a jurisdiction which we do not possess, to mitigate the hardship upon contractors of clauses, however oppressive, which are sometimes and indeed most commonly introduced into agreements of this nature; but we must take care also not to add to their severity, and to the injustice which they are often the means of inflicting upon a contractor, by imagining stipulations which are not to be found in the contract, and which the parties have never entered into or contemplated. Where then is this power to be found? The contract is wholly silent on the point. The 27th clause gives the architect the power to determine whether the plaintiff has used due diligence and made due progress, but not whether his failure to do so has been caused by the wrongful act or default of the defendants. It must therefore be by the 24th clause, if at all, that the power is conferred. Now, when we look to this clause, we find that it is simply this—if, from any one of a number of causes, the plaintiff shall, in the opinion of the architect, have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of his contract, the architect may grant an extension of time for its completion. It is remarkable that it is nowhere averred, that he was even applied to by either party for an extension, or took into consideration, of his own accord or otherwise, whether he should grant an extension. But, under whatever circumstances it may be imagined that he proceeded to act upon the clause, the words of it are plain and clear. If he had been of opinion that the plaintiff had been unduly delayed, he might have granted an extension; but then the contract must have continued in force, the plaintiff must have proceeded with the works, and the defendants could have had no power to put an end to the contract. If, on the other hand, the architect had not been of opinion that the plaintiff had been unduly delayed, the conditions had not been performed, the event had not occurred, upon which alone he had power to grant an extension, or do any other act, he would have been functus officio, the clause would have had no operation, and he had no power to do anything at all. The clause contains no provision as to what may be done or not done, or as to any consequence resulting from the architect not being of opinion that the plaintiff had been unduly delayed, which state of things might have existed without the architect having ever taken the question into consideration at all. Still less does it provide for any consequences to follow from the architect having formed an opinion that the plaintiff had not been unduly delayed, and it is almost unnecessary to add that a power which is in effect to inflict a heavy penalty upon one of two contracting parties, must be created in clear and unambiguous terms, or must arise by necessary implication. The plaintiff, after having expressly averred in his replication that his alleged default had been caused by the wrongful acts or defaults of the defendants themselves, and this averment not having been traversed by the defendants, but the rejoinders merely alleging that the plaintiff's default had not, according to the determination of the architect, been caused by the defendants' wrongful act or default, we are of opinion that the architect, having no power under the contract to bind the plaintiff by any such determination, the rejoinders are no answer to the replication, and that the rule of law relied upon by the plaintiff is applicable to this case; that the defendants cannot take advantage of their own wrong, and that they had consequently no power to determine the contract under the 27th clause. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to maintain this action, and the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas must be reversed.

BLACKBURN, J. delivered the judgment of himself and Mellor, J.—The questions in this case

ROBERTS v. THE BURY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

are raised by demurrers to the second, third, and fourth replications to the third plea, and to the second and third rejoinders to the second replication to the third plea. The Court of Common Pleas has given judgment that all three replications are bad in substance, and that both the rejoinders are good in substance. I agree with them in thinking that the third and fourth replication are bad in substance, but I have come to the conclusion that the second replication is good in substance, and the two rejoinders to it bad in substance, and consequently that the judgment of the court below ought so far to be reversed. The question depends entirely on the true construction of the contract which is set out in the declaration. By that contract, the plaintiff, a contractor, agreed to execute certain works described in a specification, for the sum of 9767*l.*, according to the terms and conditions in the specification contained. Such of the conditions as are material, are set out in the declaration. The 36th is that if the works are let in one contract, the whole is to be completed on or before the 2nd Oct. 1868. The 4th condition gives power to the architect (employed by the commissioners), to alter the specification and plans, and to order any further works not contemplated by the specification and plans. It was of course contemplated by the parties that this power would be exercised in a reasonable manner; but it is quite unlimited in its terms, so that it is in the power of the architect under the contract, to increase the quantity of the works without limit. The contractor, if he so pleased, might bind himself to execute whatever the architect might require before the 2nd Oct. 1868; but unless the intention so to bind himself appears, the implied contract would be that he should have a further reasonable time to execute such additional works as might be required. No question, however, is now raised as to any extra works ordered; and it is, therefore, unnecessary to express any opinion as to what the contract is as to these. The contractor, also, from the nature of the work, could not begin his work until the commissioners and their architects had supplied plans, and set out the land, and given the necessary particulars; and, therefore, in the absence of any express stipulation on the subject, there would be implied a contract on the part of the commissioners to do their part within a reasonable time; and if they broke that implied contract the contractor would have a cause of action against them for any damages he might sustain, and the commissioners would be precluded from taking advantage of any delay occasioned by their own breach of contract; for it is a principle very well established at common law that no person can take advantage of the non-fulfilment of a condition the performance of which has been hindered by himself (Com. Dig. "Condition" L.), and also that he cannot sue for a breach of contract occasioned by his own breach of contract; so that any damages he would otherwise have been entitled to for the breach of the contract to him would immediately be recoverable back as damages arising from his own breach of contract. These principles have been applied to contracts very analogous to the present in the cases of Holme v. Guppy, 3 M. & W. 387; Russell v. Da Bandeira, 13 C. B., N. S., 149; and Westwood v. The Secretary of State for India, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 736, and 1 New Rep. 262, which were cited by Mr. Manisty on the argument in the court below, and also before us; and I do not understand the Court of Common Pleas to question the principles or the authority of these decisions. But it is obvious that, under a contract containing such stipulations, it would be very unlikely that the stipulation requiring the works to be completed by a particular day should be effectual, and in prudence the parties might make stipulations to fix and ascertain the additional time to be allowed, without leaving it open to a jury to determine what is reasonable. The court below have thought that the parties in this case have agreed to make the architect the sole and exclusive judge of what additional time should be allowed in case the contractor was delayed either by having additional works put upon him under the contract, or in consequence of breaches of contract on the part of the commissioners; and also have made him, and him alone, the judge to determine whether there has been any breach of contract on the part of the commissioners. We agree, that, if the parties have so contracted, the court cannot inquire whether this is a prudent engagement on the part of the contractors, but we think that, where the effect of giving such a construction to the contract would apparently be to put one party completely at the mercy of the other, we ought not to give that construction to the contract unless the intention is pretty clearly expressed. It is not to be inferred that one party meant to bind himself so very stringently unless it is so stated, and the commissioners ought to have taken care to select words which the contractor could not misapprehend, if such was the object. In the present case, the portion of the contract which is relied on as expressing such an intention is the 24th condition which is as follows:—"Provided always that if by reason of any additions to or enlargements of the works (which additions or enlargements the said architect is hereby authorised to make), or for any other just cause arising with the said burial board, with the said architect or his clerk, assistant, or inspector, or in consequence of any unusual inclemency of weather, or for want or for alleged want or deficiency of any orders, drawings or directions, or by reason of any difficulties, impediments, obstructions, oppositions, doubts, disputes, or differences, whatsoever and howsoever occasioned, the contractor shall, in the opinion of the architect, have been unduly delayed or impeded in the completion of his contract, it shall be lawful for the said architect to grant from time to time by writing under his hand such extension of time, and to assign such other day or days for completion as to him may seem reasonable without thereby prejudicing, or in any manner affecting the validity of the contract or the sufficiency in the tender, and any and every such extension of time shall be deemed to be in full compensation, and satisfaction for or in respect of any and every actual and probable loss or injury sustained or sustainable by the said contractor in the premises, and shall in like manner exonerate him from any claim or demand on the part of the said burial board, for or in respect of the delay occasioned by the cause or causes in respect of which any and every such extension of time shall have been made, but not further or otherwise, or for or in respect of any delay contained beyond the time mentioned in such writing or writings respectively." It is to be observed that in the recital with which this condition begins, no distinction is made between delays arising from additions which are authorised by the contract, delays arising from unusual inclemency of the weather (a risk which the contractor has already taken on himself, though it might give rise to a claim in misericordiam), and delays arising from breaches of contract or alleged breaches of contract on the part of the commissioners for which the contractor would have a right to recover damages. In either case, it is provided that it shall be lawful for the architect to grant an extension of time; but it is neither said that the architect must give it, which, in case the delay was from the inclemency of the weather, would not be reasonable, nor that the contractor must accept whatever extension of time the architect is pleased to give in full satisfaction of his claim for damages, which, if the delay arising from the fault of the commissioners was great, and the damages consequently heavy, might be very unreasonable. It is true that if both parties had confidence in the architect they might trust him with the power to bind both parties; but I cannot find any intention expressed to bind the contractor to abide by his decision. It seems to me that the meaning of the condition is, that the architect shall have authority to bind the commissioners by granting an extension of time, and that if he does so bind them and the contractor accepts it, it shall be taken as full compensation for any damages sustained. If more was intended, which however I cannot think, it seems to me clear that it has not been expressed. At all events there is nothing stipulating that the contractor shall have no remedy for any breach of contract on the part of the commissioners, where the architect has not thought fit to extend the time. The court below have ascribed to the architect a more extensive authority than, as it appears to me, they were warranted in doing. The error into which they appear to have fallen is to be found in the statement of Willes, J. in his judgment, of the effect of the matters stated in the replication in question, in which he is reported to have said that they were "in truth matters which the architect ought to have taken into his consideration in determining whether there should be an extension of the time, and therefore also in determining whether the plaintiff used due diligence." This appears to us to be founded on a misconception of the effect of the 24th clause of the contract for the reasons before stated. If I am right as to the true construction of the contract, the decision of the demurrers follows clearly. The second replication confessed that, as is alleged in the third plea, there was such delay; that, in the opinion of the architect, the works could not be completed in the stipulated time, so that under the 27th condition the defendants were prima facie entitled to put an end to the contract, but it avoids this by averring that this delay was occasioned by the defendants' own breaches of contract, and consequently that, on the principle before stated, the defendants cannot take the advantage of the delay thus occasioned; and unless the contract bears the construction put upon it by the court below this is a good avoidance. The two rejoinders to this replication would be good if the parties had agreed that the architect should be the sole judge whether there had been a breach of contract on the part of the commissioners occasioning delay; but if we are right in the construction of the contract, there is nothing to this effect in it, and consequently these two rejoinders are bad. The third and fourth replications are based on the supposition that there is a stipulation in the contract that the architect should grant further time when it is reasonable, or, at least, when he thinks it reasonable, even though the delay may have been occasioned by the inclemency of the weather; but I find no such stipulation in the contract, and consequently agree with the court below in thinking those two replications bad.

ROBERTS v. THE BURY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

CLEASBY, B. delivered the opinion of Pigott, B. and himself.—This is an action to recover damages which the plaintiff alleges he has sustained by reason of the defendants preventing him from completing a contract which he had entered into with them for erecting certain boundary walls and other buildings. The declaration, after setting out the contract, alleged that the plaintiff had performed all conditions to entitle him to complete the contract, but that the defendants wrongfully prevented the plaintiff from completing the same, and renounced the contract on their part. The defendants by their third plea justify having done so under a clause in the specification (which forms part of the contract); by which they are entitled to determine the contract by notice in writing, and to enter and take possession of the plant, &c., in case the plaintiff shall not in the opinion and according to the determination of the architect, exercise due diligence and make such progress as will enable the works to be completed efficiently and effectually within the time agreed. The plea then alleges that, according to the determination of the architect, the plaintiff did not exercise due diligence and make such due progress, and, after setting out the notice in writing, justifies the act complained of. To this plea there are several replications. The second replication alleges that the architect had not granted any extension of time for the completion of the contract, and that the alleged failure of the plaintiff to make due progress was caused and occasioned by the delay and default of the defendants and their architect in supplying plans and drawings, and in setting out the lands and in defining the roads, and in giving instructions so as to enable the plaintiff to commence the works, and not otherwise. There is a demurrer to this replication, upon which the principal question arises: but there are also two rejoinders to it which are also demurred to. The effect of both is, that, according to the opinion and determination of the architect, the undue delay of the plaintiff was not caused by the acts or defaults of the defendants. The question which arises upon the pleadings is, whether it is a good answer to a plea setting up the authority of the defendants to put an end to the contract upon the determination of the architect that the plaintiff is not exercising due diligence and making such progress as will enable the works to be completed efficiently by the time agreed, to reply that the defendants and their architect had themselves been guilty of delay on their part in providing plans and setting out the ground, and had so caused the delay and want of progress on the part of the plaintiff. This depends upon the proper construction of the contract; and, to arrive at that, we must consider what the subject-matter of the contract is, and what are its terms. The defendants are a public body, the Bury Improvement Commissioners; and, being also a burial board, were about to inclose a cemetery with boundary walls, and to erect chapels and other buildings; and the plaintiff, being a builder entered into the contract stated in the declaration, which bears date the 2nd Oct. 1866, by which he agreed to execute the works for the sum of 9767*l.* within the time and according to the plan and in the manner stated in the specification. The important clauses of the specification form part of the declaration, and from them it appears that the works were to be executed according to certain plans and drawings which were annexed to the specification, that additions and omissions were not to annul the contract, but that they should be added to or deducted from the contract price by the architect; and by clause 4 the architect is to be at liberty to give fresh drawings, and so to vary the mode in which the work is to be done, and also to order further works not comprised in the contract to be executed, and works comprised in it to be omitted; and the plaintiff was to furnish, on signing the contract, a schedule of prices for the purpose of estimating the value of additions and deductions. There is by clause 24 a provision enabling the architect from time to time, for certain specified causes, by writing under his hand, to extend the time for completing the works. This clause will be afterwards more particularly adverted to. The 27th clause is the important one upon which the question in this case turns. It is obvious, from the nature of the works contemplated by the contract, that it was essential that the defendant should have some means of insuring the completion of the works at or about the time agreed. It would not have been sufficient for them to have an action for the delay, or even an action for agreed penalties for delay; what they required was the specific performance of the thing itself; otherwise, the works might be delayed indefinitely, and no legal redress would be adequate. In order to insure this, the 27th clause is inserted, as is not unusual in works of a public nature. By that clause the defendants are authorised in certain events to put an end to the contract by notice in writing, and to enter upon and take possession of the works and materials upon the ground, and plant, and to use or sell them as their own property. In connection with this it is proper to bear in mind that by the 28th clause provision is made for the completion of the works by the defendants themselves, and for the payment to the plaintiff for all work actually done when possession is taken, as well as for the value of the materials, implements, and tools provided by the contractor and taken to by the burial board; so that the 27th clause, for determining the contract, the necessity for which we have pointed out, is thus deprived of its apparently penal character. The events under which the defendants are entitled to put an end to the contract are various—the bankruptcy of the plaintiff, and events of that nature; and then follow the words which give rise to the present question, viz., in case “the contractor shall not, in the opinion of and according to the determination of the architect, exercise due diligence and make such due progress as would enable the works to be effectually and efficiently completed at the time and in the manner aforesaid.” The object of wording the clause in this way, and making the determination of the architect the test, is obvious. The putting an end to the contract, and seizing the property of the contractor, is an act involving serious consequences, as this case shows; and therefore it is essential to ascertain beforehand the existence of the state of things upon which the right depends. If the right to enter depended only upon the default of the plaintiff, the plaintiff would probably deny the default, and there would be a resistance and conflict when the entry was made; and therefore provision is made for placing this matter upon the footing of an ascertained fact: and the determination of the architect that the contractor is not making due progress is to entitle the defendants to take possession and complete the works themselves. The result of this consideration of the contract is to satisfy us that this term is an essential part of the contract as long as the contract subsists, and is being acted on, and that it cannot under any circumstances be struck out of it. To strike it out would be making a new and different contract; and if it remains a part of the contract, it follows that it is lawful to act upon it. That being so, there is no doubt—as appears, indeed, by the declaration—that the plaintiff was executing the works under the contract as originally entered into; it was subject to this right of the defendants, and the plea shows that the determination of the architect had been given, and due notice of it in writing; and therefore the act complained of is well justified. The replication is insufficient, because it does not show that this clause was not in operation, and could not be legally acted on. It alleges in substance that there had been some default in the defendants and in the architect in providing plans, defining roads, &c., and that this default had caused the plaintiff to be behind. It ought not to be lost sight of that the defaults specified are not wrongful acts of the defendants themselves; such, for instance, as keeping the plaintiff out of the possession of the land; but they are more properly neglects of duty on the part of the architect, as will be more particularly pointed out hereafter. This might have been a good replication, if the plea had been founded on the actual neglect and delay of the plaintiff; but the plea is equally good, whether there had or had not been actual neglect and delay on the part of the plaintiff—the parties having agreed that the determination of the architect shall settle that matter, so as to bar the inquiry into the actual fact. It would clearly be no answer to this plea to allege that there had in fact been no want of due diligence or of making due progress. A very little consideration will show how difficult, almost impossible, it would be for a judge and jury to master a multitude of plans and drawings and voluminous specifications so as to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, or even to investigate such a matter. The difficulty would only increase the expense of the attempt, which would nevertheless be soon given up. The architect, who prepared the plans and specifications, and who knows what was to be done in the first instance, what had been done, and what remained to be done, and who had watched throughout the progress of the works, and been in constant communication with the builder, is the only person capable of determining such a matter; and the parties have therefore agreed to be bound by his determination. If the plea had been founded upon the actual neglect and delay of the plaintiff, so as to make that a fact to be tried by the jury, as the claims for penalties would have been under the 29th clause, then the case of Holme v. Guppy, 3 M. & W. 387, and other authorities to the same effect referred to in the argument, which indeed only apply a maxim of the common law, would have applied. The plaintiff might have answered, “You caused this by your own default;” and the whole matter must have gone to the jury. But you cannot say that the determination of the architect that the plaintiff was not proceeding so as to complete the works effectually and efficiently, was caused by the default of the defendants; and the replication is not so shaped as to do so, and therefore that determination remains unanswered. If in fact the defendants had refused to perform any conditions precedent to the plaintiff’s proceeding with the contract, such, for instance, as giving possession of the ground, the plaintiff would have been entitled to throw up the contract and to recover his damages; but if he afterwards proceeds with it, he waives this so far as it is a condition precedent, and, even in that case, which, as will appear hereafter, is very different from the present, he must proceed upon the whole contract, retaining of course any right of action to recover damages, if there has been a breach of the contract on the part of the defendants. It must be borne in mind that this is not a case of cross money claims. What the defendants claim is, the right to have the works completed specifically; and therefore the conclusion cannot be influenced by the consideration of avoiding circuity of action. The replication now under consideration also alleges that the architect also granted no extension of time for the completion of the contract. It appears to us, however, that the reasons above given are equally applicable. The question is whether, as the contract proceeded, the 27th clause, I mean that part which we are now considering, was in operation. By the contract, the works are all to be completed by the 2nd Oct. 1868; but the architect may extend the time for specific reasons. If he does not, it can hardly be contended that the builder could throw the contract up; and, if he does not throw it up, but proceeds with it, the contract must remain, and with it the 27th clause. The plaintiff by his declaration relies upon the entire original contract as the foundation of his claim. It certainly does not appear to us that the refusal to extend the time could be regarded as having the effect of striking out of the contract either the time within which the contract was to be completed, or that part of the 27th clause which we are considering. Might it not be said with equal force that, if there was an insufficient extension of the time, the same consequences would follow? If, for instance, it was said that the plaintiff was delayed two months, and the architect only extended the time one month, it could hardly be said that if a jury thought there had not been a sufficient extension of time, the defendants were under such an agreement to lose the whole benefit of this clause, which enables them to complete the works in time, if the plaintiff does not. But, further, when the matter is looked into, the alleged defaults are in reality not defaults of the defendants themselves, but of the architect. And, though the replication speaks of the defaults of the defendants and the architect, yet, if the matters complained of come within the province of the architect, and not of the defendants, the adding the word "defendants" in the replication can make no difference. The alleged defaults consist of not providing plans and drawings, not laying out the ground, not defining roads, and not giving instructions. These were matters to be done by the architect, and not by the defendants. The builder was under no obligation to execute plans and drawings provided by the defendants, or to attend to their instructions. From the time when the contract was executed, the plaintiff having of course licence and permission to go upon the land for all the necessary purposes, the defendants themselves had nothing more to do except to pay the regular instalments upon the certificates of the architect. There were lodges and several other buildings to be executed; and no doubt it was the duty of the architect to lay out the ground where each building was to be placed, and also to give drawings showing the manner in which the various parts of the work were to be done, and, as the builder had some work to do in connection with the roads, to define the lines of the roads and give all necessary instructions. These matters were not all to be done at the same moment, but some at first and others as they were respectively wanted, and must be matters, as we cannot help thinking, more or less in the discretion of the arbitrator as to the time when the several works are to be proceeded with. In carrying into effect a work of magnitude like this, some irregularities would probably occur. The architect complains of the want of progress, and the builder of the want of instructions and plans. But can the common law maxim that a man shall not take advantage of his own wrong, or complain of a breach of contract which he has himself caused, be applied to the dilatoriness of the architect who is intrusted by the agreement of both parties with a complete discretion as to all matters connected with the contract? The 3rd clause in effect gives him an unlimited discretion as to allowance for extras. He may, among other things, by the 4th clause vary the instructions as to the manner of executing the work and order any additions, being himself the judge whether any extension of time under clause 24 shall be given. He may by the 22nd clause, without any recompense, claim, or demand, stop the works for such time as he thinks proper, and impose upon the builder the expense of preserving the work during the interval and making good any damage; and it is entirely in his discretion whether he will grant any extension of time under the 24th clause or not. This clause was, no doubt, chiefly intended to provide for the case of a frost making it injurious to proceed with the work while it lasted; but still it leaves this, which might cause a greater or less delay, entirely in the discretion of the architect. And, finally, not to mention other matters, he is by the 34th clause made sole and final judge of all disputes which can arise between the builder and the employers; and, in order to prevent the possibility of litigation, it is agreed that he is not to be required to answer or explain any matter connected with any certificate or award, or to give reasons or grounds for any determination. Having regard to the powers given to him, and the obvious object of making his determination binding, it does not appear to me to be reasonable to make the validity of his determination depend upon the opinion of a jury whether he has himself been guilty of undue delay. It would, in effect, be making a new contract, by adding a proviso or condition; for the 27th clause provides that the architect himself shall not have been guilty of delay in providing plans, &c.; and such a proviso would be a contradiction to the whole spirit of the contract, which is to make the determination of the architect conclusive and not open to question. If the view now taken of the effect of the replication be correct, and the default set up is that of the architect, whose conduct the defendants cannot control, Holme v. Guppy (sup.), and the other cases referred to do not apply, and the objection made to the validity of the architect's determination altogether fails. There is another distinct ground upon which the second replication, which we are considering, is defective. The determination of the architect, upon which the plea is founded, is not a determination only as to the time in which the works will be completed, but as to the manner—as to their being efficiently and effectually completed; and, as I have before pointed out, the architect is not to give his reasons or grounds for any determination. It is quite consistent with the determination of the architect, as set forth, that though, very properly in the words of the 27th clause, it was really founded upon this, that, though the works could be completed by the time, they would be done so badly as to require to be pulled down. The replication gives the go-by to this, and assumes that the determination is only as to the time: it then gives what I have submitted is an imperfect answer as to the time, but is no answer at all to the other matter involved in the determination; for, how could it possibly be said that the delay of the architect in providing plans, &c., caused the works not to be completed efficiently and effectually? For the above reasons we think the third plea is good, and the second replication to it bad, and it is unnecessary to consider the rejoinders. But we by no means say that, if the second replication to the third plea could be read in any way as a prima facie answer to it, the rejoinders would not be good answers to the replication. The third rejoinder in reality only states what ought to be assumed to be the case, viz., that the determination of the architect was formed upon a bona fide consideration of all the circumstances. It is a mistake to suppose that, because the plaintiff was not in fact making the requisite progress, the architect, as a matter of course, was bound to give his determination so as to entitle the defendants to enter. Before giving out his determination, he ought, being final judge in the matter, to consider all the circumstances connected with the defective progress; and it appears by the rejoinder that he did. With regard to the third and fourth replications to the second plea, we are of opinion that they are clearly bad. They are not founded upon any default of the defendants, but upon some of the events mentioned in the 24th clause as having happened so as to make it the opinion of the architect that the plaintiff had been unduly delayed, and so authorise him to extend the time; and it then alleges that the architect had not extended the time. This determination of the architect not to extend the time though he had authority to do so, cannot make the 27th clause

ROBERTS v. THE BURY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

[EX. CH.]

ROBERTS v. THE BURY IMPROVEMENT COMMISSIONERS.

REG. v. JOHN STONE THOMAS.

Misdemeanor under the Debtors' Act 1869—32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 11, sub-sect. 15—Evidence—Costs.

By the Debtors' Act 1869, s. 11, it is enacted that "Any person adjudged bankrupt . . . shall . . . be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be liable to be imprisoned for any time not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour, if (sub-sects 15) within four months next before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, or the commencement of the liquidation, he, being a trader, pawns, pledges, or disposes of otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, any property which he has obtained on credit and has not paid for, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud."

A grocer obtained goods of his trade upon credit. Soon after receiving them and before they were paid for, he executed a bill of sale in favour of his sister who lived with him. This bill of sale, which was given in consideration of a debt owing from him to his sister, passed away all his stock-in-trade and effects whatsoever, including the above mentioned unpaid-for goods.

Having been made bankrupt, he was indicted for misdemeanor under the foregoing section of the Debtors' Act 1869.

Held, that the production of the adjudication under the seal of the court was sufficient evidence of the bankruptcy. That disposing of the goods by bill of sale was not disposing of them in the "ordinary way of trade;" and therefore that as property which the prisoner had obtained on credit, and had not paid for, had passed by the bill of sale, he came within the section, unless he had no intent to defraud. But that assigning the whole of his property to one creditor, reserving nothing for the others, showed an intent to defraud.

Where the prosecution of a bankrupt under the Debtors' Act 1869 is not ordered by any court, the judge at the trial has no power to allow the costs of the prosecution.

The prisoner was indicted for misdemeanour, under 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62 (The Debtors' Act 1869), ss. 11 and 18.

The indictment alleged that on the 28th Feb. 1870, a petition in bankruptcy was presented, and on the 9th March 1870, John Stone Thomas (the prisoner) was adjudicated a bankrupt in due form of law.

It contained six counts. The first and second counts were framed upon sub-sect. 14 of sect. 11 of The Debtors' Act 1869.

The third count, framed upon sub-sect. 15 of sect. 11, charged that the said John Stone Thomas, within four months next before the presentation of such petition, to wit, on the 19th Feb. in the year aforesaid, being then a trader, unlawfully did dispose of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade, to wit, by making and executing a certain bill of sale to one Anne Elizabeth Thomas, certain property which he the said John Stone Thomas had obtained on credit, to wit, one bag of Indian meal, and one bag of oatmeal, obtained on credit from William Vernon, and two bags of sharps obtained on credit from Thomas Walker and Henry Clarke, and that the said John Stone Thomas, at the time of disposing of the said last-mentioned property respectively, had not, and yet hath not, paid for the same or any part thereof. Against, &c.

The fourth and fifth counts were framed upon sub-sect. 1 of sect. 13, and the sixth count upon sub-sect. 2 of sect. 13.

Bosanquet for the prosecution.

Motteram for the defence.

The accused was a grocer at Cheadle. His sister, Miss Anne Elizabeth Thomas, lived with him, and on the 19th Feb. 1870, he executed in her favour a bill of sale.

*By this instrument—which commenced with a recital to the effect that the accused was indebted to Miss Thomas in the sum of 430*l.* moneys lent—he assigned to her all his stock-in-trade, fixtures, furniture, book debts, and effects whatsoever, in consideration of the sum of 5*l.

On the 21st Feb. he gave directions that all the property should be sold, and bills were posted in Cheadle on the night of the 23rd Feb., stating that the sale by auction would take place on the 25th, 26th, and 28th Feb.

On the 22nd Feb. Vernon, a creditor, went to the shop of the accused, found the shutters up and the door fastened, and could not gain admission.

On the 24th Feb. a warrant was issued for the apprehension of the accused, but he had absconded, and the officer was unable to execute it for some time. Miss Thomas remained on the premises in possession.

For the prosecution Chas. H. Adams, clerk to the registrar of the County Court at Stoke-upon-Trent was called, and produced the petition in bankruptcy by Messrs. Walker and Clarke against the accused, dated 28th Feb. 1870, and the adjudication dated the 9th March 1870.

*William Vernon, miller, said he was a creditor of the accused, who owed him 53*l.* 3*s.* That sum was owing on the 19th Feb. The last goods he sent in consisted of a bag of beans, ordered by the accused on the 15th Feb. and delivered to him on the 16th. They were sent in on a month's credit. Five bags of flour and three of bran were also ordered in addition to the beans, but were not delivered. On the 22nd he went to the shop; it was closed, the shutters up, and the door fastened; he could not gain admission. On the 24th he saw posters and handbills (produced) on the walls announcing a sale of the whole of the furniture, stock-in-trade, fixtures, and all other effects on the premises of Mr. Thomas, grocer, Cheadle, on the 25th, 26th, and 28th Feb. under a bill of sale. On the 25th witness went to the premises, and there saw two of his sacks containing oatmeal and Indian meal. These sacks of meal were mentioned in the sale catalogue.*

*Henry Clarke, of the firm of Walker and Clarke, creditors to the amount of 106*l.* 11*s.* 6*d.*, for goods sold and delivered up to the 19th Feb. to the accused said that they had their last order for ten bags of flour, &c., on the 11th Feb. but only partially executed it; that was the largest order they had received from the accused. Witness also stated that on viewing the lots prepared for sale he found amongst them two bags of sharps which he had delivered and for which his firm had not been paid. James Nixon said 34*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* was due to him for* goods sold and delivered to the accused up to the 19th Feb.

William Keates, printer, said that he got out the posters announcing the sale by the direction of the auctioneer and the accused.

The bill sticker said he was told by the auctioneer not to post the bills in Cheadle until after dark.

The bill of sale was put in and read.

A police officer proved that he received a warrant on the 24th Feb., and searched for the prisoner, but could not find him, but apprehended him on the 28th Feb.

At the close of the case for the prosecution,

Motteram submitted that the bankruptcy of the prisoner had not been proved, the counsel for the prosecution having merely put in the adjudication under the seal of the court. Sect. 10 of the Bankruptcy Act 1869 enacts that "a copy of an order of the court adjudging the debtor to be a bankrupt shall be published in the London Gazette, and be advertised locally in such manner (if any) as may be prescribed, and the date of such order shall be the date of the adjudication for the purposes of this Act, and the production of a copy of the Gazette containing such order as aforesaid shall be conclusive evidence in all legal proceedings of the debtor having been duly adjudged a bankrupt and of the date of the adjudication."

LUSH, J.—The production of the London Gazette is merely a compendious mode of proving the bankruptcy, but if the London Gazette is not produced, the bankruptcy may be proved aliunde. Here the prosecutor need not prove the acts of bankruptcy. Sect. 11 of the Debtors' Act 1869 commences thus: "any person adjudged a bankrupt." The provision as to the Gazette is merely cumulative, and the bankruptcy may be proved by the Gazette, or otherwise.

Motteram.—Then I would ask your Lordship if there is any case to go to the jury?

LUSH, J.—Yes, I think so. The prisoner having been in possession of considerable stock-in-trade, passed it all over to his sister.

Motteram, in addressing the jury for the defence, urged upon them that as the bill of sale had been given in pursuance of a long antecedent promise to execute it when requested, and was really in consideration of the advance of 430*l.*, the making of it was not fraudulent, and the prisoner could not be convicted under sub-section 15 of sect. 11; moreover, by far the larger portion of the goods obtained upon credit had been actually sold to different customers.

LUSH, J.—If those "sharps" mentioned in the third count of the indictment, and seen on the premises amongst the lots prepared for sale, formed part of goods not paid for, then the case falls within sub-sect. 15 of sect. 11, which declares it to be a misdemeanor if anyone, "being a trader, pawns, pledges, or disposes of otherwise than in the ordinary way of his trade any property which he has obtained on credit and has not paid for, unless the jury is satisfied that he had no intent to defraud." You cannot say that disposing of stock-in-trade by a bill of sale is disposing of it in the "ordinary way of trade;" that must be by selling over the counter.

Motteram.—It must follow, then, that no such security as a bill of sale can be safely given by a trader lest it may chance to include some articles not paid for. Assume the bill of sale to be bona fide and good, and that the creditor putting it in force takes away a portion of the goods delivered within a reasonable time of credit, but before they are paid for, if your Lordship thinks that that would be a disposing of them not in the ordinary way of trade, then I have no case.

LUSH, J.—I am clear upon that point.

Motteram.—But the actual giving of the bill of sale must be taken to relate back to the promise to make it.

LUSH, J.—I don't think that signifies. He had no business to promise. The Act says that you shall not get rid of, otherwise than in the ordinary way of your trade, any property you have not paid for. [The learned judge added that as this was the first question which had arisen upon the construction of the section, he would take the opinion of Martin, B. upon it, and on returning into court after so doing, said:] My brother Martin has no doubt in this matter, that disposing by bill of sale is not disposing in the ordinary way of trade, and this being property which the prisoner had obtained on credit, and had not paid for, and which passed by the bill of sale, he is within the Act, unless he had no intention to defraud. Now if he passed away every stick of his property, book debts and all, how can it be said that the bill of sale was not made with intent to defraud? To defraud a creditor is to take away the means of paying him, and surely if all the property is given to one creditor, reserving nothing to the others, those others are defrauded.

Motteram.—If the attorney drawing the bill of sale had excluded these things that came in after the 17th Feb., the prisoner would not have been within this clause.

LUSH, J.—No; not within this clause. [To the jury.] Upon the evidence already given you have no alternative but to find the prisoner guilty. This is a new statute which makes it criminal to defraud creditors. [His Lordship read sub-sect. 15 of sect. 11.] It cannot be said that to give away the whole of one's property by a bill of sale is disposing of it in an ordinary way of trade. Now, part of these things—viz., two bags of "sharps" had not been paid for and are within the very terms of the Act. Are you satisfied that there was no intention to defraud? This bill of sale conveyed away everything the prisoner had; how can you say he had no intent to defraud? If he had such intent he is guilty of a misdemeanor within the Act of Parliament, and you will find him guilty on the third count of the indictment.

Verdict guilty. Sentence, fourteen days' imprisonment.

Bosanquet asked that the costs of the prosecution might be allowed, but as the prosecution had not been "ordered by any court" within the terms of sect. 17, the learned judge said he had no power to allow them, either under that section or by the general Act.

Administration—Trusts—Attorney.

Where there is an estate the court will not grant administration to a person who has no interest, even though the legatees desire it.

The executor being dead, the persons entitled to administration were four young ladies. There being many trusts to discharge, they were anxious that the administration should be granted to their attorney; but the court declined to make the grant.

H. Bullar died leaving a will duly executed, by which he appointed his four sisters his universal legatees. The executor was dead, and

The Solicitor-General (Sir J. D. Coleridge) now moved on behalf of the four legatees that administration with the will annexed might be granted to Mr. Murray, as their attorney. The deceased was concerned in a great many trusts, in which it was out of the question that ladies could act, and Mr. Murray had intimated his readiness to take the duty upon him in their behalf.

Lord PENZANCE.—What you ask is quite contrary to the practice of this court. Here are four people, each entitled to the grant, and they say we will none of us take it, but we will ask the court to grant it to a person who has no interest. Where there has been only a trust the court has occasionally made such a grant; but it is contrary to the practice of the court, and I cannot grant the application. There is no objection to your clients taking the grant, and their appointing Mr. Murray to be their attorney; but there must be some mode of meeting the case under the Trustee Act.

TAYLOR v. TAYLOR AND WOLTERS.

Dissolution—Damages—Apportionment of costs.

In a dissolution suit the damages were assessed by the jury at 150l. The court ordered the damages to be applied, first of all to the payment of the husband's costs, and afterwards to be settled on the only child issue of the marriage.

This was a husband's petition for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The case was tried before the court by a common jury on May 12, 1869. The jury found that the respondent had committed adultery with the co-respondent, and assessed the damages at 150l., whereupon the court pronounced a decree nisi, and condemned the co-respondent in costs.

Inderwick in moving that the decree be made absolute, asked that the damage be applied to the payment of the petitioner's costs.

Cunningham, for the respondent, submitted that they should be settled for the benefit of the wife and the one child of the marriage. He relied on

Latham v. Latham and Gethin, 30 L. J., 42, P. & M.; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308;

Keats v. Keats and Montezuma, 1 S. & T. 335;

Narracott v. Narracott and Hackett, 38 L. J., 132, P. & M.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 389.

The wife had brought into the common stock a legacy of 100l., which her husband had spent in buying furniture now in his possession. He also asked that the wife should have the custody of the child.

Lord PENZANCE, J.O.—Each case must depend on its own circumstances. The court has to deal with the sum of 150l. awarded as damages and the first thing to see to is that the petitioner gets his costs. The 150l. therefore, will be first applied to paying the preliminary costs as between attorney and client or at least so much of them as he fails to obtain from the co-respondent. With regard to the remainder, which may amount to a sum of about 100l. the only thing the court can do is to order it to be settled upon the child. The wife has no claim on any of these damages; as regards the money she brought into stock, the court cannot travel back into that matter. The husband must have the custody of the child, the wife being allowed to see it once a month.

JOHN MOFFATT (app.) v. EDWARD LA TROBE BATEMAN (resp.).

Accident in driving—Gratuitous carriage—Negligence—Occurrence of accident—How far raising a prima facie presumption of negligence—Evidence to go to jury.

The appellant asked the respondent as a favour to paper some rooms at a house belonging to the appellant, and offered to drive him to the place for the purpose. The respondent, after some objections, consented to go, and took his seat in the appellant's carriage. On the way, while the appellant was driving, the carriage broke down, and the respondent was thrown out and hurt.

In an action brought by the respondent to recover damages for the injuries thus sustained, the evidence as to the cause of the accident was that the kingbolt of the carriage broke, and it was suggested that the breakage was caused by the branch of a tree lying across the road. It was also proved, that the appellant had spoken of the horses he was driving at the time of the accident as hard to manage, and had said that he had not examined the carriage before starting, but that, after the accident, he had discovered the kingbolt to be defective. The carriage had been regularly examined by a blacksmith every three months.

Held (reversing the judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria), that there was no evidence of negligence to go to a jury; for,

First. The appellant must be considered to have carried the respondent gratuitously, and therefore to be liable on an accident occurring, if at all, only for gross negligence;

Secondly. The mere occurrence of the accident raised no prima facie presumption of negligence, because nothing is more usual than for accidents to happen in driving without any want of care or skill on the part of the driver: (Scott v. The London, &c., Docks Company, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 383, distinguished);

Thirdly. There was no affirmative evidence of gross or any other negligence on the part of the appellant.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Victoria, by which a rule nisi, granted by that court to the appellant, to set aside a verdict obtained by the respondent, and to enter a nonsuit, was discharged with costs.

[PRIV. CO.]

The first and only material count of the declaration alleged that in consideration that the plaintiff (the respondent), at the request of the defendant (the appellant), had taken a seat and place in a carriage of the defendant, to be conveyed therein by the defendant to Willis-station for profit to the defendant in that behalf, the defendant promised the plaintiff to take due and proper care in conveying the plaintiff as such passenger to the said station, and although the plaintiff afterwards became such passenger, yet the defendant did not take due and proper care, &c., and by reason of the careless and improper conduct of the defendant in the driving, conducting, and management of the said carriage, the plaintiff was injured, &c.

The pleas to the above count were: 1. Non-assumpsit. 2. Denial that the plaintiff became such passenger as alleged; and 3. Denial of the alleged breaches. Joinder of issue thereon.

The facts and the substance of the evidence are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

On May 23, 1868, the action was tried before one of the judges of the Supreme Court and a jury, when a verdict was given for the respondent with 1500*l.* damages, leave being reserved to the appellant to move to set aside the verdict, and to enter a nonsuit.

On June 23, 1868, the appellant obtained a rule nisi accordingly.

On Sept. 4 following the rule was argued, and the court (Stawell, C. J. and Barry, J.; Williams, J. dissentiente) discharged the rule with costs.

Dec. 14.—Manisty, Q. C. and Macnamara, for the appellant.—We contend that the conveyance of the respondent having been gratis, the appellant was liable only for gross negligence. The liability is that of a gratuitous bailee. Some remarks were made in the recent case of Giblin v. McMullen, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; L. Rep. 2 Priv. Co. 336, on the term "gross" negligence, and it was approved as a convenient description of the degree of negligence for which such a bailee will be liable. That case was, however, as to the liability of a banker for the loss of valuables deposited with him. The present is more similar to cases of a gratuitous loan of a machine, defective and so dangerous, which while used by the borrower does him an injury in consequence of that defect. Such was the case of Blakemore v. Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 8 E. & B. 1035, in which it was held that the defendants, the gratuitous lenders of a crane, were liable for mischief done to the borrower directly resulting from the unsafe condition of the crane, if that were known to the lender. But it is clear from McCarthy v. Young, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 785; 6 H. & N. 329, that the gratuitous lender will not be liable, if not aware of the defect. Even carriers for hire are not liable for an accident arising from a latent defect in a carriage such as no care could detect: (Redhead v. Midland Railway Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628; 9 B. & Sm. 519.) Here there was no evidence that the state of the kingbolt, if defective, was known to the appellant, and he used every precaution in having his carriage regularly examined to provide against any such defect. Again, there is no evidence that the horses were known to be or were actually unsafe to drive; nor that the appellant was unskilful in driving, and so caused the accident. [Lord CHELMSFORD.—If I invite anyone whom I may happen to pass on the road to take a seat in my carriage, and if by my unskilful driving he is thrown out, am I liable to an action?] No; we say that in such a case there is no guarantee of skilfulness. Further, gross negligence, for which a gratuitous bailee is liable, must directly cause or contribute to the mischief complained of. Here absolutely nothing is known as to the real cause of the accident, though various causes have been suggested by way of conjecture. The mere occurrence of the accident was not sufficient prima facie evidence of negligence to go to the jury. As was observed by Erle, C. J., in Hammack v. White, 11 C. B., N. S., 594; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 676, "I do not assent to the doctrine that mere proof of the accident throws upon the defendants the burden of showing the real cause of the injury. All the cases, where the happening of an accident has been held to be prima facie evidence of negligence, have been cases of contract." There must be some affirmative evidence of negligence, and "where the evidence is equally consistent with the existence or non-existence of negligence, it is not competent to the judge to leave the matter to the jury:" (per Williams, J. in Cotton v. Wood, 8 C. B., N. S., 573.) In the case of The London, 11 Moo. P. C. 311, Lord Wensleydale observed, "with respect to the onus probandi, there is no question or doubt about the law. The party seeking to recover compensation for damage, must make out that the party against whom he complains was in the wrong. The burden of proof is clearly upon him, and he must show that the loss is to be attributed to the negligence of the other party." There having been then no evidence of any contract, nor of any negligence on the part of the appellant, we submit that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

Mellish, Q. C. and Gadsden, for the respondent.—The respondent was not carried for his own pleasure, but to attend to the business of the appellant, and at his wish. The carrying, therefore, was not, as in the ordinary case of a gratuitous bailment, for the benefit of the bailee, but for that of the bailor. So that the contract alleged in the first count of the declaration is supported. The cases relied on by the other side, as showing that the proof of the occurrence of an accident is no prima facie proof of negligence in the defendant sufficient to be left to a jury, were doubtless rightly decided. But the question depends on the nature of the accident. And where the accident (as here) is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen with proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from negligence: (Scott v. The London, &c., Docks Company, 11 L. T. Rep. N. S. 383; 3 H. & C. 596.) The question of negligence, therefore, being one for the jury, their finding in the respondent's favour should not be disturbed.

Manisty, Q. C. replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15.—Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD.—The question to be determined in this appeal is whether there was any evidence to go to the jury of the appellant having been guilty of that degree of negligence for which, under all the circumstances of the case, he was responsible? The following are the material facts proved at the trial. The respondent, who is a decorator and ornamental gardener, had entered into an agreement with the appellant to serve him at the rate of 300*l.* a year for three years, in laying out his gardens at his residence at Hopkin's-hill. On the day of the accident the appellant asked the respondent to go to a place called Willis-station, which belonged to the appellant, to paper some rooms for him, and he proposed to drive him there in his buggy. The respondent, in his evidence, stated that after making many objections he consented to go; that his objections to accompany the appellant were with reference to his mode of driving; that he made excuses, but did not like telling him what his real motive for refusing was. The appellant, in his evidence, said that the respondent refused to accompany him to Willis-station because the morning was wet. The accident happened within a mile of Willis-station. The respondent described the buggy as old and rusty, and one that he would not have been seen in near town, and the horses as a very spirited pair, and he stated that the appellant whipped up the horses to make them gallop, and that at the time of the accident they were going very fast, but he could not say they were galloping. When they came to a spot where there were three tracks, the appellant took the one on the left, and the respondent was suddenly thrown out about two yards on the left-hand side of the buggy. When he came to himself, he found that the horses and the fore wheels of the buggy were gone; that there was the branch of a tree across the road, whether the whole way across he could not say, and that the hind wheels had stopped at this branch. This is the whole account which the respondent is able to give of the accident by which he certainly received very serious injuries. Before considering the evidence to prove negligence on the part of the appellant, it will be proper to determine for what degree of negligence he is responsible. It is admitted that he was not carrying the respondent for profit in the ordinary meaning of that term, but Mr. Mellish argued that as the respondent was going to Willis-station on the appellant's business, and for his benefit, he must be taken to have contracted for a greater degree of skill and care than would be required from a person who was driving another gratuitously. But their Lordships cannot adopt this view. The respondent was not obliged to go with the appellant, but might have found his way to Willis-station in some other manner, and the case amounts to no more than this, that the respondent having agreed to paper the rooms at the station, the appellant offered to drive him there, which imposed no higher duty upon him than in the case suggested during the argument, of a person offering another a seat in a carriage which he is driving, who certainly if liable at all for an accident afterwards occurring, could only be so for negligence of a gross description. Is there, then, any evidence of the appellant having been guilty of gross negligence—a term which is sufficiently descriptive of the degree of negligence which renders a person performing a gratuitous service for another responsible? There is no evidence at all of the mode in which the accident took place. It is probable that it might have been occasioned by running against the branch of the tree which is described by the respondent as lying upon the road, but no further description is given by the respondent of the accident, than the fact of its occurrence, and the place where it occurred. The counsel for the respondent contended that a case of prima facie negligence being shown, the appellant was called upon to relieve himself from it, and they cited the case of Scott v. The London and St. Katherine's Dock Company, (11 L. T. Rep. N.S. 383; 3 H. & C. 596), where it was held that "in an action for personal injury caused by the alleged neglect of the defendant, the plaintiff must adduce reasonable evidence of negligence to warrant the judge in leaving the case to the jury, but that where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servant, and the accident is such as in the ordinary course of things does not happen, if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence in the absence of explanation by the defendant that the accident arose from want of care." Now, that was a case in which the negligence proved was that the plaintiff, who was an officer of the Customs, whilst in the discharge of his duty, was passing in front of a warehouse in the dock, and six bags of sugar fell upon him. Undoubtedly in that case there was the strongest prima facie presumption of negligence because it is not in the ordinary course of things that loaded bags should fall out of a warehouse on a person below. But this case is very different. There is nothing more usual than for accidents to happen in driving without any want of care or skill on the part of the driver, and therefore no prima facie presumption of negligence having been raised, their Lordships think that it was necessary for the plaintiff in the case—the respondent—to give affirmative evidence of there being gross negligence on the part of the appellant occasioning the accident. The respondent endeavoured to prove this degree of negligence on the part of the appellant by means of admissions made by the appellant to two witnesses. The first of them, Smith, a nurseryman, said, "That night" (that is the night of the accident) "or the next morning, the defendant said that he had to blame himself for what had occurred, that he had not examined the vehicle, and that after the accident he discovered the defective state of the kingbolt." And the same witness said that on another occasion, on his way to Willis-station, defendant said that he never would go out with one of the horses—that he had served him the same trick before, and had ruined the other horse besides. This witness, on being cross-examined, said the appellant said, "the horse had bolted before on previous occasions, that he had bolted and made the other horse bolt too." The other witness, Margaretta Perry, said, "The defendant said it was neglect; the buggy was not looked to. He said the kingbolt had broken." She also heard the defendant say that he could scarcely drive those horses, and she added that she had heard him tell the boy to be ready to jump out, as he could not manage them. With regard to the proof of negligence by the admission of the appellant that he had not examined the vehicle, and discovered the defective state of the kingbolt, their Lordships are of opinion that this amounts to no proof whatever of negligence. It appears that the carriage was regularly examined by a blacksmith every three months, and it is very unlikely that the appellant before going out for a drive or using the buggy would examine very strictly and carefully what was its state with regard to its bolts and fastenings, or that he could fairly be accused of negligence for not having done so. Then as to the evidence of the appellant's admissions with respect to the horses. Undoubtedly, if the accident had happened by reason of any of those circumstances to which the appellant spoke in his admissions to the witnesses, if the horses had bolted, if they had become unmanageable, if they had been too much for him, and the accident could be referred to the occurrence of any of these circumstances, there might have been a case made out against him. But so far from this being proved, it appears from the respondent's evidence, who had been driven with these horses by the appellant before, that "on the road to Willis-station he did not observe anything unusual, except the appellant's whipping up the horses, as he said they were sluggish. And the respondent made no special complaint at the rate at which they were going, or of the vehicle in which they were going, or of the horses." Under these circumstances, there really is no evidence whatever of any negligence of any description on the part of the appellant. The whole case against him is that in the course of driving to the Willis-station the horses and front wheels of the carriage separated from the hinder wheels, possibly from coming in contact with the branch of the tree; but even that is mere conjecture. But that the accident occurred from any negligence which would have rendered the appellant liable is entirely destitute of proof. Their Lordships are very unwilling to interfere with the judgment of the learned judges who decided in this case that there was proof of negligence sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover; but they cannot help coming to the conclusion that the case ought to have been withdrawn from the jury at the close of the plaintiff's case, on the ground that he had offered no evidence to establish a case of gross negligence against the defendant. Under these circumstances, their Lordships will recommend Her Majesty to reverse the judgment. The costs will follow the usual course.

PRIV. CO.]

JOHN MOFFATT (app.) v. EDWARD LA TROBE BATEMAN (resp.).

HOBSON v. JONES.

Inspectorship-deed—Receiver—Default—Agency—Liability of inspectors.

By an inspectorship-deed the debtor agreed to allow A., or such other person or persons as the inspectors might from time to time appoint, to receive the moneys due to the debtor, and to keep his books. The deed contained no assignment of the debtor's property, and the debtor continued to carry on his business under inspection. The debts were ultimately paid in full, and an end was put to the inspectorship. On taking the accounts it appeared that a considerable sum was due from A., which he had not, as he ought to have done, paid over to the inspectors.

On a bill by the debtor to render the inspectors liable for his default:

Held, that A., if the agent of anyone, was rather the agent of the debtor than of the inspectors, and that therefore the inspectors were not liable for A.'s default.

The relation and liabilities of inspectors with reference to receivers under an inspectorship-deed examined.

Adjourned summons.

The plaintiff in the suit, George Hobson, being unable to pay his debts in full, executed, in Dec. 1858, a deed of inspectorship, which contained no assignment of his property, but by which, in consideration of time being allowed him by his creditors, he covenanted to pay his debts in full by six instalments, and to allow one John Heard Clarke, an accountant, or such other person or persons instead of the said John Heard Clarke, as the inspectors might from time to time appoint, to collect and receive all moneys due or to become due to the plaintiff, and to pay the same into an account to be kept at the City Bank, or such other bank as the inspectors might from time to time appoint, after deducting certain expenses therein specified, and to allow the said John Heard Clarke, or such other person as the inspectors might appoint, to keep and make all necessary or proper entries in the books, and for that purpose to retain and keep possession of the books or any of them during such time as might be necessary.

In 1863 the plaintiff entered into partnership, and all the debts were paid, and the inspectorship terminated. On taking the accounts, it appeared that the sum of 640*l.* was due from John Heard Clarke, which he ought to have paid into the bank to the account of the inspectors. Clarke, being insolvent the plaintiff filed his bill against the inspectors to make them liable, on the ground that Clarke was their agent, and that they were responsible for his default; and by the decree it was ordered that an account should be taken against the inspectors.

The present summons was adjourned into Court to obtain directions as to the mode of dealing with the sum of 640*l.* due from John Heard Clarke.

The facts of the case are more fully stated in the judgment.

Roxburgh, Q.C., and Herbert Smith appeared for the plaintiff.

Southgate, Q.C. and Cracknall for the defendant Jones, one of the inspectors.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. and Swanston, Q.C. for the defendant T. Clarke, the other inspector.

Jan. 31.—LORD ROMILLY.—This is an adjourned summons, taken out, in fact, at the instance of the Chief Clerk, asking for directions how he is to proceed in taking the accounts directed by the decree. It raises a question of great importance, not merely to the parties themselves, as it will dispose of the substance of the cause itself, but also because it involves a principle of general application to traders, which, so far as I know, or as I have been referred to any decided cases, has not hitherto been established. The facts which raise it are few and simple. The plaintiff carried on business as a tailor in and prior to 1858. In that year he got into difficulties. In December, 1858, he called his creditors together, and he executed a deed of inspectorship. The deed bears date the 16th Dec. 1858. It was made between the plaintiff of the first part, the defendants, who are the two inspectors, of the second part, and the scheduled creditors of the third part. John Heard Clarke, an accountant, was appointed receiver. There was no assignment to anyone of any of the effects or property of the plaintiff. The deed was to this effect. [His Lordship stated the effect of the deed, and continued:] Up to the 2nd Dec. 1861 the account at the bank was kept in the names of the plaintiff and John Heard Clarke. On that day the title of the account was changed, and it was afterwards kept in the name of the defendant alone at the City Bank. In March 1863 a negotiation was concluded with a gentleman of the name of Hieron, who had inspected the accounts of the business of the firm. A partnership was formed between him and the plaintiff, and his debts were paid off to the creditors in full, and an end was put to the inspectorship. On taking the accounts it appeared that a sum of £640 was due from John Heard Clarke, which he had not, as he ought to have done, paid over to the inspectors. He is insolvent and unable to pay, and in June 1863 this bill was filed calling on the inspectors to account for the moneys received by them, and also to make them liable for the default of John Heard Clarke, on the ground that he was their agent, and that the money received by him was received by the order or for the use of the inspectors. There is an ulterior question arising from the conduct of the inspectors, which is a separate matter, and which I wish to keep distinct. The first question, as I have stated, is simply this: it was the duty of the inspectors to overlook the receiver, and to see that he duly rendered his accounts and paid over the balance in his hands to their account at the bank, was he their agent for getting in the debts of the concern? In other words, what is the peculiar relation which exists in an ordinary deed of inspectorship between the inspectors, the debtor, and the creditors, and when a receiver is appointed to get in the assets of the debtor, whose agent is he? and who, if anyone, is liable for his misconduct in not accounting for his receipts? An ordinary deed of inspectorship is, I think, merely a contrivance to enable the debtor to avoid becoming a bankrupt, and at the same time to give the creditors the best chance of obtaining payment of their debts which the circumstances of the case seem likely to afford. This deed is a fair specimen of such deeds. There is no assignment of any property. The debtor does not part with his full legal rights, nor with the whole of his power over either his business or his assets, but he does so to a considerable extent; he gives the inspectors a right to superintend it, and, whenever they consider it necessary, a power to control his dealings with both. It is consistent with the objects of such a deed that a person should be appointed receiver and collect the moneys and debts due to the business, and that such a person should also be under the control of the inspectors and subject to being dismissed at their will and pleasure; but this does not, I think, make him the agent of the inspectors. All the legal powers which such a receiver possesses in the performance of this employment is derived from the debtor and none of it from the inspectors; all that he derives from the inspectors is their sanction to the exercise of his employment in this particular manner; but for the purpose of rendering any person but himself liable for the moneys he receives and not accounted for by him, he is not in my opinion the agent of anyone in the strict sense of the term; but, if of anyone, he is rather the agent of the debtor than of the inspectors. His position is somewhat analogous to that of a receiver appointed in a mortgage-deed, which is done occasionally where the mortgagee entertains some doubt about the punctual payment of the interest, and yet desires to avoid the consequences which attach to a mortgagee in possession. Accordingly the mortgagor and mortgagee agree on a person who is appointed to be the receiver of the rents and profits of the mortgaged estate, but who is not to be called into action until default has been made in payment of the interest. When that occurs the receiver is authorised and required upon the requisition of the mortgagee to exercise the power entrusted to him, that is to receive the rents, &c., and thereout to pay the interest due on the mortgage to the mortgagee and the balance to the mortgagor, but he is not the agent of the mortgagee nor can he be made liable to account on the principle of wilful default. This view is confirmed by considering what would have occurred if the inspectorship had continued and that after the misfeasance of John Heard Clarke had been discovered the inspectors had taken steps to enforce payment of the balance due from him or had prosecuted him for embezzlement. In either case, I apprehend, it would have been a proceeding in the name or on account of the debtor. If by civil proceeding the action or suit must have been in the name of the debtor, and if by criminal proceeding it must, I apprehend, have been by an indictment against John Heard Clarke for embezzling the property of the debtor. The decree in this case is to compel the inspectors to account for moneys "received by them, or by their order, or for their use." I do not think that the moneys received by John Heard Clarke come within these words, and that the inspectors, though strictly liable for all moneys received by them, are not answerable for moneys embezzled or not accounted for by a person properly and necessarily employed by them, and with the assent of every one interested in the business carried on by them within the terms of the deed by which they were constituted. In these cases, no doubt, everything depends upon the terms of the deed, and unquestionably the frame of the deed might make inspectors liable for moneys not received by them, if they thought fit to accept such an office; but there are no such words in the deed in question in this case; the strongest are only those which I have read, and they do not impose any such obligation on the inspectors. The remaining question is one apart from that which I have been considering, although in some degree connected with it. It is whether the inspectors have, by their own personal misconduct, made themselves liable for the moneys received by John Heard Clarke. For this purpose I have carefully read and considered the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff. It amounts shortly to this: in September the plaintiff and some of his creditors, who were endeavouring to arrange some mode by which the business might be sold and the inspectorship put an end to, met and required to see and investigate the accounts of the receiver, John Heard Clarke. After some difficulty he produced and allowed the inspection of the accounts, so far as they showed the character, extent and value of the business carried on, but he refused to produce the cash book or any document which might reveal how he had accounted for the moneys received by him. The creditors got alarmed, wrote to the inspectors, complained of their receiver, and required their assistance to compel John Heard Clarke to render these accounts, but without any charge being made by them against him. Only one inspector acted; Mr Jones took no notice whatever of the application. The other inspector, Thomas Thornton Clarke (no relative of the receiver), wrote to the receiver, who returned an evasive answer, but admitting that he had not produced and did not intend, unless compelled by the inspectors, to produce these books. The inspector, Mr Clarke, in answer to the application made to him, sent a copy of this letter, stated his firm belief in the honesty and trustworthiness of the receiver, and refused to compel him to produce these books. This took place in October 1862. The steps carried on for the sale of the business and the termination of the inspectorship were arranged in February following, and the whole was concluded on the 27th of March 1863. On winding up the inspectorship it appeared that John Heard Clarke, the receiver, owed upwards of £600, which he was unable to pay. The question is—does this conduct of the inspectors make them liable? I think the conduct of both the inspectors wrong; one in taking no notice whatever of the application made to him, and the other in supporting John Heard Clarke in withholding his accounts, but I do not think that this misconduct is sufficient to make them, or either of them, responsible for the malversation of the receiver. If it could be shown that the inspectors had distinct knowledge that John Heard Clarke had embezzled the money received by him, and that, having notice of this, they had allowed him to receive additional moneys, and had not removed him from his position, if not answerable directly for the moneys so allowed by them to be received by him, they might probably have been made liable to the plaintiff in an action for damages occasioned by culpable misconduct in their office as inspectors, but the evidence does not amount to this or to anything of that character. It does not appear, indeed, that, prior to the taking of the final accounts in 1863, anyone suspected that John Heard Clarke had not honestly accounted for all the moneys received by him as received, and no such charge is made against him by anyone. I cannot, therefore, on account of the conduct of the inspectors, which I have stated as strongly against them as the evidence will admit, make them liable for moneys which, under the terms of the deed itself, they would not be liable to account for or make good. I am of opinion that I must answer the chief clerk's inquiry by directing him not to charge the inspectors with the moneys received by John Heard Clarke. I shall give this direction without any order as to the costs of this summons, principally because it is an application by the chief clerk to be instructed how he is to proceed in taking the accounts, which might, as far as I can see, have been determined at the hearing of the cause; and also because I think the inspectors ought to have exercised a more diligent supervision over John Heard Clarke than they seem to have done. If gentlemen undertake an office, they should duly and diligently discharge the duties they have undertaken. I do not go into the question argued before me about the case made by the bill, and the suggestion that the case insisted on by the plaintiff was an attempt to intrude into the decree a case of liability for wilful default. If I had considered the defendants liable on the facts, I should have had no difficulty in making them account either under this decree, or under the power of stating circumstances specially, which I always reserve to myself, and which I exercise whenever I think it necessary in any decree directing accounts and inquiries to be prosecuted in my chambers. This, I presume, will dispose of the suit, and I regret that my opinion on this point was not taken at the original hearing. The order now will be the direction I have stated to the chief clerk, and no order as to the costs of the summons.

ROLLS.]

HOBSON v. JONES.

V. C. STUART'S COURT.

CHAPMAN v. CHAPMAN.

Solicitor and client—Alleged negligence—Mortgage securities—Advances by client—Bill charging improper motives—Bill dismissed.

In a question between solicitor and client, as to loss from negligence, there must be negligence of a gross and palpable kind to give a right to relief; but where the conduct complained of is more properly to be described as imprudent or indiscreet rather than negligent, and the transactions in question were referred to the judgment of the client himself, who concurred in them, there can be no right to equitable relief.

In such a case where charges of improper motives were made without evidence to support them, the court dismissed the bill with costs.

The object of this suit was to make the defendants, who had acted as solicitors for the plaintiff in negotiating certain advances made by him on mortgage, responsible for the money so advanced, and to compel them, in effect, to take the securities off the plaintiff's hands.

The facts, as stated by the amended bill, were these:

The plaintiff, Henry Chapman, of Westfield House, Canterbury, was a gentleman who for some years had been resident in India, but had recently returned to this country. The defendants were solicitors, carrying on business in partnership under the firm of Chapman and Clarke.

In Aug. 1862 the plaintiff received from his nephew, the defendant George Chapman, the following letter:

My dear uncle,—When you were in town you spoke to me of getting money from India. I could now or at any time within a month or six weeks, if it was now bespoken, invest 3000*l.* on mortgage at 6*l.* per cent. on property estimated at 6000*l.*, but to be valued by a surveyor on the lender's behalf, and the loan to be only up to one-half of the value. I merely mention this in case you should be on the look out for anything of the kind, in which case I could send you full particulars. I know the security to be good; the objection to you would probably be that you could not receive your money under a three months' notice.

After the receipt of the above letter, the plaintiff called upon George Chapman in order to ascertain the particulars of the proposed mortgage, and was then informed by Chapman that the proposed borrower was a client of the defendants' firm, a Mr. Richard Thomas, a person of independent property worth 1000*l.* a year, and who, in order to carry on expeditiously certain extensive building operations, required more capital than he then had available; that the property which Thomas proposed to mortgage was situated at Paddington, and was comprised in a building agreement entered into between him and the Bishop of London and his trustees:

By that agreement, which was dated 20th Feb. 1862, the said trustees covenanted with Thomas that they would—as soon as the messuages and buildings thereafter covenanted to be built should be built, covered in, and the external works completed, as thereafter mentioned—by a good and sufficient lease, or several good and sufficient leases, demise the same unto Thomas, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for a term of ninety-eight years, at the rent of 25*l.* for the first year, 50*l.* for the second, 100*l.* for the third, 200*l.* for the fourth, and 395*l.* for the fifth and remaining years of the said term; and, by the same agreement, Thomas covenanted to erect such buildings as therein mentioned.

Chapman also assured the plaintiff that the property was, at that time, an ample security for 3000*l.*; and that, although the nature of the security would require that the houses, when finished, should be withdrawn or released from the security, yet that care would be taken in always having sufficient value comprised in the security.

Upon receiving this information, the plaintiff told Chapman that he did not understand the nature of the proposed mortgage, but that if Chapman was perfectly satisfied with the security, he (the plaintiff) was willing to advance 3000*l.* at 6 per cent., and that he placed himself entirely in Chapman's hands, and trusted to him to guard him against the possibility of losing his money or being led into litigation, which Chapman promised to do.

Accordingly by a deed dated the 16th Oct. 1862, the 3000*l.* at 6 per cent. was advanced to Thomas on the security of a mortgage of the building agreement of the 20th Feb. 1862. The deed inter alia, contained a covenant that in case the plaintiff his executors, administrators, or assigns, should so require it, Thomas, his executors or administrators, would accept and take in his and their own name or names any one or more lease or leases of all or any part or parts of the said pieces of land and premises comprised in the said indenture of agreement pursuant to the provisions of the same, and would thereupon forthwith grant to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, and assigns, an underlease or several underleases of the premises comprised in such original lease or leases for the term or terms for which such original lease or leases should be granted, less the last day thereof respectively, instead of causing or procuring the original lease or leases to be granted pursuant to the said indenture of agreement to be granted or assigned to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, or assigns, such underlease or underleases to be in all respects subject to the terms of the security now being stated, and to the same right or equity of redemption, powers, and provisions, as if such original lease or leases had been granted or assigned to the plaintiff, his executors, administrators, or assigns.

V.C. S.]

CHAPMAN v. CHAPMAN.

[V.C. S.]

The mortgage-deed was prepared by the defendants, acting as the plaintiff's solicitors, and the draft of it was afterwards settled on the plaintiff's behalf by counsel as follows: "I have settled and approve of this draft. If it is desired to have any of the leases granted to Mr. Thomas without the mortgagee being made a party, the simplest course will be before the lease is granted, to indorse on the security a short release of the particular property intended to be comprised in the lease from the security, without prejudice to the security over the residue of the property. This can be modified to suit the circumstances, either upon payment of a part of the amount owing, or in consideration of the substitution of some other security, or merely in consideration of the property being a sufficient security."

The mortgage was executed shortly after its date, but was not registered until the 13th July 1864.

In consequence of the defendants' alleged neglect in not registering the mortgage sooner, Thomas was enabled to mortgage and sell part of the property and to procure leases of the remainder to be granted to his nominee, without the plaintiff's knowledge or consent; the defendants acting throughout in all such transactions as Thomas's solicitors.

Since the date of the mortgage, the whole of the land comprised in the building agreement of the 20th Feb. had been covered with houses by Thomas and other builders employed by him, some of which were finished and others remained unfinished, and the defendants had procured leases of the whole of the property to be granted to Thomas or his nominees, or to trustees for him, and had also caused underleases of such of the leases as were granted to trustees for Thomas to be made to him, or to trustees for him, for the purpose of creating improved ground-rents.

No lease or underlease of any of the premises comprised in the plaintiff's said mortgage had ever been made or assigned to him, and with the exception of two houses and certain stables (named in the bill) the whole of the property comprised in the plaintiff's security had been sold by Thomas and his trustees, or mortgaged by them for the full value thereof to other persons than the plaintiff. All the leases, underleases, sales of improved ground-rents, and mortgages were negotiated by the defendants, as the solicitors of Thomas, while they were acting as solicitors for the plaintiff, and in no case did they inform the plaintiff that any such transactions were intended to be made, or require his consent thereto. No notice of the plaintiff's security was given by the defendants to any purchaser, or mortgagee, or lessee, upon or previous to any of the transactions, or, if given, it was accompanied by an unauthorised statement, on the part of the defendants, that the plaintiff had waived his equitable claim upon the property.

In Sept. 1863 the plaintiff, at the request of the defendant George Chapman, advanced to Thomas 1000*l.* on the security of a plot of ground and premises in Acacia-road, St. John's Wood, but pending the suit, by an agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants, the security had been realised and produced more than sufficient for payment of the plaintiff's principal, interest, and costs in respect of it.

On the 30th June 1863 the defendant George Chapman wrote the following letter to the plaintiff:—

My dear Uncle,—I send you an order for 43*l.* 13*s.* 9*d.*, and form of receipt to stamp and sign. I should have sent it last week, but I was much out of town, &c. With respect to the security the works have gone on most satisfactorily. I have withdrawn completed houses, and have got permanent mortgages on them at 5 per cent. in the course of less than a year to the extent of 45,000*l.*, and there remains in work (besides land as yet untouched) to secure your 8000*l.* quite 8000*l.* You have always had an ample margin. As to your 5000*l.* the same client is about to build eighteen houses on a very good site, for which he pays 1000*l.* down. He is willing to borrow this 5000*l.*, at 6 per cent., for three or five years in this way—He will give you first a mortgage on the new site of ground, and a further charge on the old premises for as much as they jointly will secure in the judgment of your surveyor, with the understanding that as the works progress on the new site the whole loan shall be transferred there solely. Mr. Thomas's banker will discount the bill at 5 per cent. if you like, therefore, to complete at once, he will take the bill as cash, paying you, however, only interest at 1 per cent. up to next September, when interest at 6 per cent. will begin. I think this can be worked out to be quite safe if you like to entertain it.

The 5000*l.* referred to in the above letter was a sum which the defendant Geo. Chapman knew the plaintiff was anxious to lend on mortgage at 6 per cent., the person referred to as "the same client" was Thomas, and by the expression "the old premises" the defendant intended the plaintiff to understand the property comprised in his security of Oct. 1862.

On the 5th Nov. 1863 the defendant wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

My dear Uncle,—I sent you the surveyor's first report as to the building site in my neighbourhood. Everything is ready, and therefore you may be so good as to send me an order for the sum reported for 1000*l.*, and the mortgage shall be given at once. The works will proceed rapidly. I have no doubt the surveyor will report for a further sum within a month. The other matter is not quite so forward. I am waiting for the Bishop of London's solicitor to prepare some documents, but a week or two will see it ready. I have got a most satisfactory report from the surveyor, Mr. Hesketh, but I will not lay this before you till it is all ripe. The two matters between them will employ all the money you have in hand, and the first having now nearly worked out, gives greater stability to what is now in hand. In the course of the next ten days I will furnish you with such a statement as you want. I have personally entire confidence in both these matters, for I do not see how they can be other than very successful.

The building site referred to in the above letter was the property before mentioned in the Acacia-road. "The other matter" meant the advance by the plaintiff upon mortgage of a new site on which Thomas was to build eighteen houses, as mentioned in the letter of June 30; and that part of the letter which spoke of the matter referred to as "the first nearly worked out" meant the matter which formed the subject of the building agreement of Feb. 1862, and the plaintiff's security of Oct. 1862.

On the 20th Nov. 1863 the defendant George Chapman wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

My dear Uncle,—As Mr. Thomas is paying you interest for your money, he is of course anxious to make use of it. The second "take" of land to which it will chiefly be applied, and upon which I have an excellent report from Mr. Hesketh, will not be ready as a security for some little time, but meanwhile the first take on which you have lent 3000*l.* is a good security for a much larger sum, and Mr. Thomas suggests that you should make him a further advance on this, to be shifted to the other when further progressed. In order to put this before you in a good shape, I have had a further survey made by Mr. Hesketh, which I inclose. If you feel, as I consider you do, quite satisfied about this, and will send me up a crossed order, I will hand the amount to Mr. Thomas, taking his indorsed charge for the further advance on the existing mortgage. There is no question of the value of the property, and the success of Mr. Thomas's operations. I have kept a constant watch on it, and the most experienced surveyors have recommended the houses as mortgage securities as soon as they are finished. If there were three times as many as there are, I should have no difficulty in getting the money. This of course gives me great additional confidence.

Mr. Hesketh, in his report referred to in the above letter, said he had surveyed the property, consisting of fourteen leasehold houses, in Portsdown-road, Paddington, seven of which were covered in, and the others about to be covered in, and he considered that the leases of the seven houses covered in, subject to such ground-rents, were in their then state of a value of upwards of 8000*l.*, and that the other seven, not covered in, of a value of upwards of 5000*l.* He was, therefore, of opinion that they would be a good security for the loan of 8000*l.* required by Thomas in addition to the 3000*l.* already lent upon the whole site.

On or about the 1st Dec. 1863 the plaintiff, relying upon the representations contained in the above letters, and upon Mr. Hesketh's report, paid the defendant George Chapman the further sum of 3000*l.* for the use of Thomas. The defendants, however, never took an indorsed charge for the 3000*l.* upon the existing mortgage, as promised by the letter of the 20th Nov. 1863. In acknowledging the receipt of this money the defendant George Chapman wrote to the plaintiff that he might depend on his taking every care that he was perfectly secured in the matter.

Accordingly by an indenture dated 16th Jan. 1864, the 3000*l.* was advanced by the plaintiff to Thomas, on the security of a mortgage of a fresh building agreement and the works thereon from the Bishop of London and his trustees, dated 15th Jan. 1864. The covenants and provisoes contained in the indenture were substantially the same as those in the mortgage of the 16th Oct. 1862, and in particular a covenant to cause all leases which should be granted of the premises comprised in the agreement, except such as the plaintiff should think fit to release from the security to be granted to or vested in the plaintiff, subject to redemption; and a covenant by Thomas that he would, if required by the plaintiff, take leases in his own name of the premises agreed to be demised, and mortgage the same to the plaintiff by way of under-lease.

On the 25th Feb. 1864 the defendant George Chapman wrote to the plaintiff as follows:

My dear Uncle,—During the last week I have been carefully into the question of the state of your security on Mr. Thomas's property, and the surveyor, Mr. Hesketh, has sent me a report, which I forward to you. He is quite right as to the facts, for the values he is responsible; but I fancy he is well within the mark. You need not, therefore, I think, hesitate to send me on the remaining sum of 1000*l.* for Mr. Thomas. I may just mention that, in point of fact, there is at the present time about 6000*l.* further security in your hands not included in the report, because the rest being ample this will be allowed to be withdrawn very shortly.

"The remaining sum of 1000*l.*," referred to in the above letter, was a sum of money which the plaintiff had at the request of George Chapman agreed to advance upon the same security as the 3000*l.* advanced in Dec. 1863.

Mr. Hesketh's report concluded with the observation, "Altogether, therefore, I consider the undisposed value of what Mr. Thomas has done towards the completion of his first and second takes is not less than 12,575*l.*"

With respect to the several items mentioned in the report, the plaintiff stated that the first valued at 3400*l.* had, as before mentioned, been wholly withdrawn from his security; that as to the second, the stables valued at 2800*l.* had never been finished, and would require at least 800*l.* for their completion; that as to the third, the surplus ground-rents, valued at 400*l.*, never existed; that as to the fourth, the valuation was purely speculative, and the property, valued at 5175*l.*, never existed, and the statement that Thomas had under-let to three other builders the plots for forty-seven houses in Canterbury-road, at ground-rents of 5*l.* each, amounting to together 235*l.*, was wholly untrue; and that as to the fifth the property valued at 800*l.* had been withdrawn from the plaintiff's security.

On the 28th Feb. 1864, the plaintiff, relying on the above representations and report, paid to Chapman, for Thomas, the sum of 1000*l.* referred to in the above letter, making, with the sums already advanced by him, 8000*l.* A considerable part of the 1000*l.* was retained by Chapman in satisfaction of costs and other claims of the defendants against Thomas, and the balance was paid to Thomas.

In Sept. 1864 the plaintiff saw it announced in a newspaper that Thomas had been adjudicated a bankrupt, and he immediately wrote to Chapman for an explanation. Whereupon, on the 8th Sept. 1864, he received the following letter from Chapman:

My dear Uncle,—Your money is perfectly well secured and is wholly unaffected by Mr. Thomas's bankruptcy. Those proceedings were taken at his own instance for a special purpose relating to a part of the estate in which you are not interested. The bankruptcy will, in all probability be annulled in a short time. In all these cases I do not regard as having any money value, the person of the borrower, but only the property offered as security. I hold on your behalf at the present moment, as security for your 8000*l.*, actual reliable property 10,300*l.*, besides a lien on other property to which I can, if necessary, resort, value 9000*l.*, and this is not all. I assure you you may, therefore, be perfectly easy, but if you would like it I will take a day ticket and go down to Canterbury and place all the documents before you, and explain the state of the business. You see the report states (and it is quite correct) that you and the mortgage creditors are fully secured, and that there is sufficient to pay the trade or unsecured creditors, 40*s.* in the pound. Of course it seems a startling thing under these circumstances for a man to be bankrupt. The facts are as follows:—Mr. Thomas agreed with a person for a sum of 21,000*l.* to be lent on mortgage of twenty-one houses, as built. Afterwards it was verbally arranged that houses of a larger class should be built, and another 10,000*l.* advanced. The houses have been built, but 21,000*l.* only has been lent, and the lender was about, most unfairly, to foreclose and take possession in discharge of his loan. To stop this, Mr. Thomas becomes bankrupt, and all his creditors concurring, has obtained time to make some fresh arrangement, probably to pay off the present lender, and then annul the bankruptcy and proceed. The worst that will happen to you will be a delay of three or four weeks in payment of the quarter's interest due this month. If this should be any inconvenience to you, I will undertake to pay it to you. I will let you know how matters go on. If you hear of any good securities that you would be satisfied to take in lieu of the present mortgage, will you let me know, because I have offers for the purchase of some of the property you hold pressed upon me, and could repay you at almost any time. Money is valuable now, and it is a good time for investing.

The plaintiff alleged that the statements in the above letters as to the value of his security, and that the defendant had offers for some of the property pressed upon him and could repay the plaintiff at almost any time, were respectively inaccurate, and were calculated to mislead, and did in fact mislead him. The defendants alleged that they ceased to act as the solicitors of Thomas upon his becoming bankrupt, but the plaintiff charged the contrary, and further, that even if it were the fact they ought forthwith to have given notice to the Bishop and his trustees, not to grant any more leases to Thomas or his nominees, without the plaintiff's consent. The result being, that by their not doing so, many leases were granted after the bankruptcy, without the plaintiff's knowledge, and to the detriment of his security. On the 15th Dec. the defendant Chapman wrote to the plaintiff the following letter, with respect to the interest due on his security.

My dear Uncle,—I send you an order for 50*l.*, for which please send me back a receipt. I purposely avoid making up the full sum of interest due last September, because I want to effect some sales I am now negotiating, which I cannot do unless you have interest in arrear. As long as you are fully paid up your interest you cannot realise during the period of the mortgage loan, I am working hard at this, but I am told I shall not make way till the new year, still I have been encouraged with very good reports from the surveyors, and money is getting easier.

Between the months of August 1864 and May 1865, the plaintiff made several applications to Chapman to procure from him the repayment of his 8000*l.* and the payment of his interest, which was in arrear. In the beginning of May 1865 it was arranged that the whole subject of the plaintiff's securities should be submitted to a Mr. Rawlinson an equity barrister, and a friend of the plaintiff. Accordingly on the 25th of that month, the plaintiff and Chapman attended on Mr. Rawlinson, and Chapman then partially explained to him how he had dealt with the securities, and alleged that there was still property of the value of 16,000*l.* subject to the plaintiff's mortgages. Mr. Rawlinson suggested that a fresh valuation of the plaintiff's securities should be at once made on the plaintiff's behalf by one two or three valuers, that certain of the leases which had been granted under the said building agreements, should be at once assigned to the plaintiff, so as to give him the legal estate in the premises as mortgagee, and that until the leases had been so assigned no fresh ones should be granted to Thomas, or his nominees, without the express consent of the plaintiff. The defendant both on his own and on behalf of Thomas, agreed to these suggestions, and he also assured the plaintiff that he would carry them into effect at once. He did not, however, act on them, and the consequence was that many leases of the property comprised in the plaintiff's securities, were afterwards granted to nominees of Thomas, without the plaintiff's knowledge.*

It appeared that a Lady Hoghton was also a mortgagee of part of the property, viz., Nos. 1, 2, and 20 of Elgin-road, and it was represented by Chapman that if No. 1, Elgin-road, was given up to her she would give up Nos. 2 and 20 to the plaintiff thereby preventing possible litigation; and that, upon the footing of that arrangement, the then value of the securities held by the plaintiff would be 16,000*l*. This proposal having been acceded to, the defendants shortly afterwards submitted to Mr. Rawlinson to settle, on behalf of the plaintiff, a draft of a deed confirming No. 1, Elgin-road, to Lady Hoghton according to the proposed arrangement. In settling the draft Mr. Rawlinson appended the following observations:—

Not having any knowledge of the value of the property, which is not affected by the proposed deed, I am unable to say whether or not it is advisable that Mr. Chapman should part with any of his security. On this head, of course, he will be satisfied for himself. Mr. Chapman cannot be advised to execute the present deed until the question as to the other leases has been settled, and a legal assignment made to him.

Notwithstanding the above observations, the defendants induced the plaintiff, on the 9th Aug. 1865, to execute the deed without any valuation being made, and without informing the plaintiff of the observations. Subsequently Lady Hoghton sold No. 1, Elgin-road, for 5200*l*., and the plaintiff, therefore, charged that, in any case, the defendants were liable to him for any deficiency in the value of his securities that may have been occasioned by the arrangement.

No interest had been paid to the plaintiff since 1865, and in the beginning of Nov. 1866 the plaintiff, finding it impossible to procure payment of either principal or interest, and being dissatisfied with the replies sent to him by the defendants in answer to his letters on the subject, and with the management of his business, placed the matter in the hands of his present solicitors, Messrs. Walters, Young, Walters and Deverell.

The bankruptcy of Thomas was annulled in March 1866, but he was again adjudicated bankrupt in Nov. 1867. His estate proved insufficient to pay the plaintiff any part of the moneys owing to him.

In April 1867 Charles Randell, a subsequent mortgagee to the plaintiff of part of the property instituted a suit of foreclosure against Thomas, making the plaintiff one of the defendants. The suit came on to be heard in Feb. 1868, when the usual foreclosure decree was made, and the plaintiff had to pay considerable costs. The principal moneys secured by other mortgagees of the property, with a large arrear of interest, were still unpaid, and the plaintiff complained that he was liable to be harassed by other foreclosure suits, and also by suits to which he might be a necessary party by reason of the negligent way in which the defendants had transacted his business, and in which he would have to pay costs.

The plaintiff alleged that the result of the above dealings by the defendants or by Thomas, with their sanction, with the property was that he had no legal estate in it; that the vesting in him of the legal estate in such part of the property (if any) as still remained subject to his securities could only be procured at great expense, and with great difficulty, if at all; that as to any equitable interest which he might have in the same, the nature and extent of it was, having regard to the number of incumbrances which had been created, uncertain, of little value, and quite insufficient as a security for the moneys due thereon to the plaintiff. Further, the defendants had made very large profits in professional costs and otherwise out of the leases, underleases, mortgages, and sales before referred to, and also by preparing or approving documents for carrying the same into effect. It was therefore directly in the interest of the defendants that the plaintiff should have advanced his money as he did; and that Thomas should be able to deal freely with the property comprised in the securities. Under these circumstances the plaintiff charged that the defendants were liable, and ought to be decreed to pay the money due to him on the securities, and to take the securities off his hands and indemnify him against all claims and liabilities in respect of them.

The bill prayed that the defendants might be decreed to pay to the plaintiff the principal sum of 7000*l*. owing to him as aforesaid, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6*l*. per cent. per annum, from the day or respective upon which such interest fell into arrear. Or that in default thereof the defendants might be decreed to be liable to pay to the plaintiff in aid of any deficiency in his said securities, the sum of 5200*l*., being the value of the premises No. 1, Elgin-road aforesaid, portion of the plaintiff's securities, which the plaintiff was improperly induced by the defendants to abandon; and that in the meantime, until the existence of any such deficiency should have been finally ascertained, the defendants might be decreed to secure to the plaintiff the payment of such sum of 5200*l*.; that the defendants might be decreed to indemnify the plaintiff against all claims and liabilities under or in respect of his said mortgage securities, or any of them, and particularly against the costs incurred by the plaintiff in the said suit of Randell v. Thomas, and any costs which might be incurred by the plaintiff as a party to other suits to which he might be properly made a party by reason of the negligence and improper way in which the defendants had transacted the aforesaid business of the plaintiff; and that the defendants might be ordered to pay the costs of the suit.

The original bill in the suit contained charges of fraud against the defendants, but these were omitted from the bill as amended.

The answers of the defendants contained the following statements:—The defendant Clarke had no personal knowledge of the transactions complained of. The letters set out in the bill were not addressed to him or to the firm, but to the defendant Chapman. He was not present at any of the interviews, neither was he consulted in any way upon the subject of the original security. The facts were really these: The plaintiff desired Chapman to look out for a mortgage which would pay him at least 6 per cent. for his money. Accordingly, after taking the advice of an experienced surveyor on the subject, he had suggested the property in question. At the same time he explained to the plaintiff, who was a good man of business, what the nature of the proposed mortgage would be, and expressly told him that the borrower had no legal interest in the land at the time, but only an agreement under which leases would be granted to him when he had erected certain buildings, and that he wished to borrow the plaintiff's money to enable him to erect such buildings, and obtain such leases of them. That he was to be at liberty to withdraw finished houses from the security (sufficient being left to secure the plaintiff's advances), and to raise money by sale or mortgage for the purpose of enabling him to erect further buildings on the land remaining subject to the security. After the execution of the mortgage the defendants gave notice to the solicitors of the trustees of the land of the plaintiff's security, and desired them not to grant any leases to Thomas, or his nominees, without notice to them, as the plaintiff's solicitors. The plaintiff was from time to time kept informed as to the manner in which the property was being dealt with, but he never raised any question upon the subject. The plaintiff from the first knew perfectly well that it was contemplated that part of the property should be withdrawn from his security, but no part was ever so withdrawn without there being good reason to believe that the residue (from the forward state of the buildings, and the money which had been expended) was a sufficient security for the plaintiff's advances.

A draft memorial of the mortgage had been prepared for registration, but in order to avoid the necessity of making the plaintiff a party to every lease or deed affecting the property, the registration had been delayed.

At the time when plaintiff advanced his money the property (as the defendants believed) was a good and sufficient security, and any subsequent deterioration in its value had arisen from the general stagnation of business consequent on the crisis of 1866, and from other causes, over which the defendants had no control, but more especially by the conduct of the plaintiff himself. The plaintiff was duly informed of all the sub-lettings, and consented and approved of them; but as there was no reason why he should be informed of the leases granted, they were not brought under his notice. The defendants denied that they made large profits in professional costs, as alleged by the plaintiff. They also denied that there was any intention to deceive the plaintiff at the time when he executed the deed in reference to the property mortgaged to Lady Hoghton. It was done in order to avoid a dispute to a claim raised by Lady Hoghton's solicitors, and the plaintiff, acting under the advice of Mr. Rawlinson, agreed to give up his claim to the property. Before the execution of the deed the plaintiff received the following letter from Mr. Rawlinson, dated the 7th Aug. 1865:

I have just settled a draft of a deed on your behalf; and I write a line, at George Chapman's request, to say that although it makes you part with a portion of your security, you may with practical safety execute it. There is a very ample margin for you now the houses are built. There was a nasty question which arose as to three houses to which Lady Hoghton laid claim. If there had been a fight you must have come out well; but that was to be avoided, at all events, and I advised that the question should be settled, and that one house should be taken by Lady H., and that two should be given up to you. This has been agreed to. The deed, by which the two will be given up to you has not yet been completed, but I have made it a sine qua non that the deed you are now asked to execute should not be handed over until the other is completed. G. C. has been through the figures of the value of the security you hold. He puts them at 15,000l., which I think fair; but deducting one-fifth for overvalue, you would still have 12,000l. as security for 8000l.

A fresh valuation of the plaintiff's securities had been prepared on his behalf, as Mr. Rawlinson suggested.

Some of the leases assigned to Thomas had become directly subject to the plaintiff's security. The plaintiff, moreover, was in possession of the leases of two of the houses, and of certain coach-houses and stables, subject to his security; and the defendants expressed it as their belief, that if the property was judiciously and gradually realised, it would be the means of bringing back to the plaintiff all that he was entitled to claim. The course, however, which the plaintiff had latterly adopted had been very much opposed to his own interest. He had given notice to the solicitors of the trustees of the land not to grant any leases of the property comprised in his security, notwithstanding that it had been pointed out by those solicitors that such notice would be injurious to himself; and the defendants therefore submitted whether what might be objectionable in the present state of things might not be attributable to the advice the plaintiff had received since they ceased to act for him as solicitors. They further submitted that the suit was at least premature, and that the plaintiff's remedy (if any) was at law.

Dickinson, Q. C., and Caldecott, for the plaintiff, contended that the conduct of the defendants fully justified the relief prayed against them. They had induced the plaintiff, under an assurance that the securities in question were perfectly safe, to advance his money. The plaintiff himself knew nothing of the nature of the securities, but trusted implicitly to the representations of the defendants, relying on them, as his solicitors, for their protection and the management of his business. The result of this misplaced confidence was that he had lost considerable sums of money, and was liable to lose more. The motives which actuated the defendants in thus involving the plaintiff were obvious. They expected to make large profits out of the building scheme, and, while acting as solicitors for Thomas, they were serving their own interests as well as his. The original valuation, if taken at all, was made on behalf of Thomas; but the plaintiff was entitled to have it shown by an independent valuation that the security was, at least, worth double the amount advanced on it. With regard to Lady Hoghton's property, the evidence clearly showed the sacrifice which the plaintiff had made through the advice and mismanagement of the defendants. Under these circumstances the plaintiff was fully entitled to ask that the defendants might be compelled to take the securities off his hands and recoup him for the loss which he had sustained while holding them. They cited

Craig v. Watson, 8 Beav. 427;

Smith v. Pococke, 2 Drew. 197; and

Dixon v. Wilkinson, 4 De G. & J. 522

Wickens and W. Barber, for the defendants, submitted that the plaintiff's version of the transactions was altogether incorrect. The real facts were these: The plaintiff wished a high rate of interest for his money, and it was therefore necessary that the securities should be of a somewhat speculative character. The plaintiff was a thorough man of business, and was fully alive to the risk (if any) he was running. He knew that it would be necessary from time to time to withdraw a considerable portion of the property from his securities, and he was kept perfectly well informed, both by letters and documents, of those withdrawals as they took place. The investment of his money had not turned out so well as he apparently had anticipated, and he now turned round and attempted to make out that the defendants by their representations had guaranteed him against loss. Neither the ordinary course of business transactions nor the evidence would warrant such a contention. The remaining property was in fact more than a sufficient security for the money advanced by the plaintiff, but if it was not he had only himself to blame for the depreciation in its value, for by preventing the trustees from granting fresh leases he had almost rendered it unmarketable. As to Lady Hoghton's property the plaintiff had acted on the advice of his own counsel in the matter, and the defendants were freed from all responsibility. Even if the charges made by the bill could be established the plaintiff's case must fail. It was contrary to the practice of the court to entertain an action for damages in the form of a suit. The bill prayed for a sum of money as for damages; but the court had no jurisdiction to grant such relief except in extreme cases, and even then it was exceedingly difficult to frame a proper decree. The case made by the bill, however, did not come within that category, and the allegations were by no means conclusive of the conduct of the defendants. The bill must, therefore, necessarily be dismissed with costs. They cited Judgment reserved.

Jan. 20.—The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this suit the plaintiff asks the decree of the court against the defendants, who acted as his solicitors in a mortgage transaction, and he prays that they may be compelled to repay to him the mortgage money of 7000*l.*, with interest at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum. This relief is sought on the ground of neglect of duty as to the securities on which the plaintiff advanced his money. There is an alternative relief prayed as to a sum of 5200*l.*, for which it is sought to make the defendants liable in aid of any deficiency resulting from the abandonment of certain property included in the plaintiff's mortgage, and said to be abandoned by him in consequence of the improper advice of defendants. The plaintiff asks to be indemnified generally in respect of the mortgage securities, and the costs of suits to which he may properly be made a party by reason of the alleged negligent and improper way in which the plaintiff's business was transacted. It is admitted at the bar that the plaintiff can only be entitled to relief on the footing of his assigning to the defendants the securities which he still holds. There seems to me to be no ground for disputing the jurisdiction of the court. Although an action at law may be sustained and damages recovered against a solicitor for loss occasioned by negligence in the discharge of his duty, this court in a proper case would give relief without sending the injured client to a court of law. Under its improved course of practice it would seem to be the duty of this court to extend its jurisdiction as far as possible in such cases, and to take cognizance of all well-grounded complaints against the conduct of its officers in the management of the business of their clients, either on bill filed or or under its summary jurisdiction. Even before the statute of 1852 the authorities support the right to relief. It is to be observed that the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor in the case of Frankland v. Lucas (sup.), does not justify the statement in the marginal note of the reporter. In the present case the grounds of complaint are greatly overstated, and the nature of the security so peculiar and the present position and value of the existing securities so entirely uncertain as to any ultimate loss that, even if there were stronger evidence in support of the plaintiff's case, it would be difficult to support the bill. No actual loss has yet been incurred by the plaintiff, except the non-payment of interest for some time, and the uncertainty when it may be paid. The land is at present unproductive, and must remain so until building operations are resumed. But it was perfectly understood by the plaintiff that the value of the security depended on the building operations, and was, therefore, necessarily a precarious value. Upon the evidence it is impossible to say that it is certain that the plaintiff will ultimately sustain any loss at all, beyond the loss and inconvenience from delay as to the interest. There is no precedent, so far as I know, of a decree declaring generally that the plaintiff in such a case should be indemnified in respect of an apprehended loss which may never occur." And there is a serious difficulty in forcing upon the defendants the assignment of a security of so peculiar a kind, which they never contracted to take. This is not like the case of Craig v. Watson (sup.), where the solicitor took the security in his own name, and the court was able to direct a sale so as to ascertain with certainty the amount of the loss. In that case gross negligence was proved, and there was nothing peculiar in the nature of the property. The defendants' conduct has been imprudent rather than negligent. The imprudence was as to a matter on which any man of sense could form an opinion for himself, and a matter which required no professional skill to guide the plaintiff's judgment. It is the peculiar nature of the security which has occasioned the complaint. A lease of land for building purposes is of no productive value until the expenditure for erecting the buildings is made, and the object of the borrower is to get the money to enable buildings to be erected. It is not attempted to put the plaintiff's case upon the ground that the defendants ought not to have lent his money on such a security. The amount lent by the plaintiff was inconsiderable, compared with the amount necessary for the contemplated buildings, and the nature of the security was such that from the beginning it was contemplated that houses as they were completed might, with the consent of the plaintiff, be withdrawn from the security. It is no part of the complaint against the defendants that they were negligent in not having a definite stipulation as to the number to be withdrawn. On the contrary, the plaintiff perfectly understood the nature of the contract, and knew that the number of houses which might be withdrawn was undefined, and was therefore for future arrangement. The plaintiff was fully informed and consulted, and had the same means of forming an opinion and of obtaining the information necessary for forming an opinion as the defendants. In a question between solicitor and client as to loss from negligence there must be negligence of a gross and palpable kind to give a right to relief. But where, as in this case, the conduct complained of is more properly to be described as imprudent or indiscreet, rather than negligent, and every transaction was referred to the judgment of the client himself, who concurred in it, there seems to me to be no right to equitable relief. The advice which the defendants gave was founded on the reports of surveyors communicated to the plaintiff, and whatever may be said of the prudence or imprudence of the course advised by the defendants, I can see no reason to doubt the honesty of the advice. It was upon a matter which did not require professional skill; and the grounds upon which the advice was given were submitted to the plaintiff's judgment, and approved by him. That is as to the general case of the plaintiff. But as to the transaction with Lady Hoghton, the principal ground of complaint is that no valuation of the property was made as suggested by Mr. Rawlinson. But it is proved that a valuation was made, although not communicated to the plaintiff. The letter of Mr. Rawlinson to the plaintiff, dated 7th Aug. 1865, seems to me conclusive against the plaintiff as to the whole transaction with Lady Hoghton. In his second affidavit the plaintiff is obliged to admit that the allegation in the bill is incorrect, and that at the meeting on the 25th May 1865, nothing passed as to any question between himself and Lady Hoghton. There seems to me no just ground for the allegation that the execution by the plaintiff of the deed of 9th Aug. 1865, was improperly obtained. It is unfortunate for the plaintiff that he should have been induced to charge fraud against the defendants in the original bill. Even in the amended bill in which the charges of fraud are struck out, there remains the imputation of improper motives as influencing the defendants in the advice which they gave to the plaintiff. There is nothing in the evidence to justify these charges, and as the plaintiff has failed to show any sufficient ground for the relief which he asks, the bill must be dismissed with costs.

V.C. MALINS' COURT.

Reported by G. T. EDWARDS and G. I. F. COOKE, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Feb. 25.

Re CLARK'S TRUSTS.

Will—Construction—Gift to "each of my sons"—Survivorship.

A testator bequeathed the income of his residuary estate to his wife for life, and after her death bequeathed one-fifth of the residue to each of his two sons J. and C. absolutely, and to be paid to them respectively, or to such of them as should be living at the death of his said wife, or the children of such of them as might be then dead, the children of such as should be dead taking the share which their parent would have taken if living. C. died a bachelor in the lifetime of the tenant for life, but J. survived her.

Held, that J. was entitled to the one-fifth originally given to C.

This was a petition to ascertain the rights of parties in a fund which had been paid into court, under the Trustee Relief Act, by the trustees of the will of William Clark. The testator by his will, dated the 30th Dec. 1845, after bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies, bequeathed all the residue of his personal estate unto his trustees therein named, upon trust to collect and get in and invest the same as therein mentioned, and to pay the income of his said residuary estate to his wife Mary Bucknor Clark for her life, and the will then proceeded as follows:—

And from and after the decease of my said wife, I give, devise, and bequeath one-fifth part of all and every my said residuary estate, and the stocks, funds, or securities in or upon which the same may have been invested, unto each of my said two sons, James Clark and Charles Clark, absolutely, and to be paid and transferred to them respectively, or to such of them as shall be living at the time of the decease of my said wife, or the children of such of them as may be then dead, the children of such as shall be dead taking the part or share only which their parent would have taken if living, with benefit of survivorship as between my said sons in the event of either dying without issue in my lifetime.

The testator died on the 10th Feb. 1849; Charles Clark died a bachelor in June 1858 in the lifetime of the testator's widow. The widow died in Nov. 1868. The question was who, in the event that had happened, was entitled to the one-fifth bequeathed to Charles Clark.

C. Hall, for the petitioner James Clark, contended that, according to the true construction of the will, and in the events which had happened, the petitioner, as he survived his brother Charles, and was living at the death of the testator's widow, was absolutely entitled to the one-fifth to which Charles would have been entitled if he had survived the widow. When the issue of a deceased child are provided for, as in this case, there is no necessity for giving the parent a vested interest unless he actually survives the tenant for life. By the clause providing that the children of a son dying in the lifetime of the tenant-for-life should take their parent's share, the testator evidently contemplated the possibility of a survivorship under the preceding clause. He cited

Sturges v. Pearson, 4 Madd. 411.

W. Pearson, for the legal personal representatives of Charles, contended that each of the sons took an absolute vested interest in one-fifth of the residue, subject only to be diverted in the event of his dying in his mother's lifetime leaving children. There is nothing in this will to cut down this absolute interest. The words "to be paid and transferred," merely refer to the time of payment. Suppose there is a gift of 1000*l.*, after the death of the tenant for life, to A. and B., or the survivor of them, and A. dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life, the survivor takes the whole; but suppose a gift, after the death of the tenant for life, of 500*l.* to each of A. and B., or the survivor of them, and A. dies in the lifetime of the tenant for life, B. does not take both sums. A gift of two-fifths to two persons is not the same as a gift of one-fifth to each.

Renshaw, for the testator's next of kin, contended that there was an intestacy. The gift was not of an entire fund, and there was no joint tenancy. There was only a survivorship in the event of either of the sons dying in the testator's lifetime, not of either dying in the lifetime of the tenant for life. He referred to Browne v. Lord Kenyon, 3 Madd. 410.

C. Hall in reply—Here children are provided for, and when this is the case the court does not lean to a vesting. In Emperor v. Rolfe, 1 Ves. Sen. 208, and that class of cases, there was a vesting because there were no children. There is no distinction to be made between the gift and the direction to pay. He cited

Re Wilmott's Trusts, L. Rep. 7 Eq., 532;

Merry v. Hill, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 619.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR—In all questions arising upon wills it is a cardinal rule of construction that you are to ascertain the intention of the testator. In this case it is not disputed that if the testator had given his sons two-fifths of his residuary estate as one gift, instead of one-fifth to each, the case of Sturges v. Pearson would have applied, and James Clark would have taken the whole. But the testator has given the two-fifths in this form. [The Vice-Chancellor then read the clause above stated, and continued:] Now the words "dying in my lifetime" do not apply to the case; they are merely a provision against lapse. The question is whether there is any distinction between a gift of two-fifths to the sons, and a gift of one-fifth to each of the sons; and I am of opinion that it would be a violation of the testator's intention to say that there is any such distinction. The testator gives one-fifth to each, to be paid to them respectively, or to such of them as shall be living at the death of his wife, so that he provides for the death of one only and not both of his sons in the lifetime of his wife. Now, what does the testator mean by the words "or to such of them?" Surely he does not intend them to refer to a part only of the property in question, for that would be in effect to say, "I give to Charles or to such of them as shall be living at the death of my wife," which would be nonsense. He clearly intends to make an indivisible gift to James and Charles in equal shares, or to such of them as shall be living at the death of his wife. It is precisely the case of Sturges v. Pearson; there the testator bequeathed certain dividends to his daughter for life, and then to be equally divided amongst her three children, "or such of them as shall be living at her decease." The children all died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, and it was held that they took vested interests. This intention of the testator, that the son who survived the tenant for life should take the one-fifth of the son dying in her lifetime, is still more strongly shown by the clause which directs that the children of such of the sons as should be dead at the time of the decease of the testator's wife should take the share which their parent would have taken if living. I am of opinion, therefore, that it was the intention of the testator, as it is the effect of his language, to give the two-fifths to his two sons, or such of them as should survive the tenant for life. Therefore, as James Clark alone survived the tenant for life, there will be a declaration that in the events which have happened, the petitioner, James Clark is entitled to the one-fifth originally given to Charles.

BULTEEL v. PLUMMER.

Settlement—Construction—Power of appointment—Defective exercise as to part.

Under a marriage settlement 4000l. Bank Stock was vested in trustees upon trust to assign the same unto and amongst all and every the children, and the issue of deceased children, in such parts, &c., at such times, and in such manner, &c., as the husband and wife should jointly by deed, or the survivor by will, appoint, and in default on certain trusts for the children equally with benefit of survivorship. The joint power was never exercised, but the wife, on the marriage of a daughter (her husband being then dead), covenanted that by any future will she would only appoint to her in a specific manner. The widow then made her will, whereby, reciting the power, she gave a house (part of the trust property) to a single daughter, appointed 2500l. to her married daughter, 500l. to a son, and 100l. to a daughter of a deceased son, he having left other children still surviving, and gave all other, the realty and personally, over which she had a disposing power, to the daughter to whom she had given the house:

Held, that the appointment was valid except as to the residue, which went as in default of appointment.

The question in this case was, whether the will of Louisa Plummer was a good and valid exercise of a power of appointment given to her by her marriage settlement. The settlement was dated the 2nd Sept. 1809, and thereby 4000l. Bank Stock was assigned to Frances Hearle Rodd and William Plummer, upon certain trusts for George Thomas Plummer and Louisa his wife, and after their decease a power of appointment was given to them in these terms:

Upon trust to transfer and assign the said sum of 4000l. unto and amongst all and every the son and sons, daughter and daughters of the said George Thomas Plummer and Louisa Plummer, lawfully to be begotten; and the children of such sons and daughters in case any of them should be then dead, leaving issue, in such parts and proportions, and at such time or times, and in such manner as the said George Thomas Plummer and Louisa Plummer should jointly by any deed or writing, or the survivor of them, by his or her last will and testament in writing duly executed, limit, direct, or appoint the same, and in default of such appointment, then unto and amongst all and every the son and sons, daughter and daughters of the said George Thomas Plummer and Louisa Plummer, and the children of such sons and daughters, in case any of them should be dead leaving issue, in equal shares and proportions, but so as the child or children of the sons or daughters as should then happen to be dead should be entitled only to the share which his, her, or their father or mother would have been entitled to if living, equally to be divided amongst such children if more than one, and if but one, then wholly to that one.

There was then a provision at the desire of the said George Thomas Plummer and Louisa, his wife, or the survivor, to lay out the 4000l. in the purchase of freeholds to be held on the same trusts. George Thomas Plummer died in 1828, there being issue of the marriage five children, Louisa Marian, George Robert, Henry, Frances, and Charles, who died in 1837 an intestate, and a bachelor. The husband and wife never executed the joint power of appointment reserved to them by the settlement, and the 4000l. Bank Stock was invested in 7000l. Three per Cent. Reduced. In 1831 Louisa Marian, the eldest child, married Robert Westmacott, and on that occasion a settlement was executed, and Louisa Plummer, who was a party to the settlement, covenanted that she would not by any future will to be executed by her appoint to the said Louisa Marian Plummer, or her child or children, a less portion of the funds, the subject of the settlement of the 2nd Sept. 1809, than 2500l. Reduced Annuities, or property equal in amount thereto, and that if she should execute another will, and thereby appoint to the said Louisa Marian, or to her child or children, a less portion of the said trust funds than the said sum of 2500l., she in her lifetime, or her executors or administrators, within six calendar months after her decease would pay to the said trustees for the time being of such settlement such a sum of money as would be equivalent to the difference between the stock or property which should be so appointed, and the said sum of 2500l. Three per Cent. Annuities. George Robert Plummer, another child of the said Louisa Plummer, died in her lifetime leaving four children, who all attained twenty-one.

On the 25th Oct. 1867 Louisa Plummer made her will. By this instrument she recited that under her marriage settlement she had, in certain events which had happened, a disposing power over certain real and personal estate unto and amongst the sons and daughters of her marriage, and the children of such sons and daughters in case any of them should be dead. The testatrix then gave and devised a freehold house at Plymouth (which had been bought out of the 7000l. 3 per Cent. Reduced in 1829) to her daughter Frances Plummer, her heirs and assigns, to be conveyed to her immediately after her (the testatrix's) decease. And the testatrix directed and appointed that the sum of 2500l. Stock, part of the 7000l. 3 per Cent. Reduced, should be held upon trust for her daughter Louisa Marian Westmacott, her executors, administrators, and assigns. And she appointed, gave, and bequeathed the sum of 500l. Stock, further part of the said trust funds, to her son Henry, his executors, administrators, and assigns. And she appointed, gave, and bequeathed the sum of 100l. Stock, further part of the said trust funds, to her granddaughter Louisa, daughter of her late son George Robert Plummer, deceased, her executors, administrators, and assigns. And as to all other the real and personal estate over which she had a disposing power, and all her real and personal estates and effects after payment of her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, she appointed, gave, devised, and bequeathed the same and every part thereof unto her daughter Frances Plummer, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns. Louisa Plummer died a month after executing her will; and at that time the trust property consisted of 7054l. 6s. New Three per Cents., and the freehold house at Plymouth. The trustees of the settlement of 1809 were both dead, and new ones had been appointed, the plaintiff, Thomas H. Bulteel, being one, and William Harris, jun., the other; but it was singular that on neither occasion—one new trustee being appointed in 1858 and the other in 1859—was the freehold house mentioned, and the legal estate in it was outstanding in the heir-at-law of William Plummer, who survived Francis Hearle Rodd, having made his will containing no devise of trust estates, such heir being, as it was believed, the eldest son of the testatrix's deceased son George Robert Plummer. This suit was instituted by the trustees, who now submitted the question for the decision of the court, and asked that the trusts of the settlement might be executed under its direction.

Glasse, Q.C. and Waugh appeared for the plaintiffs, and submitted the question.

Cole, Q. C. and Key for the defendant, Frances Plummer, contended that the will of Louisa Plummer must be supported entirely. The court previously to the Wills Act would aid a defective execution; but since that statute, although no formal words were required to constitute it a good exercise of the power, yet there must be some instrument operating as a will. The residuary clause probably had no application to the trust fund:

Wilson v. Piggott, 2 Ves. jun. 351;
Ranking v. Barnes, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 124.

Ward v. Firmin, 11 Sim. 235;
Morse v. Martin, 34 Beav. 500;
Young v. Lord Waterpark, 13 Sim. 199.

Cotton, Q. C. and Bedwell, for the grandchildren of the testatrix, in whose favour no appointment was made, argued that the will was either a good appointment or entirely bad—it could not be bad in part. This was not a case in which the court would help the defective execution:

White v. Wilson, 1 Drew. 298;
Sugden on Powers, 8th edit. 560-1;
Wilkie v. Holme (sup.);
Hervey v. Hervey, 1 Atk. 560.

Pearson, Q. C. and Langley, for Mrs. Westmacott.—The gift of the residue was entirely void, and therefore had no effect as defeating the appointments made. No doubt the will was a defective execution of the power, but it was good as far as it went, and the court would carry it out:

Cotton, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This is a case in which I do not feel much difficulty. [The Vice-Chancellor stated the facts.] It is agreed on all hands that this was not an exclusive power, that is, the appointor must either give or leave something to all the objects of the power. The settlement creating the power was dated in 1809; and twenty-two years after, namely, in 1831, one of the daughters of this lady, Louisa Marian, having married a Mr. Westmacott, and her mother joining in the settlement made upon her marriage, and that settlement reciting the power, there is a covenant by the mother that she would not by any future will to be executed by her appoint to Louisa Marian, her daughter, or her children, a less portion of the trust fund than two thirds of 2500*l.* Reduced Annuities, or property equal in amount thereto; and if she should execute another will, and thereby appoint to Louisa Marian or her children, a less portion of the said trust funds than 2500*l.*, then, she in her lifetime, or her executors or administrators, within six calendar months after her decease, should pay to the trustees for the time being of the settlement such a sum of money as would be equivalent to the difference between the stock or property which should be so appointed, and the sum of 2500*l.* Three per Cent Reduced Annuities. The mother made her will, dated the 25th Oct. 1867, and upon that will the whole question turns. At the date of this will the state of the family was this: there was the daughter Louisa Marian, who had attained her majority of twenty-one years and married in 1831, that is, thirty years before the date of the will, although upon that fact no question arises. Then there was George Robert, who died before the testatrix, leaving four children, and Henry and Frances Hill living, and Charles, who died unmarried before the husband of the testatrix. There being therefore three surviving children of a deceased son, Mrs. Plummer makes her will (the Vice-Chancellor referred to the will); she was mistress of her property, and was to give it amongst her children, provided she did not exclude any. Now the objects were her children and the children of a deceased son, and these latter were not wholly excluded, because she gave 100*l.* to a granddaughter. But, up to that point she had left out the three children of the deceased son who were some of the objects of the power; and if the will had stopped there, it being admitted that the sums given did not exhaust the whole trust fund, it is not questioned, and indeed could not be, that this instrument might have been a valid exercise of the power, because the unappointed part of the fund would have gone in default of appointment, so as to preserve or retain some small portion for the remaining objects of the power. That is, the appointment did not exhaust the whole trust fund over which the power extended, and so far as there was no appointment that went in default of appointment. As Lord St. Leonards has said with great truth:—"Provided the objects against a power take something, even the smallest sum of money being given to each of the objects of the power would satisfy the exigency of the law." If, therefore, the will had stopped after the appointment of the 100*l.* to the granddaughter, there is no contest but that she would have left enough to go in default of appointment, and the execution of the power would have been valid. But she goes on to leave the residue in the following manner:—"As to all other the real and personal estate over which I have a disposing power, and all my real and personal estate and effects, after payment of my debts funeral and testamentary expenses, I give, devise, and bequeath the same and every part thereof unto my daughter Frances, her executors, administrators, or assigns." Whether the house which was given to her is valuable does not appear. Suppose it was of considerable value, and there being a gift to her of all the residue of the trust fund, Mr. Cotton argued that the clause must be taken as an appointment; and, consequently that, as the effect was to exclude some of the objects of the power, he submitted that it was wholly void. That is because she had not left something (even a shilling would have been sufficient) to the remaining objects of the power, the whole is vitiated. Now, the effect of allowing the whole gift would be to effectuate the intention of the testatrix if possible, if that be the proper construction. But it is said, because she has not left something, even a shilling would be sufficient to the remaining objects of the power, the whole is bad. If this is so, the whole intention of the testatrix would be defeated. I do not say anything about the covenant in the marriage settlement. I treat it as if there were none such. I must assume that she has fairly and properly exercised the powers, there being no improper object, and no undue influence. There is nothing to show that it was not properly exercised; she feels the exigency of the different members of her family, and clearly intended Frances to have the dwelling-house, and that Mrs. Westmacott should have 2500*l.*, and her other child Henry 500*l.* only; to her granddaughter 100*l.* The effect, therefore, of holding the appointments void would be that none of these objects would take under the will the sums intended for them, and the whole intention of the testatrix would be entirely frustrated, when by a reasonable construction I think I can carry into effect every part of the intention. If the will had stopped at the gift of 100*l.*, there would have been no difficulty; but subsequently by her will and codicil (having no power by deed), she gave all the residue under circumstances which would have fallen within the cases of Wilson v. Piggott (sup.) and Rowley v. Rowley, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 846, irrespective of what was the effect of the authorities sixty or seventy years since noticed in Lord St. Leonard's Treatise and the case of Young v. Lord Waterpark (sup.) under the same power as in Rowley v. Rowley, and we have nothing now to do with illusory appointments; such a thing can hardly be now. Provided it is good at law, it is good in equity, it having previously been valid at law; but as I understand it, such appointments are called illusory by Lord St. Leonards, merely because small or illusory shares were given. If there are several objects of a power, and you do not appoint all the fund, but appoint something short of the whole, the rest going by default to the objects of the power, that will be valid: (Wilson v. Piggott, 2 Ves. Jun. 355). The rule is that if the several appointments do not exhaust, or nearly exhaust, the whole fund, that which is left only vitiates the appointment so far. It is very true that in some of the cases the appointments were by different instruments; so it was in Young v. Lord Waterpark (sup.); but I cannot think that Vice-Chancellor Shadwell attached much importance to it, and he held that only the last appointment was void, and the effect was that George, the last appointee, took nothing under the appointment, but came in in default after a series of appointments to his brothers and sisters. In Ranking v. Barnes (sup.), and all the cases there mentioned, in which the appointment was held void, the appointment was under a power to appoint among children; and two shares were appointed to one daughter and her husband, and it was held good as to the daughter, and bad as against her husband, and by this setting free a portion of the trust fund, it was left to devolve as unappointed, and that removed all objection, since every object of the power was entitled to something. [The Vice-Chancellor read passages from the judgment.] It is true there the appointment was by different instruments, but I cannot help thinking that the question whether an appointment is partly bad and partly good does not depend upon that, but whether, by a reasonable construction, it can be made to amount to the same thing. Here it would have the effect of absolutely frustrating the whole intention, and the question is, whether it should be so absolutely frustrated or in part only; and, if I can carry the leading intention into effect, is it not better that I should hold that one part is good than that the whole is bad? It is no doubt good down to a particular part, and entirely good if it had stopped there. (The Vice-Chancellor referred to the will.) There is a residuary bequest, by which she evidently intended the objects to take not only what was left unappointed; but she meant to give to Frances her own residuary estate. The rational construction is to say that, so far as she has given what was her own, it is valid, but so far as she has appointed it is invalid. I do it on the broad ground of intention. I think that is the result of all the cases except White v. Wilson (sup.), in which there was not an exclusive power, but there was an obligation to give something to each of three children; but the will gave 500*l.* to one, 1*l.* to another (B.), and the residue to C., and there was, therefore, an intention to give something to every one, but a blank left for some reason, and the question was whether the whole was invalid. It may admit of considerable doubt, what was the intention of leaving the blank? The case is a peculiar one. There was a gift of 500*l.*; so far it was good; but then came the blank. On these grounds, therefore, I shall hold the appointment valid, except as to the residue; and there must be a declaration accordingly. All that is not appointed by the preceding part of the will goes in default of appointment; costs out of the appointed fund.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by W. H. BENNET, Esq., and Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Jan. 26.

MOYE v. SPARROW.

Building society—Rules—Powers of borrowing—Promissory note made by committee—Composition-deed without cessio bonorum—Position of trustee.

The members of the committee of a building society borrowed money from their bankers for purposes not strictly within their borrowing powers, and gave a promissory note for the amount borrowed. Soon after the transaction the company suspended business. On bill filed by one of the members of the committee who signed the note, against the bankers and the other members of the society to ascertain his liability:

Held, that only the persons who signed the note, and the persons who authorised the signatures, were jointly and severally liable to make good the amount.

One of the parties liable on the note had, some time previous to the filing of this bill, executed a composition deed containing no cessio bonorum, and the trustee of this deed was made a defendant in this suit:

Held, that as the composition-deed contained no cessio bonorum, the trustee ought not to have been made a party to the suit; and that the debtor himself should have been made a defendant.

The plaintiff in this suit, William Moye, was a member of a society called the Halstead and North Essex Permanent Benefit Building and Endowment Association and Savings Institution, formed pursuant to the Act of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 32. The objects and method of management of this society were defined by certain rules, of which the following were the most important:

1. The intents and purposes for which this society is intended to be established are declared to be, to raise by monthly subscriptions from its members, in shares of the ultimate value of 50*l.* each, a stock or fund to enable each member of the society to receive out of the funds thereof, an advance of the amount or value of his share thereon, for the purpose of erecting a dwelling-house or purchasing a freehold, leasehold, or copyhold house, or either real or leasehold estate, to be secured by way of mortgage to the society until the amount or value of his share shall have been fully repaid to the society with interest or redemption money thereon, and also all fines and all other payments incurred in respect thereof.

2. The business and affairs of the society shall be conducted and carried on by and under the management and control of the following officers, namely, three trustees, a committee of not less than eight or more than fifteen members, a solicitor, two auditors, a banker and a treasurer, an actuary, a manager, and a secretary.

The defendant Sparrow, and two other gentlemen since deceased, were appointed trustees, and Messrs. Sparrow, Round, and Co., of which firm the defendant Sparrow was a partner, were appointed bankers and treasurers of the society. Rule 8 of the society provided that—

The trustees shall do no act in their official capacity but by the written order and authority of the committee, such order to be signed by the chairman of the meeting at which such order is made, and one other of the members then present, and to be attested by the secretary.

4. For the transaction of the usual monthly and general business of the committee, three elected members shall be a quorum.

13. Any member desiring an advance before he is entitled to it by rotation, and before the funds in hand from subscriptions and repayments are sufficient for the purpose, may be accommodated therewith, "provided the society can obtain a loan for such purpose, and provided such a member agrees to pay additional interest for a stated period, or until such advance can be made from the funds of the society," and in such case preference shall be given to any member who shall procure a loan for the society to meet his required advance.

20. Any member not having received an advance who may be desirous of withdrawing from the society, must send a written notice to the manager of his intention so to do, at least seven days before the usual monthly meeting, and such withdrawal will be regulated as follows: No withdrawal to be permitted unless in case of death, lunacy, or insanity, under twelve months from the date of such member's admission; provided always that the payment of any debts due from the society shall, if required, be made before any share can be withdrawn, and under all circumstances the sums paid for withdrawals shall in no case exceed the income derived from the repayment of shares already advanced to members; and withdrawn shares (not wholly subscribed for) shall be paid out in rotation according to the date of application for their withdrawal. And in case the expenses of the society and any loss sustained by it exceed the moneys appropriated to the management and contingent fund all shares so to be withdrawn shall be chargeable with a due proportion of such excess according to the number of years such shares shall have been in force, and this rule shall equally apply to members cancelling their unadvanced shares previously to taking a loan from the society.

24. The expenses of management and any losses that may be incurred by the society shall be defrayed out of the management and contingent fund, but if such expenses and losses be greater than the amount of such management or contingent fund the excess shall be borne equally by the holders of all advanced shares, and also of all unadvanced shares at the time of such deficiency not wholly paid up for five, ten, or fifteen years respectively as the case may be, in proportion to the number and amount of such shares respectively held by each, and according to the number of years the same shall have been in force.

The plaintiff Moye was the holder of five fully paid-up unadvanced shares in this society. The defendants, Cheverton and Nokes, were the holders of unadvanced shares not fully paid-up, and Dunt and Arnold were members of the society in respect of advanced shares held by them, and in respect of which certain sums of money were due to the society.

On the 14th Dec. 1855, at a meeting of the committee of the society, at which the plaintiff and several of the defendants were present, the following resolution was passed:

Resolved—that the committee do, and they are hereby fully authorised and empowered to borrow and take up at interest, not exceeding 5l. per cent. per annum, from any person or persons willing to lend and advance the same, any sum or sums not exceeding in the whole the sum of 2000l., for the purposes of the society, and that the same when so borrowed be immediately paid by the committee to the treasurer of the society, to the credit of the society, and that the funds and assets of the society be at all times liable to and answerable for the money so borrowed and paid over in pursuance of this resolution, and that any five or more of the said committee be, and they are fully authorised hereby and empowered to join in the security on behalf of themselves and other the members of the committee, for the repayment of such advances, and be fully indemnified therefrom out of the funds and assets of the said society.

The society, being in want of money, borrowed 200l. from J. Stubbing, for which amount they gave a promissory note made by Moye, Hustler, Clark, Barnard, and Crisp, all of whom were members of the committee.

On the 14th Jan. 1867, Barnard executed a deed of composition in the manner required by the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, of which John Nicholls was the trustee. The committee also borrowed from Stubbing 800l. in addition to the 200l. secured to him by the note.

In August 1868 Stubbing commenced an action against the plaintiff in the Court of Queen's Bench to recover the 200l., with interest due on the note; and the plaintiff, being advised that he had no defence to the action, paid Stubbing 229l. 13s. 4d. for principal, interest, and costs. Stubbing also required payment of the 800l., and accordingly a special committee meeting of the society was held on the 14th Feb. 1861, at which the plaintiff Moye and the defendant Morris and one Robert Sargeant were present, the following resolutions were passed:

That the committee do and they are hereby fully authorised to borrow and take up at the current rate of interest the sum of 800l. for the purposes of the society, and that the same, when so borrowed, be immediately paid by the committee to the treasurer of the society to the credit of the society, and that the funds and assets of the society be at all times liable to, and answerable for the sums so borrowed and paid over in pursuance of this resolution; and that any three or more of the said committee be and are hereby fully authorised and empowered to join in the security on behalf of themselves and other members of the committee for the repayment of such advances, and be fully indemnified therefrom out of the funds and assets of the society.

That the sum of 800l. be forthwith paid to Mr. John Stubbing in discharge of the note of hand due to him from this society for that amount.

That in the event of the bankers of the said society, Messrs. Sparrow and Co., advancing the said sum of 800l., the committee be and are authorised hereby to deposit their title-deeds and writings of the said society as a security for the repayment thereof, and for any other sums of money which may be now due to the said bankers.

The money was advanced by the bankers and paid to Stubbing, and the repayment thereof, together with the sum of 450l. previously advanced, was secured by a promissory note for the sum of 1250l. made by the plaintiff Moye, and by Portway, Hustler and Sargeant, all members of the committee, and given with the privity and authority of Morris. They also deposited with the bankers, by way of equitable mortgage, the title-deeds then in their possession of certain cottages and houses mortgaged to the society by its members to secure repayment of advances made to them, together with the following memorandum:—

We, the undersigned, William Moye, of Halstead, in the county of Essex, innkeeper, Charles Portway, of the same place, ironmonger, William Octavius Hustler, of the same place, gentleman, and Robert Sargeant, of the same place, baker, four of the members of the committee of the Halstead and North Essex Permanent Benefit Building Society, do hereby declare that we have previously to the signing hereof deposited in the hands of Messrs. Sparrow, Tuffnell, and Co., of Chelmsford, Braintree, and elsewhere, in the county of Essex, bankers, the several deeds and writings relating to the premises mentioned in the schedule hereunder written, as and by way of security for the sum of 1250l., in which we are now indebted to them upon a certain promissory note, bearing even date herewith, and borrowed by us of them as members of the said society, and for and on behalf of the said society, or upon the general banking account of the said society overdrawn, or which may at any time hereafter be due by the said society to them.

Some portions of the property comprised in the equitable mortgage were sold, and the proceeds were applied by the defendant Sparrow towards payment of the debt of 1250l. The bankers alleged that there was still a sum of 650l. due on the promissory note, for which they threatened to sue the plaintiff at law. The bankers also alleged that they had given up the memorandum of deposit to the secretary of the society, and that the deeds were locked up with other muniments of the society in a box which the bankers held, and of which they had not the key.

Sargeant became insolvent in 1867. The business of the society had been suspended since Sept. 1867, but as the members of the society were less than seven in number, it could not be wound-up upon a petition under the Companies Act 1862.

The defendants had threatened to sue the plaintiff at law, and the bill in this suit prayed that they might be restrained by injunction from proceeding at law against the plaintiff in respect of the promissory note for 1250l.; that the note should be corrected so as to express the true agreement and intention of the parties; that an account might be taken of all dealings between the society and the defendant Sparrow as the trustee thereof, and the bankers as treasurers and bankers of the society; that the validity of the equitable mortgage might be determined; that provision might be made for payment of the note for 1250*l.*, and any other sums due to the bankers, and for the amounts due to the plaintiff and other creditors of the society out of the assets thereof, and by means of contributions from persons liable as contributories to the society; and that in the event of the assets and contributions proving inadequate for the satisfaction of the debts, the rights and liabilities of the plaintiff and the other makers of the note might be ascertained and declared, and that the bankers should assign to the plaintiff and his co-sureties all securities in their hands, and that the society might be wound-up.

Kay, Q. C., Fry, Q. C., and L. Field for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff was entitled to an assignment of all the securities which the bankers held, including the equitable mortgage. The plaintiff and his co-makers of the promissory notes signed them only as agents for the society. The bank had always dealt with the society so as to accept them as the principal debtors and in exoneration of the personal liability of the makers, and therefore the defendants should be restrained from suing the plaintiff at law on the note for 1250*l.*

Kay, Q. C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case several authorities have been cited; many of them, indeed, of great interest, and some of them of not a little difficulty. It is necessary to treat them seriatim. First of all the question arises (and it is the foundation of a great part of this case), What powers this society had to borrow money? The only power of borrowing which this society had is the one contained in the 13th clause, to which my attention has been called. [The Vice-Chancellor read the clause to the effect above stated, and continued:] Now I am of opinion that, under that section, no loan could be properly raised by the managing body of the society so as to bind the society, unless it was a loan made for the purpose of lending to a member who agreed to pay an additional interest for a stated period, or until such advance should be made out of the funds of the society. That is to say, it is quite clear, in point of law, that these societies have no unlimited power of borrowing. They have powers of borrowing for the special purposes indicated by their constitution, if those purposes do not violate any principle of law; but those powers of borrowing can only be for those special purposes, and within those limits. I am of opinion, therefore, that no loan borrowed for the payment of debts, or otherwise than for the purpose of making an advance to a member desirous of obtaining a loan, is justifiable under this deed. Then the loans in question appear to me to be not justified according to the view I have taken of the powers of the society. There is no suggestion that the loans were made for any other purpose than that of paying some debts and expenses incurred in the management of the society. At all events, there is no suggestion in evidence which makes them otherwise than a general loan borrowed for the general purposes of the society. Indeed, some of them were borrowed for the purpose of paying off debts. That being so, it appears to me that, upon the mere transaction of loan itself, no liability could be attached by the committee to those special members of the society who remained liable under the particular clause to which I am now about to refer. The deed, after having provided for the mode in which several persons could withdraw and cease to have any connection with the society, either in respect of interest or liability, proceeds, by the 24th clause, to show how the expenses of management, and any losses that may be incurred by the society, shall be defrayed. [The Vice-Chancellor read the clause, to the effect above stated, and continued:] That clause seems to me to have made it the duty of the committee to have inquired and ascertained the loss whenever it occurred; and they could not, by borrowing money to pay off a creditor, and so postponing the inquiry from year to year, alter the class of persons upon whom the burden of payment would fall. Suppose, for instance, that a loss occurs in one year, and then, instead of ascertaining it and throwing it upon the persons who are liable in that year, moneys are borrowed from the bankers, or from some other sources; suppose that the debts are paid and discharged, that members change their positions, withdraw or cease to be advanced members, and get their property, it is suggested that ultimately, after going on in that course of dealing for years, the two or three persons who are found at last to be in the position of holders of unadvanced shares, not fully paid up, or to be the holders of advanced shares in respect of which sums of money are due, are to be the persons liable to make good all the losses incurred during the preceding years, and which have been, from time to time, defrayed by means of borrowing money from some source or other. That shows how necessary it is to adhere to the rule of borrowing, that no money is to be borrowed except for the purpose of making an advance to a member. If that had been done the thing would have kept itself right; there would have always been the receipts and payments, if there was no balance; and there would have been a deficiency immediately ascertained, if a deficiency had arisen by reason of any default of a member, or of the expenses of the society exceeding the net receipts. But if there is no power of borrowing money, of course the members would be called upon to provide ready money for the purpose of meeting the deficiency. That really should have been the course of management of this society, for the neglect of which no person seems to me to be more answerable than the plaintiff himself, who was one of the most active of the committeemen who had the management of the society. That being so, I am of opinion that the plaintiff has no remedy whatever upon the allegations and proofs of this case against the defendants Elizabeth Cheverton, Abraham Nokes, William Dunt, or William Arnold in respect of his liability upon the two promissory notes, or the promissory notes to which he has been made a party. Then I am also of opinion that there is no case made for relief against the bankers. The bankers were the treasurers and bankers of the society, which really comes to the same thing. They kept a regular pass-book, which was passed to and fro between the bank and the committee meetings of the society, and was regularly seen by them; and there is no evidence of any inaccuracy in that account, or anything to prevent its being dealt with as an ordinary banker's account, settled by the pass-book passing to and fro. It seems to me that any creditor of any person might as well have called on the bankers of that person to have the account taken. That is with respect to the general account. Nothing turns, as it appears to me, upon the 1200*l.*; that is a matter which has really been disposed of. They have given credit for 650*l.* If there was any doubt in respect of that, it would have been a matter to have been tried at law. It seems that 650*l.* has been in the course of the discussion admitted to be due to the bankers at law, at all events in respect of their claim upon that instrument. That being so, and as there is no relief against the holders of the shares, and none against the bankers in respect of the account, we must consider what can be done with regard to what is called the equitable mortgage. Now the equitable mortgage stands thus: Certain members of the committee in 1861 deposited the title-deeds of the society with the bank by way of equitable mortgage. As I understand, the only title-deeds the society had were the title-deeds of their borrowers, which were deposited with them as mortgages for the purposes of the society, and according to the rules of the society; and every person who had made such a deposit was entitled to receive his deed back upon paying what was due as between him and the society in respect of his advances and other contributions. That was the nature of the security which was given to the bank. It was a security given by way of the holdings of those mortgages. I do not see, at present, the answer to the suggestion of Mr. Eddis, that the bankers should not have received the money, because the money, according to the very constitution, was to be paid by the borrower direct to the society by monthly payment. But, however that may be, I should say that I entertain more than a doubt whether it was competent to any officers, committee men, or others, of the society, to make any such deposit of the deeds. I see nothing whatever authorising it in the rules of the society; and I have doubts, and more than doubts, whether a meeting of a special committee, at which the plaintiff and John Morris and Robert Sargent were present, was sufficient to authorise the deposit of the deeds. It stands thus—I mean for the purposes of the hearing of this cause: By the bill in the suit it is simply alleged that the bankers have realised the security, to some extent, by receiving a certain sum of money; and credit is claimed for that sum of money. Then there comes a paragraph in the prayer of the bill, asking that the bankers may be ordered to give up all securities in their possession. The bankers answer that by saying "We have no securities in our possession whatever; it is very true we had those securities, but we have given up the written memorandum to the secretary of the society; and as to the deeds, they are now in a box of the society locked up, of which box we have not got the key; but which box and deeds we hold with the other muniments of the society." That is stated by the answer to the original bill; the bill was afterwards amended, and no case is made by the amended bill against the bankers that they have done anything wrong in so giving up the securities or the deeds to the society. Therefore, it appears to me that no relief can be given now in respect of the equitable mortgage. In truth it comes to be a matter of the smallest possible moment. It appears there is nothing due except in respect of some one of those "advanced persons" (whatever that may mean) of the name of Dunt. That is the only sum that really is due in respect of any of the securities which were in the bankers' hands. That, I think, disposes of the question as to the bankers. But very different considerations arise with regard to the persons who are members of the committee, and the others who authorised the making of the securities themselves. First of all, I will take the security of the 14th Dec. 1855. There is no doubt that the intention of all these persons was that the funds and assets of the society should be the first funds to be resorted to; for they all expected that the society would be a flourishing society, and would have funds and assets to meet its liabilities. I have no doubt the bankers and everyone at that time thought the same thing. That is sufficient to dispose of the objection that the agreement between the plaintiff and his co-makers, and also of the bankers in taking the notes, was that the makers of the note should sign it only as agents for and on behalf of the society. There seems no doubt that they did sign it as agents on behalf of the society, and the bankers took it in that sense. I have held that they had no right to do so on behalf of the society. They not only did it as agents on behalf of the society, but there was also this—it was never intended that some members of the committee should make themselves more liable than the others. That was the act of the committee; and it was mere accident apparently, and mere matter of convenience, as to which members of the committee should sign the security. Then when the five members signed that note—or whatever it may be called—of the 18th April 1857, and signed it "on behalf of themselves and others the members of the said committee," they signed that which they were duly authorised by the resolution of the members who were present at the meeting of the 14th Feb. 1855, to sign. I hold, that as between the persons who signed, and the persons who authorised that signature, they are all jointly and severally liable to make good that amount, and, therefore, to indemnify the plaintiff to the extent to which he has been called upon to overpay that note. Then the case as to Mr. Barnard stands on peculiar grounds. It has been contended before me that Mr. Barnard was the man who ought to have been here; and that Mr. Nicholls is not a proper person, either in respect of the debt or in respect of his own character, to be drawn into this litigation. I am of opinion that that contention is right. Nicholls is not the person who ought to have been made a party to this suit. I think that the decisions in the Court of Bankruptcy to which I have been referred are, if I may say so, based on a very sound principle; and that you cannot apply the 197th section of the Bankruptcy Act to every case of composition-deed. When you talk of trustees and persons of that kind, you must have regard to what trustees they are, and for what purpose they are appointed, and that a deed in which there is no cessio bonorum, stands in a very different position to a deed in which there is a cessio bonorum. In this case Nicholls was never trustee of any property or effects whatsoever of the quasi bankrupt. He had no right to call upon him to assign a particle of his property; he had no right to interfere with him in the management of his business, or estate, or effects. That is to say, he was still further removed from the character of an assignee in bankruptcy than an ordinary inspector is, because, in all inspectorship-deeds which I have seen, there is a clause enabling the inspector to turn himself into a trustee if he should think fit, by calling on the debtor to assign the property to him. In this case, Nicholls was not a trustee of the deed, except in this way, that he was a trustee of the covenant by which the debtor Barnard covenanted that he would, within fourteen days after the registration of the deed of composition, pay all his creditors; and he was merely a name, as it were, by which the man could be more conveniently sued, or by which the money could be more conveniently paid for distribution. Nicholls says that "up to that time I received everything and I discharged everything, and I settled with Barnard, with whom I completed the whole of the arrangement." Then, moreover, this is further contended—and I think with propriety—that this is not a debt within the meaning of the deed. He was not a creditor, although it was an absolute contract upon which Mr Barnard could have sued by the holders of the promissory note. There could be no demand, except after notice or demand, in writing for three months, and that could never have been a debt capable of being discharged or paid within fourteen days after the registration of the deed. Then, again, no liability to the present plaintiff could have arisen until the present plaintiff had paid the debt. I am of opinion that that clause in the Bankruptcy Act to which my attention has been called could by no possibility of construction be incorporated into the provisions of such a deed as this. You could not put it into the deed consistently with the general provision and intent of the deed. Therefore, I am of opinion that no relief can be given against Mr Nicholls. Then with regard to the larger note—the note for 1250*l.*—upon the same ground that I have already held with regard to the others, viz., that the persons who signed the note, and Morris, who admits that he was a member of the committee which authorised the making of the note—those persons are all liable to contribute equally to the payment of that note, and there must be a declaration of their liability accordingly. With regard to the costs of the suit, I am not disposed to give the bankers any, because they were mixed up a good deal with these transactions, which I have held to have been irregular. They were bankers and members of the society. They were mixed up with the irregularity of the loan transaction; and they are very lucky to get, as they have got, back the whole amount they lent. I shall not, therefore, give the bankers any costs. With respect to Cheverton, Nokes, Dunt, and the others, they have not incurred any very considerable costs. But they have joined to some extent with the bankers, and I will not give them any costs. With regard to the others whom I have held liable, their costs and the costs of the plaintiff will be added together, so as to form part of the money which is ultimately to be contributed between them. Then, with regard to Nicholls, he must be dismissed with costs, as I think he ought not to have been brought here. It will be necessary to make a special provision with regard to Barnard's share, because, although it is only a share of the 200*l.*, the plaintiff has dismissed the bill against him.

MOYE v. SPARROW.

GREENOCK ELECTION PETITION.

[ELECT. PET.]

GREENOCK ELECTION PETITION.

Saturday, Feb. 13, 1869.

Polling places—Irregularity—Miscarriage—Communication of polling booth with public house—Duties of town clerk.

The simple fact that a polling booth communicated with a public house :

Held to be no ground for objecting to the validity of the return.

It was alleged against the validity of the return that the sheriff had improperly apportioned the polling districts :

Held, that the statutory provisions as to polling places are difficult to read together, so as to declare what precisely are the duties of the sheriff, but that even had there been an illegality committed in this respect, it was not of sufficient weight to upset the election.

The town clerk having express duties to perform in connection with the election :

Held, that information and assistance and advice rendered by him to the sheriff could not affect the return.

The statutory provisions discussed, and Semble, the sheriff has a latitude in fixing upon the polling places.

LORD BARCAPLE (after some introductory remarks) said:—The portion of the case which has been the subject of a supplementary argument at the end of the proceedings is so entirely separate from the rest of it, that I think I shall most conveniently deal with it by expressing my opinion upon that matter at first, before going into the other things which require a consideration of the evidence. The facts of the case upon that part of it are substantially not disputed; and the question is, in so far as I have to consider it, simply whether there was such a miscarriage at the last election in Greenock, in reference to the arrangements of polling places and of polling districts, as has vitiated and invalidated the election. Except for the purpose of determining that question, it is unnecessary that I should either direct my mind to the subject, or pronounce any opinion upon it. There were objections stated to the course taken by the sheriff in this matter, some of which have not been referred to in the argument, which I may just state, because it will be satisfactory to the parties, I think, that I should allude, in a single word, to the whole of them. There was first of all an objection taken in respect that it was alleged that one of the polling booths or rooms, in the first ward, I think it was, was connected with a public house; that is to say, that there was direct access from the one to the other. That, I think, has been disproved in point of fact. I believe, if I remember rightly, it was not stated in the original petition. I ruled, therefore, that it could not be gone into as a separate subject of investigation. But in the course of the investigation into other matters it did appear (and I think it is just as well that it should have appeared), that in point of fact there was not, in my judgment, at least, any ground whatever for having entertained that objection. Then it was objected that the sheriff, in the course of making those arrangements, had communicated with, and taken more or less the assistance and advice of, the town clerk; and that was said to have been objectionable, I suppose, the more especially from some idea that, as one of the candidates was, or had recently been, the provost of the burgh (and I believe he was still the provost of the burgh at the date of the election), there was a sort of impropriety in communicating with the town clerk upon that ground. I certainly cannot conceive that this is a matter, however, upon which I could base my judgment to the effect that there was an illegality committed. But I may say, that upon that point of the case I have no doubt whatever. The town clerk has express duties to perform in this matter of the providing of places in which to poll; and by the very last provision which we have upon the subject, that in the Reform Act of last year, new duties are imposed upon him, or new instructions are given to him, which imply that he is still a public officer responsibly charged with some duties in this matter, who is bound to discharge them aright, and who will be looked to as the party responsible to do so. I cannot conceive that the sheriff did anything that could be looked upon as illegal in communicating with that public officer. He was entitled to have his assistance. He was entitled to require from him all the assistance which he, as town clerk of the burgh, could give him in the matter; and I must assume, and no reason has been suggested why I should not assume, that he might have relied upon him, and probably did rely upon him, with entire and, for anything I know or believe, well-grounded confidence, that he would get nothing but such assistance in the matter as one responsible public officer ought to give to another. From the very outset of the present system of election, the town clerk has been a person who was charged with duties in the matter of providing polling places in burghs. Indeed, originally, by the Reform Act of 1832, he was the sole party who had any functions to perform in that respect, and he was to make the division. I do not know whether it was suggested at the Bar or not; but I do not understand, or think that the 27th section of the original Reform Act has been repealed. It has been modified and added to by supplementary provisions in subsequent Acts; but I think it remains there as the basis of the whole thing; showing that the town clerk is a person who, as he has duties to perform in the matter, might well be consulted and called upon to give advice by the sheriff. Then, the third ground of objection, and that which has been the subject of argument, is in regard to the arrangements which were made by the sheriff; and those, as I understand them, seem to have been of this kind: that taking the wards as they had been fixed last year, I mean in 1868, under the provisions of the Act for dividing burghs into wards, it being, in point of fact, identical, or nearly so, with the wards which have prevailed here ever since the time of the Municipal Reform Act in 1834, I think it was, the sheriff did not, while he increased the number of polling places or polling booths (call them which you will), increase the number of districts, but appointed a certain number of rooms or other places at which the poll was to be taken within each one of those districts. In the first district, which is the largest, he appointed four; and then it is said, and I understand it to be quite admitted in point of fact, that further, in appointing those polling places within that district he did not assign the persons being voters, living within particular portions of each district, to each new polling place, but he divided the entire list of voters in the district by taking them alphabetically, and transferring a portion of the alphabet to one polling place and another portion of the alphabet to a second, and so on. Now, it is said, and was argued with great ingenuity and with great force by Mr. Christie, that that is not acting upon a sound construction of the statutory provisions upon which this matter proceeds. I do not think it is incumbent upon me at present to pronounce any judgment upon that point. Those are provisions which I rather think are not easily all read together; and if my memory does not deceive me, even so long ago as very soon after the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, it was found that upon that subject, in the 27th clause of it there were provisions which it was difficult to work out and difficult to read together, and especially difficult to apply in burghs as in counties. The truth of the matter is, that "polling places," with reference to counties, is an expression which has always had, and to some extent always must have, a somewhat different meaning from that which it has to burghs. A polling place in a county is very commonly a town—and within that town, no matter where the polling booth may be situated, it is still at the same polling place. But then there is nothing of that sort in ordinary burghs, unless you conceive that which has not, I believe, in Scotland been at all common, that you have in one of the central burghs a particular public place, which has by use or by misapprehension of the statute from 1832 downwards, been always used as the polling place of that burgh. But the much more ordinary thing, and that which the statutes, even in their more recent provisions, seem to point to is, that in burghs the place for taking the poll must necessarily be more or less fluctuating, because it is either to be a temporary booth erected where the public authorities may find a convenient space for doing so, which disappears whenever the election is over, or it is to be a room hired for the purpose from any person who has a room convenient to be hired for that purpose at that time, that is to say, it is very generally either a booth upon a piece of ground which may happen to be vacant at the time, or it is a shop or room or other building which at the time happens to be untenanted. That implies that necessarily there must be some degree of fluctuation; and, therefore, I do not know that I can say that I think that there is any very precise rule which can be adopted by the public officers who have the charge of carrying out those provisions. I rather think that he has a latitude. I have no doubt it has always been acted upon, and I rather think that that latitude is within the statutes themselves. But the real question which I have to decide is, whether anything has been done in this matter by the sheriff upon the present occasion which is to invalidate the election. Now that is a very serious question indeed. To invalidate an election—to put a town, and a large town, with a great population, and a vast number of voters like this, to the necessity of having a second election in consequence of a mere miscarriage, is no light thing; because I must, of course, look at this matter altogether apart from the rest of the case, and I must treat this exactly as if there were no other complaint at all except of this as an illegality committed. Now, in the first place, I am by no means satisfied that there was any illegality at all; but, in the next place, I am quite satisfied that if there was to any extent, a contravention of those statutory provisions, if they were not carried out precisely (for that is, as it appears to me, the utmost that can be said about it), they are provisions of such a kind that it would require that something much more should be made out than merely that they were transgressed in good faith, and without any serious consequence, in order to invalidate an election. Whether I look to any evidence which is before me, or to anything which is suggested by the nature of the question which arises upon this alleged miscarriage, it appears to me that there is not the slightest ground to believe that it did, to any extent, affect the fairness of the election which was held here in November. I cannot see how it should have done so. On the contrary, although I am not bound to judge of that, and do not judge of it, and certainly am not in a good position to judge of it, nevertheless I see nothing whatever to lead to the conclusion that the sheriff is not perfectly right, at least in this: that his arrangements were such as were best calculated for bringing about those ends—of a tranquil and quiet, and an easily managed election, which it was his duty, as sheriff of the county, so far as he interfered or had to interfere in the matter, to endeavour to accomplish. Upon these grounds, into which need not go more fully, I have no hesitation in holding that, in so far as any question arises before me here, there has not been a ground made out, in respect to this matter of the polling places, on which I could hold that the sitting member was not duly returned. If there is any question in regard to this matter beyond that, it is not a question for this place, but it is a matter which I presume the sheriffs of Scotland have had occasion to consider before, and in regard to which what has taken place at present may lead them to reconsider and to take the best and most authoritative advice, and, if necessary, to get some more clear statutory provisions, in order to put an end to all possible doubt upon the subject.

REG. v. GARLAND.

On the other evidence as to the allegations in the petition, the learned judge decided in favour of the respondent.

Common Law Courts.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Reported by T. W. SAUNDERS and J. SHORTT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Friday, Jan. 28.

REG. v. GARLAND.

Copyholds—Administrator—Application by trustees who had not disclaimed for admittance of infant heir—Mandamus—Effect of devise of copyholds—Wills Act (7 Will. 4, & 1 Vict. c. 26), s. 3.

A copyholder devised his copyhold tenements and hereditaments to three persons, who were also his executors, upon certain trusts contained in the will. One of the three trustees by deed disclaimed the trusts, and the other two proved the will. Application was made to the lord of the manor to have the infant heir-at-law of the testator admitted on the court rolls of the manor, and this having been refused on the ground that the devisees were the proper parties to be admitted.

Application was made for a mandamus to compel the admittance of the heir. In discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus:

Held, that in the exercise of their discretion, the court would not lend its process in a case where the application was not made bonâ fide on the part of the heir, but only for the purpose of defeating the claim of the lord to a double fine, and where the effect of granting the application would be to enable the trustees to evade the performance of the trusts of the will.

Semble, per Cockburn, C. J. and Mellor, J.—Sect. 3 of the Wills Act (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 26), which enables all property to be disposed of by will, including customary freeholds and copyholds without surrender and before admittance, has not the effect of making copyholds pass directly to the devisee; and the heir remains entitled until the devisee claims to be admitted.

Per Lush, J.—The section was intended to make copyholds pass directly to the devisee in the same manner as freeholds.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained by Philbrick in Trinity Term 1869, calling on Edgar Walter Garland, lord of the manor of Wix Park Hall, and Wrabness in the county of Essex, and his steward of the said manor, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them, commanding them to hold a court and admit William Gould Busk by his guardians as tenant to the copyholds holden of the said manors respectively by Edward Thomas Busk deceased, to whom the said William Gould Busk is customary heir.

From the affidavit filed in support of the motion the following facts appeared.

Edward Thomas Busk, deceased, was, on or about the 5th Dec. 1810, admitted as tenant by copy of court roll to certain tenements, containing eighty acres or thereabouts, copyhold of the manor of Wix Park Hall, in the county of Essex, to hold the same to the said Edward Thomas Busk and his heirs, according to the custom of the said manor.

On the 2nd May 1856 the said Edward Thomas Busk, deceased, was admitted tenant by copy of court roll to a certain tenement called Northey, containing fifty acres or thereabouts, also copyhold of the aforesaid manor of Wix Park Hall, to hold the same to him and his heirs according to the custom of the said manor; and on the same day he was also admitted to a tenement called Skipps, containing twenty-eight acres or thereabouts copyhold of the manor of Wrabness in the said county of Essex, to hold the same tenements to the same Edward Thomas Busk and his heirs according to the custom of the said last-mentioned manor. In each of these manors the customary descent is to the youngest son.

The said Edward Thomas Busk died on the 19th Jan. 1868 seised of all the aforesaid copyhold hereditaments and tenements, and leaving William Gould Busk his youngest son and heir to all the said copyhold tenements according to the respective customs of the aforesaid two manors, him surviving, and having by will appointed his widow, his brother, and his nephew guardians of his infant children.

The infant Wm. Gould Busk, by his guardian, claimed admittance to the aforesaid copyholds and hereditaments. General courts baron for both of the said manors, were held within the same according to custom on the 11th June 1869, and Edward Henry Busk, the nephew of Edward Thomas Busk, deceased, as guardian of the infant William Gould Busk, attended the same on his behalf and prayed the lord of the said manor, by his steward, to admit the said William Gould Busk as such customary heir to the said copyholds, tenements, and hereditaments according to the custom of the said manors respectively, and claimed such admittance. The lord by his steward acknowledged the fact of the heirship of the said William Gould Busk according to the custom of the said manors, but refused to admit him as claimed, or at all to any of the aforesaid hereditaments or tenements. The ground of the refusal alleged by the lord is that stated in the following extract from the minutes of the court rolls of what occurred at such courts, and was identical in the case of each of the aforesaid manors, such minutes being prepared prior to the said court so as to raise the question hereinafter stated. The extract is as follows:—

At this court, the homage present, an official extract from the will and codicils of the late Edward Thomas Busk, a copyhold tenant of this manor, whose death was presented at a court held on the 19th June 1868, whereby it appears that the said Edward Thomas Busk devised his copyhold hereditaments held of this manor, of which he died seised, to Henry William Busk, Hans Busk, and Edward Henry Busk. Also at this court the third proclamation is made on the death of the said Edward Thomas Busk and Edward Henry Busk, one of the guardians appointed by the will of the said Edward Thomas Busk on behalf of William Gould Busk, the youngest son and heir according to the custom of this manor, claims admittance to the said copyhold hereditaments, but the lord, by his steward, refuses to admit the said William Gould Busk on account of the devise contained in the said will of the said Edward Thomas Busk, and a precept to seize the said hereditaments for want of a tenant is awarded.

By his last will and testament bearing date the 22nd Nov. 1852, and by five several codicils thereto, the said Edward Thomas Busk, deceased, devised all the manors, messuages, lands, tenements, and real estate of every tenure of or to which he was or at the time of his death, should be seised, possessed, or entitled at law or in equity (except estates vested in him by way of trust or mortgage) unto and to the use of his brother Henry William Busk, and his nephew Edward Henry Busk, upon certain trusts, for the benefit of the testator's family.

The said Hans Busk, by deed-poll dated the 17th March 1868, disclaimed the devises, trusteeship, and guardianship to which by the said will and codicils he had been appointed; and the said Henry William Busk and Edward Henry Busk duly proved the will and codicils, but did not come in or claim admittance as such devisees in trust, but claimed to have the infant heir admitted. The object of taking that course was that the payment of a fine and a half, to which the lord of the manor would have been entitled, on the admission of the acting trustees might be avoided.

The refusal to admit the infant heir was based on the ground that a devise now operates under the Wills Act, as a direct transmission of estate in copyhold not less than in freehold, and that the heir's right of admission is, consequently, extinguished and barred, unless and until the devisees disclaimed.

Mellish, Q. C. and Herschell, now showed cause against the rule. The devisees in trust who had not disclaimed were the proper parties to claim admittance and to be admitted. The legal estate in the copyhold of the testator was vested in them by force of the will, and the heir took nothing. Sect. 3 of the Wills Act (7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 25) was intended to remove the inconveniences which previously existed in the mode of devising copyhold estates, when a surrender to the use of the will was necessary. It provides that the general power of devising property which that section gives in the case of other kinds of property "shall extend to all real estate of the nature of customary freehold or tenant right, or customary or copyhold, notwithstanding that the testator may not have surrendered the same to the use of his will, and, notwithstanding that being entitled as heir, devisee, or otherwise, to be admitted thereto, he shall not have been admitted thereto, or notwithstanding that the same, in consequence of the want of a custom to devise or surrender to the use of a will or otherwise, could not at law have been disposed of by will if this Act had not been made, or notwithstanding that the same, in consequence of there being a custom that a will or a surrender to the use of a will should continue in force for a limited time only, or any other special custom, could not have been disposed of by will, according to the power contained in this Act, if this Act had not been made." The intention of the Act was to pass the estate direct to the devisee or devisees under a will, and to enable the heir to be absolutely disinherited by a devise by making him a stranger to the estate. The Master of the Rolls, indeed, said in Paterson v. Paterson, L. Rep. 2 Eq. 86; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 320, "I am rather disposed to think that the view which Mr. Joshua Williams stated is the correct view, that in substance the copyhold descends to the heir subject to the right of the devisee to be admitted, there being no beneficial interest whatever in the heir." But sect. 3 of the Wills Act does not seem to have been cited or considered in that case. Steele v. Waller, 28 Beav. 466, is not inconsistent with the contention that the devisees are the proper parties to claim admittance. "Here," said the Master of the Rolls, "is a specific devise of the property in question, and therefore the legal estate in it passed to the devisees in trust named in the will. I do not understand that these trustees have disclaimed the devise or the trusts reposed in them, and, if so, the customary heir took nothing in the estate by descent. It is true that if the devisees did not present themselves when the proclamation was made by the lords for tenants to present themselves for admission, the heir had a right to be admitted, because if devisees do not choose to accept the devise, the heir, according to the custom, takes, and therefore the admittance of the heir was good, and that admittance conferred on him the legal estate." There has been no disclaimer in the present case by the devisees as there was in the case of Rex v. Wilson, 10 B. & Cres. 80, where the devisees having disclaimed, it was held that on the death of the testator the estate descended to his heir, and that as the devisees would not come in and be admitted he was entitled to admittance. The devisees in the present case were the proper persons to claim admittance, and this court should not lend its assistance to an attempt to deprive the lord of the double fine to which he is legally entitled. The Wills Act was not intended to interfere in any way with his right. Sect. 4 provides that the lord shall not lose the fines to which he would otherwise have been entitled in respect of the surrendering to the use of the will.

Joshua Williams, Q. C., and H. Tindal Atkinson, in support of the rule, contended that sect. 3 of the Wills Act was intended only to do away with the necessity of a surrender to the use of the will, but that the customary heir was still entitled, as having the legal estate, until the devisees under the will claimed to be admitted. In Rex v. The Masters of the Brewers Company, 3 B. & Cres. 172, it was held that the court would grant a mandamus to admit a copyholder who claims by descent. "The prosecutor," said the court, "as heir at law, is entitled to the writ; because, although he has a good title as against everyone but the lord, still he has a right to insist upon admittance, to make him a complete copyholder." In R. v. The Lord of the Manor of Hexham, 5 Ad. & El. 559, it was held that where two adverse parties claim title as devisees to the same copyhold, the steward may admit both, and, proper grounds being shown, this court will require him by mandamus to do so. In Doe v. Harrison, 6 Q. B. 631, the heir of copyhold lands not appearing on production, the lord seized quousque; afterwards the heir claimed, and the lord declining to admit him on the supposition that another party had title, the heir obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus to admit, and this rule was ultimately made absolute. "The lord is not," said Lord Denman, C. J., p. 636, "to seize and hold the land against the heir without showing that some person has claimed adversely. This was taken for granted in Doe v. Bellamy, 2 M. & S. 87. It is clear, on principle, that if proclamation is made, and the land seized till the heir comes in, and the heir afterwards does come, the lord cannot answer his claim by saying that parties who have not appeared are entitled. He is entitled to a mandamus because he is the heir, and there is no adverse title to prevent his admittance." [COCKBURN, C. J.—Is the lord though bound to admit the devisee, bound also to admit the heir?] The heir gets no beneficial interest by being admitted. The Master of the Rolls, in Paterson v. Paterson (ubi sup.) states the correct view to be "that in substance the copyhold descends to the heir, subject to the right of the devisee to be admitted, there being no beneficial interest whatever in the heir." Sect. 3 of the Wills Act was not intended to vest the legal estate in the devisees before they are admitted. Sect. 4, in providing that "where the testator was entitled to have been admitted to such real estate, and might, if he had been admitted thereto, have surrendered the same to the use of his will, shall not have been admitted thereto, no person entitled, or claiming to be entitled to such real estate in consequence of such will shall be entitled to be admitted to the same real estate by virtue thereof, except on payment of all such stamp duties, fees, fines, and sums of money as would have been lawfully due and payable in respect of the admittance of such testator, &c., implies the necessity of the devisees being admitted. In Wellesley v. Withers, 4 El. & Bl. 750, a copyhold was devised to three persons in fee, who were also appointed executors of the will, and the three proved the will, but two of them by deed released their interest to the third in order that she might be admitted alone. The lord of the manor claimed a treble fine and refused to admit, but this court held that he was entitled to a single fine only, and that the fact that all three devisees had proved the will did not prevent any of them from disclaiming the devise under it. "The cases," said Wightman, J. in delivering the judgment of the court, "as to trustees being liable to the trusts of a will by accepting the trusts as to some of the property, do not seem at all to affect the question of whether they may not renounce the legal estate, taking upon themselves any risk of a breach of trust, more particularly where, as in this case, there was no legal estate prima facie vested in them, but where they had a mere right to admittance which, according to a well known and proper practice, they give up in favour of one of their number for the purposes of the estate and to effect a saving." If the heir has a legal right to be admitted this court will not enter into a consideration of the trusts of the will, but will assist him to enforce his legal right by mandamus, where, as in the present case there is no fraud or suspicion of fraud, and the trustees are acting as they think best for the benefit of the estate. [LUSH, J. referred to Bence v. Gilpin, L. Rep. 3 Exch. 76; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 655, where it was held that a disclaimer by two out of three joint tenants, surrenderees of copyhold lands belonging to a manor, executed before the admittance of the remaining joint tenant, but after the exercise by all the three of various acts of ownership over the estate, is void, and that the lord is entitled to a fine as upon the admittance of the three; and the case of Wellesley v. Villiers was distinguished on the ground that the trustees had there effectually disclaimed. "There," said the Chief Baron, "four persons were entitled to real and personal property under a will, as devisees and executors. Three out of the four took out probate and assumed the character of executors. But as to the copyhold estate comprised in the will, two of these three, from the time of the testator's death, rejected and renounced it. They did no act whatever whence it might be inferred that they had taken the estate on themselves, and in due time they executed a disclaimer. That was, however a disclaimer in its true and proper sense. No man is bound to take an estate against his will, and they never had taken it."]

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule must be discharged. I do not ground that opinion upon any construction which I am prepared to put upon the 3rd section of the Wills Act. At present, I am disposed to agree with Mr. Williams, in the construction which he has put upon it, and to think that the intention of the Legislature was merely to dispense with the necessity of a surrender to the use of the will which was previously necessary, and not to vest the legal estate in the devisee before admission. If it were necessary to decide that question, in the present state of my mind upon it I should have thought the case a fit one for the mandamus to go, in order that on the return to it this nice question might be more fully considered, and if necessary the matter might be taken to a court of error. It is not, therefore, because I entertain a view adverse to Mr. Williams's contention as to this that I am prepared to refuse this mandamus. I rest my refusal entirely on the special circumstances of this case, and refuse it in the exercise of that discretion which I think it is competent to the court to exercise, and which I think it ought to exercise where the parties are not of right entitled to the process they seek for without the intervention of the court. The ground of my refusal is this, that this is not, in my opinion, an application made bonâ fide on behalf of the infant heir. I am satisfied that it is not; and the effect of granting it would be to enable the trustees to evade the performance of what it was the testator's desire they should perform. Their intention is quite plain: nay it is admitted and even contended, that it is lawful and deserving of approval on the part of the trustees that they should wish to have the heir-at-law admitted in order to defeat the lord of the manor of the additional fine to which he would otherwise be entitled. I say nothing as to whether that is a legitimate thing on the part of the trustees to endeavour to accomplish; but this case differs from all those which hitherto have called forth the exercise of the discretionary power of this court in this: that the application for a mandamus is made not in order to enforce a right of the heir-at-law, but simply to enable the trustees to defeat the legal claim of the lord of the manor; and it is quite plain that the heir-at-law, in whose name the trustees are now coming forward, is no more interested in the matter than any one person in court at the present moment. But it is not in that respect only that this case seems to me to differ from the cases referred to by Mr. Williams; for I look also at what would be the effect of granting the application, and in that respect, too, I think it will be found to differ most essentially from the cases cited. The effect of granting the application would be that the trustees would be enabled to evade the discharge of the obligations which the will of the testator casts upon them, and which a court of equity would enforce against them. By the will they are to take the copyhold estate of the deceased for the purpose of executing certain trusts. They can only acquire it, as I assume, on the construction of the 3rd section of the Wills Act, by going and getting themselves admitted on the court rolls of the manor. Now, by what they are doing they are virtually disclaiming their office of trustees, and they do not put the Court of Chancery in a position to substitute other trustees for them. Now, that is directly contrary to the intention of the testator. If he had thought it worth while to appoint them trustees for the purpose of merely doing what they are now seeking to do, he could easily have done it; but he has not done that. He has intended that they should be devisees under his will for the purpose of carrying out the trusts of the will. I say therefore that if we granted the present application we should be lending our process to bring about the effect—whether it is intended by the trustees or not—of enabling them to evade the performance of their trusts, and leaving the trusts to be performed by the infant heir, who, for aught we know, may be unable to exercise any discretion in the matter. I do not think we should lend our process for any such purpose as that. In the cases of Reg. v. Wilson and Lord Wellesley v. Withers (ubi sup.) the circumstances were altogether different. In the former case there were no trusts at all to be performed; the devisees under the will had disclaimed, and there was no person who had a right to say that they should not disclaim; therefore the heir-at-law was fully entitled to be admitted. The case is quite different where the parties cannot disclaim, and in the next place have not disclaimed. In such a case we should not assist them to divest themselves of their obligations. As to the case of Lord Wellesley v. Withers, the facts of that case were altogether different from those of the present. There was a devise in that case to three persons upon certain trusts, and, two having disclaimed, the third person was held entitled to be admitted on payment of a single fine. I do not think that case applies to the present case, in which the application is really not made at all on behalf of the heir of the testator. If two of the trustees in the present case had got rid of their trusts by disclaimer, and the third sought to be admitted, and the question was whether the lord of the manor was entitled to more than a single fine, that case would be in point; but as the circumstances are it has no application. Here we have trustees who have not disclaimed, and who, if they asked to be admitted, must of necessity have obtained admittance. I come back, then, to my first proposition, that where we see the application for admittance is made not bona fide on behalf of the person named, and that the effect of granting it would be to enable the trustees to abandon the duties which they ought to perform, we ought not to lend our process for such a purpose. It is quite a different thing to say that in this court no regard is to be paid to any equitable rights of the parties where the process of the court is obtainable ex debito justitiæ. This is not such a case, and for the reasons I have already stated, I think the rule must be discharged.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. If this case had depended on the construction to be put upon the 3rd section of the Wills Act, I certainly should not have consented to the rule being discharged, because I think the matter raises a very important question, and one of considerable difficulty. As at present advised, though in that respect I differ in opinion from my brother Lush, I agree with my Lord in the construction which he has put upon that section, and confess that Mr. Williams has by his argument induced me to alter the opinion which at first I entertained as to the more enlarged construction to be put upon the section. On the other point, I confess, though I am not prepared to dissent from anything which has been said by my Lord, that I do not see my way very clearly to the distinction between the present case and the case of R. v. Wilson, 10 Barn. & Cres. 80. But I feel myself at liberty to decline to make this rule absolute, on the ground that the application for a mandamus to have the heir admitted is not made bona fide, and might, if granted, be attended with the consequences mentioned by my Lord.

LUSH, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged; and on the grounds stated by the Lord Chief Justice. By discharging the rule, it must be remembered that we are not depriving any party of his rights, but only refusing to lend the prerogative process of this court to enable trustees to do an act which I regard as inequitable and improper. This is not an application on the part of the heir; but the trustees, who are behind him, are endeavouring to effect a twofold object—(1) to deprive the lord of the manor of a double fine, and (2) if not to repudiate, at all events, to avoid the performance of, the obligations imposed on them by the will of the testator. Looking, therefore, at the matter as an application made, not on behalf of the heir, but on the part of the trustees, to put this, for all I know, mere child, on the roll of the court, the effect of it would be to clothe him with the duties of a constructive trustee, and to enable them to avoid taking upon themselves what the testator intended they should do. This is, to my mind, a sufficient reason for refusing to grant the mandamus which they seek to obtain. If at any future time there should exist no similar reasons for refusing their application, our decision in the present case will not prevent their coming again to the court. As to the other point argued in this case, were it not for the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice and my brother Mellor, I should have a strong opinion that the intention of the 3rd section of the Wills Act was to do away with the distinctions which formerly existed in the case of different kinds of property, and to make the will act as a direct conveyance of every species of property, copyhold as well as freehold; and thus to carry out the objects of the Act by facilitating the devolution of property. I think that the whole property was passed by the will itself, and that by the disposition of the will the heir was deprived of every particle of title. But if the case had rested on that ground alone, of course I should have held that the matter was sufficiently important to have the point put upon the record. But what I have stated would have been my strong opinion but for the different opinion of my lord and my brother Mellor. As, however, the first ground is, to my mind, entirely satisfactory, I concur on that ground with the rest of the court that this rule should be discharged.

MORIARTY AND WIFE v. THE LONDON, CHATHAM, AND DOVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Evidence—Subornation of testimony—Admission by conduct of a party to an action that his case is bad.

On the trial of an action against a railway company by a husband and wife for injuries sustained by the wife owing to the negligence of the defendants, the defendants tendered the evidence of one W. that he had been asked by the male plaintiff and a clerk of the plaintiffs' attorney to give evidence in support of the plaintiffs' case, although they knew that he had not witnessed the accident, and also the evidence of two other witnesses, that they had been asked to do the same thing by the clerk of the plaintiffs' attorney; and the evidence was received by the judge who presided at the trial, though neither the male plaintiff nor the attorney's clerk had been called as a witness:

Held, that the evidence of the three witnesses was admissible, as an admission by conduct on the part of the plaintiffs that they had a bad case, to be left to the jury with a caution from the judge. The evidence of the two latter witnesses relating to the act of the attorneys' clerk only was admissible evidence against the plaintiffs, as the clerk had been shown by the evidence of W. to have acted in concert with the male plaintiff to suborn testimony, and the subsequent acts of himself alone directed towards the same object might be regarded as a part of a concerted scheme.

This was an action against the defendants as carriers of passengers upon a railway from Far-ringdon-street in the City of London to the Elephant and Castle, for so negligently and unskilfully conducting themselves in carrying the female plaintiff, and managing the said railway and the carriage and train in which the female plaintiff was a passenger that she was thereby wounded and injured, and the male plaintiff sued the defendants also for the loss of comfort and services of his wife.

The defendants pleaded that they were not guilty as alleged.

At the trial, which took place before Lush, J. and a special jury at Westminster, on the 6th Feb. 1869, the female plaintiff, Mrs. Moriarty, deposed that in Dec. 1867 she lived at the Manor Arms, Walworth; that on Saturday, the 28th Dec. 1867 she went to the Elephant and Castle station, and took a third class return ticket to Chapel-street, and in returning arrived at the Elephant and Castle station about 11 p.m., where she was to get out; the train stopped for about a minute; when the train stopped she stood up to leave the carriage, being at the further end of it; when she got about midway two men were let into the same compartment of the carriage; as soon as she passed she tried to alight; the guard still held the door of the carriage in his hand; witness was thrown down with great violence as she was attempting to put her foot on the platform, and the train went off; witness was severely injured. On cross-examination she said she knew persons named Wymark, Allen, and Pitt; had a parcel containing clothes in her hand when she got out of the train; and did not know the two men who got into the carriage as she was going out.

Robert Dowle was examined on behalf of the plaintiff, and swore that he was in the train on the night of the 28th Dec., going from Ludgate-hill to Camberwell-gate, Walworth-road; at the Elephant and Castle saw two gentlemen get into the carriage in which Mrs. Moriarty was standing and waiting to get out; she got on the step; the train then went off, and she was thrown out upon the platform; never saw Mrs. Moriarty but once before that night.

Similar evidence was given by other witnesses named George Haynes, Hampden Park, and William Henry Morgan; and the character of the injuries sustained by the female plaintiff was deposed to by Dr. Lees and Mr. Legros Clarke, member of the College of Surgeons.

For the defence, the guard of the train which arrived at the Elephant and Castle about 11 p.m. on the night in question was called, and deposed that after the passengers got out he closed all the doors of the carriages and got into his break van; then looked out, and as the train began to move saw a woman step from the train; the doors were all closed when the train started, and the woman must have opened the door and jumped from the train after it started.

Edwin Chapman, the underguard of the same train, gave similar evidence—as to all the doors being shut before the train started, and did not see the female plaintiff at all. The porters on duty at the Elephant and Castle station were also called, and deposed that they had not held the door of the carriage in which Mrs. Moriarty was, as stated by her.

Henry James Wymark, a witness, called on behalf of the defendants gave the following testimony (the admissibility of the chief portion of which was objected to on the part of the plaintiff):—that he was a composer of songs and music; knew the plaintiff Mr. Moriarty, and frequented his public house; knew Cox (the clerk of Mr. Rose, the plaintiffs' attorney), and saw him there with Moriarty; Moriarty said that if witness would come forward and say that he had been in the train and witnessed the accident, he (Moriarty) would willingly give one-third of the compensation that he received to Cox, witness, and Dowle; that he (Moriarty) had spoken to Dowle, and that if witness agreed to the offer, he was to go up and make a statement with him at Mr. Rose's office; that witness did go to Mr. Rose's office, and stated that he was in the train at the time of the accident; about three or four months after the accident, and about a month after he went to Mr. Rose's office, he put himself in communication with the company concerning it; witness had been in Moriarty's house the whole of the evening that the accident occurred, and Dowle part of the evening; witness had told Cox that he had not been at the scene of the accident, and knew nothing about it, to which Cox replied, "We can make a nice case about it. We have a good medical man Dr.—, and if you and I and Dowle keep it together, we shall be able to make a nice little bit between the two;" witness acted with Cox and the others merely with the intention to circumvent and expose them; Cox gave him instructions in writing as to what he should say; told Mr. Rose's managing clerk that he saw the female plaintiff knocked down by the train as she was getting out.

Frederick Allen, another witness called on behalf of the defendants, deposed that Cox did not speak to him on the subject of the action in presence of Moriarty, but in his absence told witness that Mr. Rose was conducting an action for Mr. Moriarty against the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Company, and that if he (witness) liked to be a witness in it he could, and would be well paid for what he should do; that Cox knew well that witness was not present at the accident; Cox did not dictate the evidence, but witness was to meet him on the following Monday, and then have an interview with Moriarty, when a consultation was to take place; saw Cox on the Monday, who told him that if he wanted to become a witness in the action on the part of Moriarty, he should write to Mr. Rose saying that he could give evidence; witness refused to write the letter to Mr. Rose, and heard nothing more about the matter; informed Wymark about three days after this interview.

Charles Benjamin Pitt, another witness, deposed that he had been asked by Cox if he should like to make a few pounds; replied "Yes, if he (Cox) could tell him how to do it." Cox said, "I have a little affair coming off. I expect shortly an action for damages for a railway accident. Will you be a witness, Charley?" Witness replied, "What! commit perjury!" Cox said "Yes," whereupon witness replied, "Certainly not;" and had no communication with Cox since that night.

The evidence of the two preceding witnesses was received under objection.

On the part of the plaintiff, William Cox deposed That he had been a shorthand writing clerk of Mr. Rose for about eighteen months; never suggested to Wymark to be a witness, knowing that he was not present at the accident; Wymark and Dodd went to see Moriarty, who introduced them to witness, and witness referred them to his master, Mr. Rose; Moriarty told witness that they were present at the accident; Wymark and Dowle called at Mr. Rose's office on the 28th Jan., and witness then took down their statement in shorthand in the presence of Mr. Rose's managing clerk; never suggested to Allen to be a witness, and never asked Pitt to become a witness.

Mr. Moriarty, the male plaintiff, was also called, and denied having asked Wymark to be a witness, knowing that he had not been present at the accident.

The learned judge having summed up the case to the jury, the jury returned a verdict for the defendants.

Q. B.] MORIARTY AND WIFE v. THE LONDON, CHATHAM, AND DOVER RAILWAY COMPANY. [Q. B.]

Giffard, Q. C. having, on the part of the plaintiff, obtained a rule nisi calling on the defendants to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had between the parties, on the ground of the misreception of the evidence of the defendants' witnesses, Wymark, Allen, and Pitt, and also on the ground of surprise, and that the evidence of the said witnesses, Wymark, Allen, and Pitt, was unworthy of belief, as set out in certain affidavits sworn on behalf of the plaintiff.

Huddleston, Q. C. and J. C. Carter now showed cause against the rule. The evidence of Wymark was clearly admissible to show the existence of a conspiracy on the part of the plaintiffs with others to defraud the railway company. [BLACKBURN, J. —You may certainly call witnesses to show the existence of a conspiracy, and thereby impeach the credit of persons who have been called. You seek to go further than that here, and to impeach the credit of persons who have not been called as witnesses.] On the trial of Lord Stafford (7 Howell's St. Trials, 1400) evidence was offered on the part of the accused, and was received, to show that the chief witness against him had endeavoured to persuade people to swear against him falsely, and had offered them money for doing so. This is an authority in favour of the admissibility of Wymark's evidence; and if his evidence was admissible, that of Allen and Pitt was also admissible, as strengthening his. [BLACKBURN, J. referred to Annesley v. The Earl of Anglesea, 17 Howell's St. Trials, 1139.] Even if Wymark's evidence and that of Allen and Pitt was inadmissible, there was enough without it to sustain the verdict, and under such circumstances a new trial will not be granted. In Doe v. Tyler, 6 Bing. 561, it was held that the court will not grant a new trial on the ground that evidence has been admitted which ought to have been rejected, if, exclusive of such evidence, there be enough to warrant the finding of the jury. "I will assume," said Tindal, C. J., "for the purpose of this discussion, though I give no opinion on the point, as we have not heard the other side, that the evidence in question ought not to have been received. But the court will not close their eyes to the rest of the evidence; and if they see that there is enough, not merely to make the scales hang even, but greatly to preponderate in favour of the defendant, they will not send the cause to a jury again. It has been contended that we are to analyse the evidence by a difficult process, and to discriminate the precise effect produced on the mind of the jury by each portion of the proof; but we have a much plainer course, and that is to hear the report of the trial, and to sustain the verdict if we are satisfied that there is enough to warrant the finding of the jury, independently of the evidence objected to." In Horford v. Wilson, 1 Taunt. 12, Mansfield, C. J., said, "The court will not set aside a verdict on account of the admission of evidence which ought not to have been received, provided there be sufficient without it to authorise the finding of the jury." As to the other point, i.e., of surprise, neither Cox nor Moriarty affirms by affidavit that either was taken by surprise.

Giffard, Q. C., and Hodgson, in support of the rule. —The evidence of Wymark, Allen, and Pitt, was improperly admitted. In the Queen's case, 2 Brod. & Bing. 302, the judges were of opinion that if on the trial of an indictment for any crime, evidence has been given upon the cross-examination of witnesses examined in chief in support of the indictment, from which it appears that A. B. (not examined as a witness) has been employed by the prosecutor as an agent to procure and examine evidence and witnesses in support of the indictment, the party indicted is not permitted to examine

C. D. as a witness to prove that A. B. offered a bribe to E. F. in order to induce him to give testimony touching the matter in the indictment, E. F., not being a witness examined in support of the indictment, nor examined before it was so proposed to examine C. D. They were also of opinion that if on the trial of an indictment for any crime, evidence has been given upon the cross examination of witnesses examined in chief in support of the indictment from which it appears that A. B. (not examined as a witness) has been employed by the prosecutor as an agent to procure and examine evidence and witnesses in support of the indictment, the party indicted is not permitted to examine G. H. as a witness to prove that A. B. offered him a bribe to induce him to bring to A. B., papers belonging to the party indicted; G. H. not having been examined as a witness in support of the indictment. The first of these two rulings is strictly applicable to the present case. The "question," said Abbott, C. J., "must, as it appears to me, be considered in the same mode, and must receive the same answer, as if the parties were reversed; as if, instead of proof offered on the behalf of the defendant, respecting the act of an agent employed by the prosecutor, it were proof offered in reply on the part of the prosecutor respecting the conduct of an agent, employed by the accused to procure and examine evidence and witnesses in support of his defence. If such proof can be received on the part of a defendant, it must be received on the ground that it may lead to a legitimate inference and conclusion that the witnesses examined against him, although not appearing to have been called before the court by any undue means, are, nevertheless, on this ground extraneous and foreign to them, not to be considered as witnesses of truth. And, if such an inference and conclusion can be reasonably and legitimately drawn in favour of a defendant, in the case proposed by your Lordships, I am unable to discover any principle upon which I may say that the like conclusion may not be with equal reason drawn against him in the analogous case that I have taken the liberty to suggest; so that proof of this nature, if admissible, must be expected to lead as frequently to the condemnation of an innocent man by casting discredit upon his defence, as to the acquittal of such a person by disgracing the prosecutor." Even supposing the evidence of Wymark, Allen, and Pitt to be true, the evidence of the female plaintiff and the other witnesses examined on her behalf does not on that account lose its force. The further remarks of Abbot, C. J. bear out strongly this view. Speaking of the witnesses examined, he says, p. 307, "the proposed proof does not directly affect them; it regards an act to which, according to the hypothesis, they may be entire strangers; and, being an unlawful act, they are not to be presumed to have been parties to it, or to any other act of the like nature without proof against them; they may be persons of honour and probity deposing to facts really and truly occurring within their own personal knowledge, and taking place within their own sight or hearing, as they have averred upon their oath. It may have been intended that the person to whom the bribe was offered should speak to other facts occurring at another time, and in another place wholly unconnected with them or with the matters to which they have deposed. Can it, then, be reasonably concluded that the facts deposed by them are untrue; that, however respectable or numerous they may be, they must be all wicked and perjured men because some other man has, from overweening zeal or a corrupt heart, wickedly endeavoured to induce by money another person to give evidence touching the matter of the indictment, on which they have appeared? I must say, my Lords, that

I am of opinion that such conclusion cannot reasonably be drawn. . . . The utmost effect, in my opinion, of the proposed proof (and in many cases, even this would not be a fair or reasonable effect) would be to excite suspicion; but suspicion is not a legitimate ground for the verdict of a jury which ought only to be founded upon reasonable and probable proof." [COCKBURN, C. J.—Still can it be said that, from the conduct of a party in relation to a particular case for the purpose of obtaining a decision in his favour, there may not be a legitimate inference that he considered that if the case were justly determined it would be determined against him.] Moriarty was only technically and theoretically plaintiff in the present case; he himself had no personal knowledge of the merits of the case. [BLACKBURN, J.—But no person can have better means of knowing the merits of his wife's case than her husband.] In the Attorney-General v. Hitchcock, 1 Ex. 91, in an information under the revenue laws a witness who had given material evidence as to the fact in issue, was asked on cross-examination whether he had not said that the officers of the Crown had offered him a bribe to give that evidence, and he having denied that he had ever said so, it was held that evidence to show that he had made such a statement was inadmissible. The reasons given by Rolfe, B. in support of this ruling are strictly applicable to the present case. "If we lived for 1000 years instead of sixty or seventy, and every case were of sufficient importance, it might be possible, and perhaps proper to throw a light on matters in which every possible question might be suggested, for the purpose of seeing by such means whether the whole was unfounded or what portion if it was not, and to raise every possible inquiry as to the truth of the statements made. But I do not see how that would be; in fact mankind find it to be impossible. Therefore some line must be drawn, and I take it the established rule is that you may contradict any portion of the testimony that is given in support or contradiction of the issue between the parties. That is clear. Then undoubtedly mankind have felt that, as facts are frequently to be proved by the testimony of men of suspicious character, you may inquire into the genuineness and truthfulness of the party who gives such testimony." But it is nowhere said that evidence may be given to contradict testimony which has not been given.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think this rule ought to be discharged, in so far as relates to the ground taken that the evidence was improperly admitted. I think it was rightly admitted. The conduct of a party to a cause may be of the highest importance in determining whether the cause of action in which he is plaintiff, or the ground of defence taken, if he is defendant, is an honest and just one; just as the giving evidence to convict a prisoner that he has said one thing at one time and another at another time, for the purpose of showing that the recourse to falsehood leads fairly to an inference of guilt; or, as you may generally show, that a man who is alleged to have stolen an article was seen throwing it away. All those things which are cogent, anything from which an inference is to be drawn, is valuable and important evidence with a view to the issue. Here, if you can show that a man has been suborning false testimony, and has endeavoured to have recourse to perjury, it is strong to show that he knew perfectly well that his cause was an unrighteous one; I do not say it is conclusive evidence; but I fully agree that it should be put to the jury. Because, a man, not sure that he will be able to succeed by righteous means, has recourse to means of a different character to accomplish the object which he desires, namely, the gaining the victory when he believes that in justice he is entitled to it, it does not necessarily follow that he has not a good cause of action, any more than it does from a prisoner's making a false statement for the purpose of increasing his appearance of innocence, that he is necessarily guilty. But it is always evidence which ought to be submitted to the tribunal which has to judge of the fact; and therefore I think that, inasmuch as here the evidence went to show that the plaintiff, who is not only the nominal but also in some sense the substantial plaintiff (seeing that the damages would have gone into his pocket), was present when Cox, who was acting in a certain sense as a clerk to the plaintiff's attorney, was endeavouring to suborn witnesses, and must be taken to be a party to the subornation, the evidence was admissible. And it being shown that after that the same Cox goes and solicits witnesses to commit perjury, although the plaintiff Moriarty was not present at those subsequent interviews, I think there was evidence to go to the jury that what Cox did was done in furtherance of an object which was common to him and the plaintiff, and that he was acting under the authority of the plaintiff; it being also shown—a fact about which I think there was no dispute at the trial—that one of the witnesses, Allen, was directed by Cox to go to Moriarty's house for the purpose of being told by Moriarty what he was to say at the trial. It appears also that this witness did go, but Moriarty being from home, Cox supplied his place, and told the man what he was to say at the trial. That being so, I think there was a conspiracy between Moriarty and Cox to suborn testimony, and either to set up a false case, or by false testimony to bolster up what might be a fair one. At all events that was all matter which was very properly left to the jury. On the ground, therefore, that the evidence was improperly received, I think that this rule must be discharged. I have some doubt whether a case of surprise has been made out. I am of opinion, certainly, that this is one of those cases in which one desires that evidence of this kind should be sifted to the uttermost. Anything which can be shown to impugn the veracity of witnesses who come forward at the last moment to set up a case of conspiracy to suborn false testimony should be investigated to the utmost. I think, therefore, that on that ground—the ground of surprise—this evidence should be further investigated and sifted, and that we should make the rule absolute on that ground. But then, as no blame can be imputed to the defendants, who got the verdict fairly, the rule for a new trial must be made absolute only on payment of the costs of the last trial. On payment of those costs the plaintiff may have a new trial.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. On the first question, that of the admissibility of the evidence, I quite agree that the evidence of both Allen and Pitt was admissible. What the plaintiff on the record has said is always evidence against him, its weight being more or less according to circumstances. Even if the plaintiff is merely a nominal plaintiff, a bare trustee for another, the evidence, though slight in such a case as that, would still be admissible. In the present case he is not only the plaintiff on the record, but he is also the person who would have the benefit of the whole cause. It is quite true that he was not present at the time the accident took place; and what he knows about the nature of the accident, and whether or no his wife was injured in the way she says, or whether or no the story of the defendants is untrue, he would only know by way of information and belief. But I think it cannot be disputed that if the defendants got hold of a letter written by Mr. Moriarty, in which he had said, "I am carrying on this action for my wife ; but, though I was not present at the accident, yet from information and belief, we shall, I am convinced, fail utterly in the action, and therefore we must get false evidence to support the case"—I think, under such circumstances, no one could contend—and it was acknowledged by Mr. Giffard that he could not contend—that that would not be evidence to go to the jury as an admission on the part of Moriarty, though by no means conclusive, because he might have been making a mistake, but still evidence to go to the jury with its proper weight, care being taken to caution the jury not to give it too much weight. Now comes the question whether or no, where there is evidence that the plaintiff tried to suborn false witnesses to swear what was false within his knowledge, the jury can draw a conclusion from that exactly the same as if a letter such as I have referred to had been put in evidence (it seems to me that in common sense the inference from such conduct would be very strong); but the plaintiff did not do that because he was doubtful about his case being a true one, but because he doubted as to the jury drawing an inference from it that it was not a good one. As to the authorities on the subject, the cases, so far as I can ascertain them from the text books, one and all say more or less that evidence as to conduct is admissible evidence; but I do not think there is any case on this subject in which it was really so ruled, except the celebrated case of Annesley v. The Earl of Anglesea (ubi sup.), in which I think it was distinctly determined. In that case after the evidence was tendered on the first day, there was a difference of opinion between the judges as to whether the evidence should be admitted, and the Chief Baron thought it should not, because in substance the objection was that it would lead to a long collateral inquiry as to whether or no the prosecution was instituted with reasonable and probable cause. Mountenay, B. was very strong the other way, and Dawson, B. said, "I am very glad that there is no necessity for giving our opinions immediately on this point. I shall, therefore, decline giving any positive opinion as we have this night to consider of it, and in the mean time the gentlemen on both sides might look into the cases to clear it up to the court. The prosecution here is agreed to be a lawful act, and is not immediately relative to the matter in issue. The difficulty with me is that, if this be given in evidence, a jury may from a lawful act not immediately relative to the issue draw an unwarrantable consequence. If the act were unlawful it would undoubtedly be good evidence; there could be no other way of accounting for the party's subjecting himself to legal punishment; but where it is not unlawful it may be dangerous to leave the intent to the jury. We will consider this matter, and give our opinions on it to-morrow." On the morrow, a great deal of matter was produced, which went into the question whether a witness's professional evidence could not be admitted. Then Dawson, B. in giving judgment about reserving the point, said, "I think it proper at this time to mention that I have considered the point of evidence that was proposed yesterday; and if it was now to be determined I should be of opinion to allow the evidence; and if the counsel for the defendant should so please, they may take a bill of exceptions." After that the evidence comes in, and in the course of the argument the strong way in which Mountenay B. puts it in charging the jury, whether an admission of this, the prosecution for murder of an innocent man, would not discredit the witnesses, would have great weight in principle. Now that point applies to the witness Wymark in the present case, who swears that Moriarty was present when there was this effort to procure him to give false evidence. But his evidence goes further than that. He says that at that time Cox went on to say that he had two witnesses who were to swear falsely, and if he would come and join it would be a good case, and if he would not he would get another; all of which, as I understand it, is said to have taken place in Moriarty's presence. That may have been all false or not, but it was for the jury to decide upon; and if it were believed, there was, I think, sufficient to show concert between Moriarty and Cox to get such false evidence as might be necessary with what had been done by the express authority of Moriarty. If they were tried for conspiracy, the evidence of Wymark as to what Cox did, would be evidence of facts done in furtherance of the design for the jury, but yet the jury might reject it on the ground that Cox was not acting with authority. I do not wish to express any opinion one way or the other as to what would have been the case if a person who had the sole conduct of the cause had suborned witnesses, whether, as showing an unlawful act, that would be admissible or no. I doubt very much whether the witness speaks the truth about Moriarty and Cox telling him that they wanted him for the purpose of committing perjury. Still, if two witnesses give evidence to that effect, and are unshaken in their testimony, which is consistent with truth, it might very well influence the jury. But the point before us at present is, is the evidence admissible? I think it is, and I have no doubt that it went to the jury with a proper direction to them. I quite agree that the jury should be cautioned against giving too much weight to such evidence; which they might possibly do in error, and against the danger of punishing a man by denying him a right of action on account of the falseness of some of his testimony, and that they should see carefully whether it shook their belief in his own evidence. That, I am sure, was properly done by my learned brother, and no motion has been made on the ground of misdirection. Then as to the affidavits of surprise. I hardly think they make out a case of surprise; but I quite agree with my Lord that the matter is such that if the plaintiff pays the costs of the former trial, it ought to be discussed again, and therefore that there ought to be a new trial on those terms.

LUSH, J.—I also think, on further consideration, that the evidence was receivable. I had formed no definite opinion on the subject at the trial itself. It is a new point, and I adopted what I considered to be the usual course, and the safer course where evidence is pressed on one part and objected to on the other part, viz., not to form a strong opinion one way or the other, but to receive the evidence at the risk and peril of the party tendering it. The argument which the matter has undergone has led me to consider the question more fully, and I am now quite satisfied, along with my brothers, that this species of evidence is receivable, and is receivable as an admission by the party that the case he was putting forward was not a true one. It was an admission by conduct and was receivable on that ground. The effect of it is entirely for the jury. No doubt there are cases—perhaps it frequently happens—in which a person has endeavoured to bolster up a good case by fictitious evidence. That goes to its weight merely, and should be so pointed out to the jury. It is a matter entirely for them. I also think that no distinction can be made as to the character of the party suing—whether the party is suing in a representative character merely, or to enforce some right of his own. Either way, the inference which the evidence tends to raise is that the case is not a true one, and on that ground the evidence is receivable. Looking at the whole matter I entirely agree that it is fit, having regard to the character and conduct of the parties, that the matter should undergo further examination, and, therefore, that the rule for a new trial should be made absolute on the terms already mentioned.

STEWART v. YOUNG.

Slander of title—Privileged statement—Evidence of malice.

S. died intestate and indebted to A. in about 80l. His widow, who remained in possession of his house and furniture, executed a bill of sale over the latter, in favour of A., and died without ever having taken out letters of administration. On her death the plaintiff took out letters of administration as brother to R. S., and directed the property to be sold by auction. The defendant then, as agent for A., put himself in communication with the auctioneers with a view to preventing the sale; but the auctioneers by letter clearly informed him of the invalidity of the bill of sale under which A. claimed. Notwithstanding this notice, the defendant at the sale, said, "I forbid the sale, for I hold a bill of sale over everything in the house in favour of A." Evidence was given that, in consequence of the defendant's conduct, the property did not realise at the sale so much as it would otherwise have done:

Held, on an action for slander of title, that there was no evidence of malice to go to the jury.

Action for slander of title.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff was the administrator of the goods, &c., of Robert Stewart, deceased, and as such administrator caused certain goods of which he was possessed as such administrator, to be put up for sale by public auction; and that the defendant at the said auction, &c., spoke, &c., in relation to the plaintiff's title as such administrator to sell, &c., the words following:—"I forbid the sale, for I hold a bill of sale over everything in the house in favour of Mr. Alexander. I shall not allow a single lot to leave the house." Whereby the said goods were sold for less prices, &c.

Plea, not guilty.

The cause was tried before KEATING, J., at the Middlesex sittings in last Hilary Term. It appeared that the late Robert Stewart had kept a public-house, and had died in Feb. 1865, indebted in about 80l. to Messrs. Alexander, his landlords. On his death, his widow remained in possession of his house, goods, and effects; and, to secure the debt owing to Messrs. Alexander, gave them a bill of sale on the latter. She, however, never took out letters of administration to her husband. On her death, in March 1869, the plaintiff, who was brother to the deceased Robert Stewart, took out letters of administration, and gave instructions to a firm of auctioneers to proceed to sell the goods of his deceased brother, and also to arrange with Messrs. Alexander for a surrender of the lease of the house. The defendant, who was agent to Messrs. Alexander, then informed the auctioneers of the bill of sale held by his principals, and refused to assent to the sale taking place. The sale nevertheless took place on the 22nd July last. On the day before the sale the auctioneers wrote the following letter to the defendants:—

[Stewart deceased].

To Mr. Young.

July 21st, 1869.

DEAR SIR,—In the hurried letter we last wrote you, wherein we stated we had been informed that the bill of sale held by the brewers had been fully satisfied, &c., it appears that midst press of business we somewhat misunderstood our instructions, which are that 40l. has been paid on account of the bill of sale, but that the brewers in reality have no legal right or title whatever to the security they claim, inasmuch as the deceased had no title thereto; a portion of the furniture, moreover, being the property of the heirs-at-law of her late husband. It appears there are very few debts owing, and we shall use our utmost endeavours to realise the effects to best advantage, in order that they may be discharged. We cannot, however, but feel that the course which the brewers have deemed it most to their interest to pursue has been calculated rather to defeat than to assist our endeavours on this head.—Yours, &c.,

H. & Co.

P.S.—Since writing the above, our Mr. H. has perused your letter of this day's date. For the reasons already given, the business can only be wound-up in the way we propose, and either on or off the premises, the furniture will be sold to-morrow, and however pleased Mr. H. would have been to meet your clients at the proper time, you must see that at the eleventh hour such a meeting could be productive of no good. The only matter in which we can now assist you is in arranging for a speedy surrender of the premises, and this all parties will still be happy to do.—H. & Co.

Notwithstanding this letter, the defendant attended the sale and spoke the words attributed to him in the declaration. Evidence was given that in consequence of the language of the defendant, the goods sold for much less than they would otherwise have fetched.

On these facts the learned Judge nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that the occasion of the defendant's interference was privileged, and there was no evidence of express malice.

Montagu Chambers, Q.C. now moved to set the nonsuit aside and for a new trial, on the ground that there was evidence to sustain the action. To support an action for slander of title, "the words must be uttered maliciously, and the damage must have arisen from the words so uttered:" (Brook v. Rawl, 4 Ex. 521.) If the defendant, being interested and not a mere stranger, makes the statement, though untrue, bona fide and on reasonable grounds, he is not liable: (Pitt v. Donovan, 1 M. & S. 639; Roscoe on Ev. 527.) The question then ought to have been left to the jury whether, although the defendant was not a mere stranger, he did not act contrary to good faith, and whether he could possibly have thought, after the warning he had received, that he had any reasonable ground for acting as he did. In Pitt v. Donovan, 1 M. & S., 643, Lord Ellenborough, C.J. said:—"I think there is no necessity for troubling the other side on this occasion, for in this matter I cannot help thinking that the point which was peculiarly for the consideration of the jury, and on the event of which this case ought to depend, was not left to them correctly, and that it ought, therefore, to be presented to the consideration of another jury; and that point is whether the defendant made that statement bona fide, and under an honest impression of its being the truth, or whether he made it maliciously and for the purpose of slandering the title of the person that was about to convey his estate." The defendant having acted as he did after the caution he had received, the jury would have been quite justified in concluding that he acted without bona fides and without reasonable grounds.

BOVILL, C. J.—Assuming that there was a bill of sale executed by the widow to secure the debt of 80l. to Messrs. Alexander, I think that the occasion on which the defendant interfered in the sale was privileged. It was known to the auctioneers that Messrs. Alexander held a bill of sale, which had been executed by the person at the time in possession of the goods, who was acting as executor de son tort, and that Messrs. Alexander meant to assert their rights under it. Messrs. Alexander employed the defendant to protect their interests. The defendant accordingly went to the sale and gave notice of the bill of sale to intending purchasers. Under such circumstances, I think that the defendant not only had a right to give notice of the bill of sale, but he was bound to give it. As was said by Bayley, J. in Pitt v. Donovan, 1 M. & S. 649, "I think that if the defendant really believed this contract to be void for the want of sanity in Y., it was not only his right but his duty to make the communication." Under these circumstances the prima facie presumption of malice is rebutted; and the question then arises, whether there was any evidence of express malice. "The jury must arrive at their conclusion in this case through the medium of malice or no malice in the defendant"—per Lord Ellenborough, C. J. in Pitt v. Donovan, 1 M. & S. 645. As to that point it is sufficient to say that, if the learned judge had left the question to the jury, and they had found that there was express malice, the verdict could never have been sustained. The rule must be refused.

ALLEN (app.) v. TOWN CLERK OF WARRINGTON (resp.)

BYLES, J.—I also think that my brother Keating did right in refusing to allow the case to go to the jury. Two things are essential to the maintenance of this action, first, that the words used should be false; secondly, that they should be malicious. Now the words were true. The defendant did hold a bill of sale in favour of Messrs. Alexander. The first essential, then, does not exist; moreover there was no evidence of malice.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The widow, acting as executor de son tort, gave Messrs. Alexander what they conceived to be a good security. The plaintiff subsequently administered, and then gave instructions to have the goods sold by auction. It was only natural and proper that the Messrs. Alexander should give notice of their claim to intending purchasers. It is admitted by Mr. Chambers, that in these actions it is not sufficient to show that the claim set up was invalid, but it must be shown that it was maliciously made. As was said by Maule, J. in Pater v. Baker, 3 C. B., 868, "not . . . malicious in the worst sense; but with intent to injure the plaintiff." Was there such evidence in this case? The plaintiff's case was, that the auctioneer had sent a letter which amounted to this—that there was a dispute between the auctioneer and the defendant whether Messrs. Alexander had a good or a bad title. This is not sufficient evidence of malice. It was settled clearly enough in Ryder v. Wombwell, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 609, Ex. Ch.; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491, that a mere scintilla of evidence is not sufficient, and that no case should be laid before a jury unless there is evidence on which (to use the language of Willes, J. in delivering the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ryder v. Wombwell) "the jury could properly find the question for the party on whom the onus of proof lies. If there is not, the judge ought to withdraw the question from the jury, and direct a nonsuit if the onus is on the plaintiff, or direct a verdict for the plaintiff if the onus is on the defendant." That is a reasonable and proper rule. It would be absurd for us to send the case down again for trial, when we are satisfied that no jury could, on such evidence, properly find for the plaintiff.

BRETT, J.—I think that the nonsuit was right on both grounds. There was in the first place no evidence that the defendant's expressions were untrue in fact. But, supposing them to have been so, they were used by him as agent for Messrs. Alexander, and were consequently privileged, unless actual malice was shown. The plaintiff would have given some evidence of actual malice if he had shown that the statements were made without any belief in their truth, and irrespectively of the interests of Messrs. Alexander. But the only evidence adduced by the plaintiff is, that the defendant was told that the bill of sale was invalid, and that he did not agree with that opinion and said it was valid. There is no further evidence. This is no proof of mala fides. The law has been settled for some time by the case of Smith v. Spooner (3 Taunt. 246), where the facts were similar to those of the present case, and in other cases from Watson v. Reynolds (Moo. & M. 1), down to Wren v. Weild, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S., 1007; L. Rep. 4, Q. B. 730; 38 L. J. N. S., 327, Q. B. The rule therefore must be refused.

Rule refused.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Friday, Jan. 21.

ALLEN (app.) v. TOWN CLERK OF WARRINGTON (resp.)

Registration—Notice of objection—Sufficiency of description—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 17.

A notice of objection to a borough voter was signed "S. D. on the list of voters for Golborne-street, in the borough of W." The borough of W. consisted of three townships, each having a separate overseer, who made out a list of voters for his own township.

Held, that the objector must give such a description of the list on which his name was to be found as would be commonly understood by the people resident in the locality to designate the particular list, and that it was for the revising barrister to decide whether, as a matter of fact, the description given would be so understood.

Case stated by the revising barrister for the borough of Warrington.

At a court held before me, &c., S. Dunbobbin objected to the name of John Allen, and of the other persons whose names appeared in the schedule hereunder written, being retained in the list of voters for the borough. The notice of the objection which had been served upon the said parties was in the following form:

To John Allen, 12, Rolleston-street, Warrington.
I hereby give you notice that I object to your name being retained on the list of persons entitled to vote in the election of a member for the borough of Warrington.
Dated this 24th day of August 1869.

(Signed) SAMUEL DUNBOBBIN, on the list of voters for Golborne-street, in the borough of Warrington.

It was objected on behalf of the said John Allen, and of the other persons, &c., that such notices of objection were bad, as they did not specify the list upon which the name of the objector was to be found, and that they were not called upon to prove that they were entitled to have their names retained on the register.

The borough of Warrington consists of three townships, each having a separate overseer, each of whom has only one list of voters to make out; and the register of voters for the borough of Warrington is composed of the said three several lists.

It was contended in support of the objection to the said notices that they did not comply with the form and directions given in Sched. B., No. 11, of 6 Vict. c. 18, not stating upon which of the said three lists the name of the objector appeared.

I held the notices of objection good, and granted this case for the decision of the Court of Common Pleas as to whether it was necessary that the objector should state in the notice of objection upon which particular list of voters his name was to be found.

If the court think the notices of objection bad, the several names hereunder written are to be inserted in the list of voters.

Holker, Q. C. (Barstow with him) for the appellant. (The respondent did not appear.)—The question here is as to the validity of the notice of objection. The appellant's case is, that the objector did not specify on which list his name was to be found. The Act 6 & 7 Viet. c. 18, s. 17, says that the person making the objection shall give to the overseers a notice according to a particular form. That form is given in number 10 in Schedule B of the Act. He must give to the person objected to a notice according to Form 11 in the same schedule. If we look at those forms they are signed "A. B. on the list of voters for the parish of —." In a note to the forms given in the schedule, it is distinctly provided that "if there is more than one list of voters, the notice should specify the list to which the objection refers." This form does not say in what parish Golborne-street is. Thus the person objected to cannot discover whether the person objecting has a right to object, without taking more trouble than the Act requires. There was no list of voters for Golborne-street, and for aught that appears that street may be partly in one township and partly in another. [BRETT, J.—Supposing the revising barrister had found as a fact that there was only one Golborne-street, and that the whole of it was in one township.] Still the directions of the Act of Parliament were not followed. In Crowther v. Bradney, Hopw. & Philb. 63; 33 L. J. 70, C. P.; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 414, where the objector described himself as "on the list of persons entitled to vote for a member for Kidderminster, in respect of property occupied within the parish of Kidderminster," which parish consisted of "the borough of Kidderminster," "the foreign of Kidderminster," and "the hamlet of Lower Milton," for each of which separate overseers and churchwardens were appointed, and separate lists made, the notice was held insufficient. ERLE, C. J., in giving judgment in that case, said:—"I do not think the description given by the objector is sufficiently precise to enable the person objected to to find his name in the proper list, without being subjected to the undue burden of having to search several lists in several places." In Eidsforth v. Farrer (4 C. B. 9; 1 Lutw. 517), a notice describing the objector, who was on the list of freemen, as "on the list of voters for the borough of L.," was held insufficient. In Moon v. Andrew (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 461) the objector described himself as "on the list of voters for the borough of Penryn," and the description was held sufficient; but there, although there were six lists for the Parliamentary borough of Penryn, it clearly appeared from the context that the old borough of Penryn, for which only one list was made, was meant. [WILLES, J.—Does not the provision in the 101st section of the 6 & 7 Viet. c. 18 apply, that no misnomer is to vitiate a notice, provided that the place "be so denominated in such . . . notice, as to be commonly understood?"] BOVILL, C. J.—Supposing that the lists for the different parishes in a borough were numbered respectively 1, 2, and 3, and the objector had specified the number of the list, would not that have been sufficient? The cases cited point the other way.

BOVILL, C. J.—Those cases were decided on the ground that the objector stated nothing to indicate which of several lists he referred to. The case may be different here. Supposing that there were at Warrington, a township called Golbourne-street, everyone would understand which list the objector meant; also if the lists were numbered, and the number of the list had been given, unless we are to say that each word in the Act is to be followed. The 101st section of the Act forbids such strictness. We must then take it that the revising barrister thought that the description was such as to be sufficiently understood. The only question, however, left to us is whether it is necessary that the objector should state on what list his name is to be found. Our answer to that is that he must give such a description of the list as would be commonly understood by anyone in the locality to designate which list he refers to. Whether or no the objector has done so here is a question of fact which we are unable to decide. The case then must be sent back to the revising barrister for him to decide as a matter of fact, whether the description "on the list of voters for Golbourne-street" was one that would be commonly understood by the persons objected to. If there were two streets of the same name in different parishes, the description would be vague; but if there is only one Golbourne-street, and that street is well known at Warrington, the description might well be sufficient.

WILLES and BRETT, JJ. concurred.

Case to be amended accordingly.

FRIEND v. BUCKLEY.

Vendor and purchaser—Leasehold property—Abstract of title—Obligation to produce original lease where more than sixty years old.

The vendor of leasehold property is bound on an unconditional sale of the property to produce the original lease, or give evidence of its contents, equally where the original lease is more than sixty years as where it is less.

On a contract for the sale of leasehold property by A. to B., the abstract of title set forth an indenture of the 13th Sept. 1800, reciting an indenture dated the 20th Jan. 1606, by which certain lands, &c. (of which a part was the subject of the contract) were demised for a term of 1000 years from Michaelmas 1599, at the yearly rent of one penny payable at Michaelmas only if demanded. To a requisition for the production of an attested copy of the lease of 20th Jan. 1606, and for a covenant for its production by the legal possessor, the vendor replied that the production of a deed more than sixty years old could not be insisted upon, whereupon the purchaser rescinded the contract, and brought an action for the recovery of the amount paid to the vendor as a deposit.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench), that the purchaser was entitled to rescind the contract, and to recover by action the amount of the deposit.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, refusing a rule to the defendant to enter a nonsuit pursuant to leave reserved at the trial of the cause.

The action was brought to recover the sum of 400*l.*, being the deposit paid by the plaintiff upon the purchase by him from the defendant of certain freehold and leasehold premises, and also the sum of 59*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, the expenses of investigating the defendant's title to the said premises; the declaration alleging that the defendant did not, within the time agreed upon, nor at any time, deliver and make a good and marketable title to the premises. The declaration contained also the ordinary money counts.

The defendant pleaded:—1. That he did not agree as alleged. 2. For a defence on equitable grounds, that he did deduce and make a good title to the premises, according to the true intent and meaning of the agreement, and within a reasonable time. 3. That the plaintiff waived the stipulation as to the defendant's making a good and marketable title within the time specified, and that the defendant did within a reasonable time afterwards make a good and marketable title. 4. That the plaintiff did not within twenty-one days after the delivery to him of the abstract of title deliver all requisitions to the said title, and thereby accepted the defendant's title according to the true intent and meaning of the agreement. 5. To the rest of the declaration, never indebted.

The case was tried before Hannen, J. on the 5th June 1868, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 459*l.* 16*s.* 4*d.*, subject to leave reserved to the defendant to move to set aside the verdict and to enter a nonsuit. A motion was accordingly made on behalf of the defendant in Michaelmas Term of that year, when the Court of Queen's Bench refused to grant a rule.

The facts proved at the trial on the part of the plaintiff were as follow: On the 8th Jan., 1868, the plaintiff, who is an architect and surveyor, carrying on business at No. 44, Bedford-row, Holborn, entered into an agreement with the defendant for the purchase of two farms, consisting the one of freehold, the other of leasehold property.

By this agreement the vendor agreed to sell, and the purchaser to purchase (subject to a mortgage of 5000*l.* at interest at 4*l.* per cent. per annum to R. T. Fisher and others) all those farms and lands belonging to the vendor, situate at Ifield, Crawley, in the county of Essex, and known as Lyons Farm and Gossips Green Farm, whereof, Gossips Green Farm, containing about 58 acres and 16 perches, or thereabouts, is freehold, and Lyons Farm, containing 94*a.* 3*r.* 12*p.*, or thereabouts, is leasehold, for the residue of a term of 1000 years, from Michaelmas, 1599, at the rent of one penny, at or for the price or sum of 3575*l.*, 400*l.*, part thereof, to be paid by the purchaser as a deposit and in part payment of the purchase-money, the vendor to deduce a good and marketable title to the said farms and lands, and to deliver an abstract of his title to the purchaser within seven days from the date of the agreement, and the purchaser, within twenty-one days after delivery of the same, to deliver all requisitions to the title, and in default thereof to be deemed to have absolutely accepted the title; the purchase to be completed, and the balance of the purchase-money paid to the vendor on or before the 25th of March following; when the purchaser should have possession. If, from any cause whatever, the purchase should not be completed on that day, the purchaser to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on the balance of the purchase-money, and interest at the rate of 5 per cent. on the mortgage debt of 5000*l.* The purchase to include all growing crops, ploughings, dressings, hay, straw, fodder, manure, &c., in and about the said farms and lands, except the two houses and the oxen belonging to the vendor, and except the furniture and agricultural implements (if any) belonging to the then tenant of part of the premises. If the purchaser should fail to complete his purchase by the time mentioned, the deposit to be forfeited, and the vendor to be at liberty to resell the property by public auction, and any deficiency to be made good by the purchaser to the vendor. The vendor to pay all outgoing to the 25th March, and to continue until that time all needful and expedient farming and other operations upon and about the premises.

An abstract of the defendant's title to the property sold was received by the plaintiff from the defendant on the 16th Jan. 1868.

That part which related to the leasehold premises began with an indenture of 13th Sept. 1800, made between Henry Blunt, of Chelsea, in the county of Middlesex, esquire, the executor named in the last will and testament of Samuel Blunt, then late of Horsham, in the county of Sussex, esquire, deceased, of the one part, and George Hutchinson, of Westheathly, in the county of Sussex, esquire, of the other part, reciting that by indenture, dated 20th Jan. 1606, and made between Sir Anthony Mayne, knight, George Blencoe, esquire, and Henry Halt, of the one part, and John Middleton of the other part, for the considerations therein mentioned, the said Sir Anthony Mayne, G. Blencoe, and Henry Halt, did demise, grant, and to farm let unto the said John Middleton, his executors, administrators, and assigns, all those messuages, mills, cottages, farms, orchards, gardens, lands, tenths, and hereditaments, with all and singular their appurtenances, commonly called or known by the name or names of Ifield Forge, Ifield Furnace, and all other the mills, messuages, lands and tenths theretofore demised by the said Sir Anthony Mayne, by the name of A. Mayne, Esq., and Arthur Middleton, and unto the said John Middleton or either of them, and also all those the lands and tenths then or theretofore called or known by the name or names of Poyningham, Fletchers, or Bowling Spitts, Chaulktons, Rowswood, Blackhurst, and by what other name or names soever they or either of them were called or known by, situate, lying, and being in the parishes of Ifield, Crawley, and Beeding alias Seale, or either of them in the said county of Essex; and also all other the messuages, lands, tenths, and other hereditaments of them the said Sir Anthony Mayne, George Blencoe, and Henry Halt, or either of them in the said parishes of Ifield, Crawley, and Beeding, alias Seale, or either of them, theretofore demised or to farm let to the said John Middleton, William Heaver of Ifield, or John Woodman, or either of them in the said parishes of Ifield, Crawley, and Beeding alias Seale, or either of them in the said county of Sussex; and also all other the messuages, lands and tenths in the said parishes of Ifield, Crawley, and Beeding alias Seale, or either of them, all which said messuages, mills, lands, and tenths contained in the whole by estimation 574 acres, to hold unto the said John Middleton, his executors, administrators, and assigns, from the feast of St. Michael the Archangel 1599, unto the full end and term of 1000 years, under the yearly rent of 1*d.*, payable on the said feast day only (if demanded), and the said Sir Anthony Mayne, George Blencoe, and Henry Halt, by the now reciting indenture for the consideration therein mentioned, did bargain and sell unto the said John Middleton all the woods and underwoods standing, growing, and being on the said demised premises, and every part thereof. And reciting that by divers assignments, conveyances, wills, bequests, and other acts in the law, the said messuages, mills, lands, tenths, hereditaments, and premises by the said thereinbefore recited indenture demised with their appurtenances, became legally vested in John Middleton, Esq., deceased, for all the residue now to come and unexpired of the said term of 1000 years, in and by the said recited indenture granted, &c. The abstract then set out a number of other assignments.

FRIEND v. BUCKLEY.

[Ex. Ch.]

On the 3rd Feb., requisitions on the title of the defendant, as set forth in the abstract, were sent to the defendant through his attorney, and replies were returned thereto on or about the first March following. The first requisition was as follows :

Where and when will the several deeds, wills, &c., which are abstracted in chief and the lease of the 20th Jan. 1606, be produced for examination with the abstract? Of course all expenses attending the examination of documents elsewhere than at the office of the vendor's solicitor will be paid by the vendor.

Part of the second requisition was as follows :

The purchaser requires an attested copy of the lease of the 20th Jan. 1606, and a covenant for its production by its legal possessor.

The second requisition also required the delivery of attested copies of a number of other indentures. To these two the replies were :

The production of a deed more than sixty years of age cannot be insisted upon : (See Prosser v. Watts, 6 Mad. 59.) As to the mere inheritance term mentioned in No. 2, it is now annihilated by the Act to render the assignment of satisfied terms unnecessary.

No further replies to the requisitions made on behalf of the plaintiff being furnished in the meanwhile, the following notice rescinding the agreement to purchase was given by the plaintiff to the defendant :

Lyons and Gossips Green Farms.

Sir,—In consequence of your having, by your replies to the requisitions on the title, declined to produce the lease dated the 20th Jan. 1606 (to the production of which I am entitled), and of your having by the said replies stated that it is out of your power to provide me with covenants to which I am entitled for the production of such lease, and of divers other deeds and documents which are material to the title of the above farms, or one of them, and which will not be delivered on my paying off the mortgage for 5000*l.* thereon, and of your having failed to prove the representation you made to me respecting the freedom of the estates from the great or rectorial tithes (no grant by the Crown thereof to any lay person having been abstracted or produced, and the same, if in fact a lay inheritance, not having been effectually merged); and in consequence likewise of your having insufficiently replied to divers of the said requisitions, especially those respectively numbered 15, 16, 26, and 28, and of your not having replied at all to others of them, especially those respectively numbered 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, I do hereby give you notice that I reject the title to the above farms, and rescind my agreement for the purchase thereof, dated in or about the month of Jan. 1868, and expressed to be made between you of the one part and myself of the other part. And I hereby require you forthwith to repay to me, or to pay to my solicitors, Messrs. Palmer, Palmer, and Bull, of No. 24, Bedford-row, Holborn, the deposit or sum of 400*l.* paid by me to you, together with all expenses incurred by me in investigating the title to the said farms, and in relation thereto.

Dated this 12th March, 1868.

A. B. FRIEND.

To Joseph Buckley, Esq.

After the above notice was given, that is to say on the 6th May 1868, it was discovered by the attorneys for the plaintiff that there was a mortgage upon the defendant's property comprised in the agreement of the 8th Jan. 1868, for a further sum, the date of which did not appear at the trial, and which was not mentioned to the plaintiff by the abstract of title or otherwise.

Supplementary answers to the requisitions were delivered on the 14th May, 1868. None of them, however, related to the requisition of the production of the lease of the 20th Jan. 1606 for examination.

On the 6th May the plaintiff's attorneys wrote to the defendant's attorney as follows :

London, 9th May, 1868.

Friend v. Buckley.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your inquiry, we think it likely that we may be able to induce our client to complete, if the vendor will reduce the purchase-money so that it does not exceed £5800. in the whole, that is, including the sum owing on the mortgage and the amount paid on deposit, all the stock and growing crops included. The above is, of course, without prejudice.—Yours faithfully,

PALMER, PALMER, and BULL.

The defendant having refused to repay to the plaintiff the amount of deposit and the costs of investigating the title, this action was brought on the 10th April 1868.

No evidence was given on behalf of the defendant at the trial.

The question for the opinion of the court of appeal was whether the plaintiff was entitled to retain the verdict entered for him at the trial?

Mellish, Q.C. (with him Morgan Lloyd), for the appellant (the defendant).—The requisitions sent to the vendor were thirty-seven in all, but four only have been relied on, and the argument in the case turns chiefly upon one of them and the sufficiency of the answer to it, viz., the requisition of the production for examination of the lease of 1606, and the answer that the production of a deed more than sixty years old cannot be insisted on. The non-production of the indenture of 1606 did not, it is submitted, entitle the plaintiff to rescind the contract. There could be no sound practical objection to completing the contract on the ground of the non-production of a deed more than 250 years old under the circumstances of this case. The abstract of title furnished by the defendant begins more than sixty years back, viz., from the 13th Sept. 1800, and there is a complete series of assignments from that time, coupled with the possession of the demised premises, which removes every practical ground of objection. If a deed more than sixty years old recites another older deed, it is not necessary to produce that older deed. In Prosser v. Watts, 6 Mad. 59, a conveyance dated in 1753, under which there had ever since been an undisputed possession, recited certain prior deeds as matters of title, which the vendor was unable to produce or give any evidence of, and the purchaser for that reason objected to the performance of his contract, alleging that the recital affected him with constructive notice of the contents of the deeds, and that he could not safely complete his purchase without seeing that the deeds confirmed the title; but the Court overruled his objection. "There is no dispute," said the Vice-Chancellor, "that the recital of a deed is constructive notice of its contents; but to say that a purchaser is not to complete his contract unless he has the actual inspection of every deed of which he has constructive notice by recital would lead to a practical inconvenience which would be manifestly absurd. . . . There must of necessity be some practical limit to the operation of this objection; and the true inquiry seems to be in every case whether the absence of the deed throws any reasonable doubt upon the title of the vendor. Prima facie it is to be presumed that the purchaser in the ancient conveyance had actual inspection of every deed recited, and was satisfied with their contents; and further, it is to be observed that it is not probable that a vendor would recite deeds which afforded evidence against his title. When there is no evidence to repel the effect of these general presumptions, and when the title under the conveyance which contains the recital is fortified by sixty years undisputed possession, I think it is a good practical rule to hold that the loss of a deed recited throws no reasonable doubt upon the title of the vendor, and that the purchaser must complete his contract." This would clearly be the rule in the case of an ordinary sale of freehold property. Looking at the very peculiar nature of the present case, can it be said that there is any "reasonable doubt" thrown upon the title of the vendor, by the non-production of the original lease of 1606? The reason for requiring in general the production of the original lease is, that the lessor may possibly have reserved to himself certain rights which may be burthensome to the tenant; but such a reason cannot exist in the case of land held in undisputed possession for such a long period at a rent of only one penny, and that only "if demanded." [CLEASBY, B. referred to Alexander v. Crosbie, 1

FRIEND v. BUCKLEY.

[Ex. Ch.]

Jones and Lat. 666, in which neither the non-production of a will recited in a deed, nor the non-production of articles between the father, tenant for life, and his son, tenant in tail, authorising the revocation of certain uses declared, was held to constitute a valid objection to the title.] And in the present case, besides the recital, there is an undisputed actual enjoyment of more than sixty years. There is no decided authority as to leaseholds; but the practical rule laid down by the Vice-Chancellor in Prosser v. Watts (ubi sup.), may with the greatest safety be applied to such a case as the present. The court should not look minutely to see whether there is any objection which to a lawyer may seem theoretically possible, but whether there is any practically possible ground of infirmity in the title. [Some other points were taken, but they did not relate to the ground on which the decision of the court was given; and it was ultimately agreed to refer all points in dispute, except that as to the necessity of producing the original lease, to the determination of a conveyancer.]

Joshua Williams, Q. C. (with whom was J. C. Mathew) for the plaintiff. The indenture of Sept. 13, 1800, reciting that of Jan. 20, 1606, shows the demise to be of a large quantity of leasehold property, including mills, and forges. Leasehold property is generally made determinable upon certain conditions; and it is as probable as not that in the lease of 1606 there were covenants as to the working of the mills and forges of which the purchaser in the present case can know nothing unless by examination of the original lease. It is because there may always exist covenants of this sort, on breach of which the leasehold property is made determinable, that the courts have held it necessary for the vendor of leasehold property to produce the original lease, or an attested copy. The indenture of Sept. 13, 1800, does not even purport to recite the whole of the original lease; and if there were no covenants or conditions of a character onerous to the lessee and beneficial to the lessor, what was the utility of the reservation of a rent of one penny? a rent which could only be useful as keeping up the title of the lessor. "If the purchaser of a lease," says Lord St. Leonards (Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit. p. 370), "is not entitled to the lessor's title, he of course can only acquire a regular title to the leasehold interest from the time the lease was granted. If the lease be an ancient one, it is not necessary to do more than make it the root of title, and then commence the derivative title with an assignment on a sale or mortgage within a reasonable period, e.g., fifty years"; and at p. 410 he says, "The creation of terms of years assigned to attend the inheritance should be shown by the abstract, but the intermediate assignments may be abstracted very shortly." The necessity of showing the lessor's title is also stated in Dart's Vendors and Purchasers (3rd edit.), p. 191: "Upon a sale of leaseholds the abstract must (except in the case of a bishop's lease) show the lessor's title as well as the subsequent title to the term," where the reason of the exception is also stated. "The decision as to the non-production of the bishop's title was on the ground of the lease having been granted in a mode prescribed by an Act of Parliament, and upon the presumed notoriety arising from the use of the episcopal seal; and it would seem to apply to leases granted by a dean and chapter, and possibly to other cases; and the general rule does not apply when the purchaser enters into the contract with notice that the freehold title cannot be produced; nor does it appear clear that the rule applies when, on the sale of a lease of great antiquity, the vendor shows the creation of the term, and deduces the leasehold title for the last sixty years." So that even in the case of a lease of great antiquity the deed creating the term must be proved. Preston, indeed, in his Abstracts of Title, pp. 11, 12, seems to think that in some cases the creation of the term need not be proved. He says, "though it be true that the deed creating a term is material to the title, and is the evidence on which a purchaser can best rely, yet a title under a very long term of years, which has been created for sixty years at least, appears to be marketable without evidence of the creation of the term, since, against all persons except the lessor or those who claim the reversion or remainder under him, the recitals are evidence of the title; and the lessor, or those who claim under him, cannot by any means, after sixty years, recover the lands without proof of an actual seisin within that period. To show the seisin they must adduce evidence of the tenancy, and in adducing such evidence, unless in very particular circumstances (as where a rent is reserved), they must support the title under the term; and in several instances titles have been approved by gentlemen of distinguished eminence, although there was not any evidence of the creation of the term except by recital." These observations, however, apply only to the case of the original deed being lost, and this view has been doubted by other conveyancers of eminence. In Bythewood and Jarman's Precedents (3rd edit.) title "Abstracts," p. 69, the law is thus stated: "Where an estate is held under a lease of great antiquity a vendor, it is conceived, could only be required to show the creation of the term, and to deduce the title for the last sixty years, and it would not be incumbent on him to trace its history uninterruptedly from the origin of the lease down to the immediate transaction. Even the absence of the deed creating the term will not, in the opinion of some gentleman at least, render the title unmarketable: (see 1 Prec. Abst. 11);" and there may no doubt be cases where the non-production of the deed creating the term would not practically weaken the title, e.g., where there has been a demise to a mortgagee to secure the repayment of the money advanced; but there is nothing in the present case to show the existence of such a state of facts. The case of Prosser v. Watts, cited on behalf of the defendant, was a case of freehold property, and as such is quite distinguishable from the present case. Finally, there is nothing in the present case to show that it is not in the vendor's power to produce the lease of 1606.

Mellish, Q. C. in reply.—There is no authority in any way conclusive on the point as to the question involved in this case; and the text writers only state that ordinarily the original deed creating the term must be produced. The authority of Mr Preston is in favour of the defendant's contention. It is admitted that if this had been the case of a mortgage, it would not be necessary to produce the original deed; and if we examine the circumstances of the present case, the lease amounts, practically, to a conveyance of the fee. The term of 1000 years goes back to 1599, though the lease was executed in 1606, i. e., it goes back nearly to the time of the creation of those long terms of years, and the long lease practically amounts to a sale of the freehold. After a series of assignments, and a continued possession under them for over sixty years, it is almost inconceivable that there should be any risk in taking the property with the title offered. [WILLES, J.—There is a recital of the sale of the messuages, cottages, farms, orchards, gardens, &c., but not of the sale of the minerals. Suppose the lease contained a proviso which is found in many old leases, that the lessor should be at liberty to enter to search for mines, and that a counterpart of the lease should now be found containing that condition, would not that be a defect in the title?] The defendant only proposes to sell a leasehold interest, without saying anything about mines or minerals. [WILLES, J.—Suppose the existence of such a proviso in the original deed could be shown, would not that be an objection to the vendor's suing the purchaser for not completing the purchase?] It probably would. [WILLES, J.—The question then is—does this recital reasonably exclude that?] It is submitted that it does. A conveyance of freehold property might contain in it such a reservation of minerals as has been suggested, and yet after sixty years the production of the original conveyance cannot be insisted on. [WILLES, J.—That, however, does not apply to the case of a right of re-entry.] Cur. adv. vult.

FRIEND v. BUCKLEY.

[Ex. Ch.]

Feb. 4, 1870.—The judgment of the court was now delivered as follows by KELLY, C.B.—This is a case in which the plaintiff and defendant had entered into a contract for the sale and purchase of certain freehold and leasehold estates. The contract contained no special stipulation of any kind whatever, but merely provided in the ordinary form of words, for the delivery of an abstract of title by the vendor and the making out of a title to the property to be conveyed. A portion of the property was leasehold, and, looking at the statement of the case and the abstract, it appears that amongst this property was a quantity of land held under a lease of the date, Jan. 20, 1606. It appeared on the abstract, that is, a statement appeared on it, that this lease had been assigned from party to party, and at one period, more than a century ago, the larger portion of it had passed by assignment into the hands of one person, the remaining quantity passing into the hands of another person. The estate in question in the present case consisted of a portion of from 90 to 100 acres, and as to this it appeared by the abstract that the title was alleged to be deduced from this ancient lease of 1606. At last, by various assignments during more than sixty years, from about the year 1800 or a later date, this came into the possession of the vendor, and no doubt, supposing the assignments correctly to recite the original lease, and supposing it had been produced and the root of title made out, the successive assignments for more than sixty years would have made out a marketable title. But it appears that upon the abstract being delivered the objection was made on the part of the intending purchaser to which I am now about to advert. Various objections appear upon the requisitions, but the objection to the non-production of the original lease is stated in the compass of about three lines at the head of the requisitions, and it is in this form: "The purchaser requires an attested copy of the lease of Jan. 20, 1606, and a covenant for its production of its legal possessor." Now the only answer to this requisition is in these words: "The production of a deed more than sixty years of age cannot be insisted upon." That raises the question which we are called on to determine. The case was argued indeed upon various points and grounds, but it is unnecessary to refer to the arguments further than, with regard to what was insisted on at the bar—viz., that if the result of the requisition and answer was such as I have stated, the vendor was not bound to produce the original lease; that after such a lapse of time it might have been lost, and therefore secondary evidence of its contents might constitute a sufficient root of title, and that the recital of the lease which appeared in several assignments should be deemed sufficient—to say that the recital itself does not purport to set forth the whole of the lease, but only the substance, and it still left open the question whether there might not be something more in the original lease than appeared; something which might have constituted a defect of title. Now we must not be supposed to determine that if the answer had been "the lease is lost and therefore we cannot produce it; there is no authentic copy of the whole of the lease, and therefore we have no means of showing the entire contents of it except by means of the several assignments and the recitals contained in them"—if such appeared to be the answer made to the requisition—and what I am now stating I state for myself only, though we all agree in the general judgment to be delivered—we must not be supposed to decide that that would not have been a sufficient answer, and that reference might not have been had to the recital of the original lease in one or more of the assignments. For myself I give no opinion on that point; it might or might not be a sufficient answer to the requisition, but at present I do not pronounce any opinion on the matter. We are relieved from all difficulty as to the judgment we should pronounce by the consideration that nothing would have been easier on the part of the vendor than to have introduced into the contract of sale a stipulation to the effect that, as the original lease could not be produced, the recital of it in the assignments of more than sixty years old must be deemed sufficient proof of it. Such a stipulation would have dispensed with the necessity of producing it, and every difficulty would be obviated. But that was not done, and when the objection was made as to its non-production the only answer made was "the production of a deed more than sixty years of age cannot be insisted on;" and we are of opinion that on that a sufficient title is not made out by the vendor. Taking the requisition and the answer to it together, the contention of the vendor must be that in the case of an absolute, unconditional contract for the sale of property of this kind, where the lease is alleged to be more than sixty years old, it is enough for the vendor to show an assignment, or a series of assignments of the property, reciting the parcels demised and the reddendum of the lease only, but not purporting to recite the original lease itself, accompanied by sixty years possession consistent with such assignments; and that the original lease itself need not be produced, or a copy of it, or any further evidence of its contents, and that the purchaser is bound to accept such proof of title to the term, taking his chance of the undisclosed contents of the lease, and that he is not entitled to satisfy himself, either by examination of the lease or otherwise, that it gives what he has bargained for, namely, a clear title to the term without onerous covenants or conditions constituting substantial infirmity in the title such as would justify its rejection. In determining the question thus raised it ought to be dealt with as a general one, affecting all leaseholds more than sixty years old, and it was so treated in the answer to the requisition. Upon the argument indeed reliance was placed upon the special circumstances of this case, upon the alleged great antiquity of the particular lease, the small amount of the rent, the peculiar language of the reservation; the probable object of the creation of the term being to raise money, in support of which speculation the history of leases of long terms of years might be referred to (see Lord Hardwicke's judgment in Willoughby v. Willoughby, 1 T. R. 761), and of which the sale of the timber in this case was also said to be some evidence. As a counterpoise to this sort of argument may be adduced the uncertainty and consequent litigation that will follow if each case is to be decided according to the special circumstances, making it more or less likely or unlikely that the lease, if its whole contents were disclosed, would show a good title, more or less likely that the reversioner could or would take advantage of any defect, more or less likely that there was any reversioner, or that the owner had become entitled in default, and so forth. In some cases such considerations might seem frivolous, in others weighty. They are more proper for the discretion of the purchaser and his advisers before he makes his bargain and incurs expense and it is competent to the vendor to exclude all subsequent reference to them by a simple condition that the purchaser shall be satisfied with the recital of the lease in the assignment or assignments (specifying it or them), without requiring production of the lease, or proof that it is lost, or a copy or proof of its contents further than such recital affords, a precaution which in this case was not adopted. Upon the sale of a lease less than sixty years old, without condition, the purchaser would be entitled to, and it would be part of the duty of his solicitor to require, amongst other things, proof of the contents of the lease; and the vendor could not fulfil his obligation to show a good title without affording such proof. No authority was cited for making the distinction now contended for in favour of the vendor of a lease more than sixty years old. Nor is there any sound reason for doing so, considering that the limitation to sixty years, or, as has been suggested by great authority, forty years, in the case of sales of fee-simple estates, is founded upon the effect of the Statute of Limitations. But it must be remembered that that statute does not begin to run against the reversioner after a term of years, before the expiration of the term or a forfeiture of which the reversioner elects to take advantage. This consideration distinguishes the present case from that of Prosser v. Watts, 6 Maddocks, 59, where the purchaser of a fee simple estate required the inspection of deeds recited in conveyances included in an abstract which, without such recitals, would have shown a good and sufficient title upon the ground that the recitals were constructive notice of the deeds and their contents, and that these might perhaps show something to prejudice the title, which, without them, was complete. In the present case the lease partially recited is the root of the title, and without the recital there would have been nothing to show that the thing contracted to be sold, viz., a subsisting term (not a mere chance of not being ejected) had any existence. It would be extravagant to hold that upon an absolute unconditional sale in 1869 of a lease for 100 years made in 1806, the purchaser was bound to accept a title founded upon a recital of part of that lease in an assignment to the vendor in 1810 or 1808, though accompanied by a provision consistent with the lease, but also consistent with its containing provisions making it in effect something different from what was contracted to be sold. To bind the purchaser to accept such ambiguous proof of title there ought in justice to be a condition apprising him that he must be content not only without the lease, but without knowing all its contents; and it is more reasonable to require that where circumstances of such a character exist, the difficulty should be anticipated by such a condition, which it is in the power of the vendor, in the first instance, to impose, and the like of which are constantly used to meet similar contingencies, than that it should be open to a vendor upon every sale of a lease more than sixty years old to litigate the question whether it was reasonable that he should be prepared to produce it or, accounting for its absence, to prove its contents. The vendor, not having in this case imposed such a condition, and not having, by production, or proof, however slight, of loss, and that no complete copy exists, or otherwise shown the purchaser a title to that which he proposed to sell; but having insisted only that was not bound to produce a lease more than sixty years old, the purchaser is entitled to retain the judgment given in his favour in the Court of Queen's Bench, which ought, therefore, to be affirmed.

Damage to cargo—Perils of the seas—Right to sue.

In a suit for damage to cargo and for improper delivery thereof by the consignees, who were also assignees of the bills of lading, it was Held, that the plaintiff had a persona standi both as to negligence and breach of contract.

The Figlia Maggiore and the Nepoter followed.

This was a suit instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. Simmons and Hunt, of Mark-lane, in the City of London, against the vessel Freedom. It appeared that on the 3rd Sept. 1868, Messrs. Campbell and Thayer, of New York, caused to be shipped on board the Freedom, then lying in the port of New York, six parcels, consisting each of 500 bags of linseed cake marked "C. and T.," and that the master of the vessel received the same to be carried on board the vessel to London upon the terms of six several bills of lading.

These bills of lading were in form exactly similar, and were so far as material in the words following:

Shipped in good order, and well conditioned by Campbell and Thayer, on board the ship called the Freedom, whereof is master now lying in the port of New York and bound for London to say (500) five hundred bags linseed cake, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of London (the dangers of the seas only excepted) unto order or to assigns, he or they paying freight for the said merchandise 17s. 6d. sterling per ton, with 5 per cent. prime and average accustomed of 2240lb. gross. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void. Dated in New York, the 3rd Sept. 1868. Weight unknown.

The ship sailed on her voyage, and arrived in London on the 10th Oct. 1868. For a reason which will presently appear, a small portion of the cake only was put into lighters on the 13th or 14th, and the rest was landed in the London Docks. The landing on the quay begun on the 23rd Oct., and was completed on the 4th Nov. Out of the 3000 bags it appears that only 317 arrived in a perfectly sound state, and some 134 of these were externally damaged by sea water. The plaintiffs claimed as consignees of the goods, and assignees of the bills of lading, and it appeared that bills of exchange to the amount of 2980*l.* were drawn upon the plaintiffs against the bills of lading, and were accepted and paid by them.

The plaintiffs claimed both for the damage and for loss sustained by an improper mode of delivery.

Butt, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for defendants.

March 4.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—One of the defences raised by the defendants is that in this case the plaintiffs have no title to sue at all, even for negligence, and, secondly, that they have no right to sue as consignees in contract. It is admitted that I decided adversely to both these contentions in the Figlia Maggiore, L. Rep. 2 Adm. 106; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 532, and in The Nepoter, Ibid, 375, and infra. I have reconsidered these cases, and I see no reason to alter the opinion which I then formed. The consignees, therefore, having according to my former decisions a persona standi both as to negligence and as to breach of contract, put in their claim for this damage to the cargo, which has been proved, and also for a loss sustained by them in consequence of an improper mode of delivery. The charges under the first head are these: "The said six parcels of 500 bags were not delivered to the plaintiffs according to the terms of the said bills of lading, in as good order and condition as when they were shipped on board the said vessel at New York as aforesaid, but, on the contrary, the same were delivered to the plaintiffs much damaged and in much worse order and condition. Such nondelivery as aforesaid to the plaintiffs of the said six parcels of 500 bags, in as good order and condition as when they were shipped, was not occasioned by the dangers of the seas in the said bills of lading excepted." And on the second head, these: "The said six parcels of 500 bags each were not delivered to the plaintiffs in London separately, but the said 3000 bags were by the said master improperly and negligently delivered to the plaintiffs, all mixed up together. By reason of the premises and of the master of the said vessel refusing to deliver to the plaintiffs the bags which were damaged separately from those which were not damaged, the plaintiffs not only lost a great part of the value of the said bags, but were put to great expense in and about repacking the said goods, and sorting the same, according to marks and numbers, and in and about separating the damaged from the non-damaged portion, and in and about keeping, warehousing, and improving the condition of the said bags. To the charges on the first head the defendants have replied as follows: They deny the truth of the allegations contained in the sixth article of the said petition. The damage (if any) to the oil cake in the said petition mentioned was occasioned by the dangers of the seas or by the natural qualities of the said oil cake, and not by any breach of contract contained in the bills of lading in the said petition mentioned, or by any negligence or breach of duty on the part of the master or crew of the Freedom. With respect to the first defence, the fact of the damage has been proved. With regard to the charges contained under the second head, which are of minor importance, the defendants deny the fact in their answer, and by their evidence seek to establish two points, the first, that they were not bound to sort and weigh the goods on the ship before delivery; the second, that they were delivered according to marks and numbers. I have considered the evidence of Simmons, and Hopwood, and Ford, and Bradley, and I am of opinion that it is proved that the delivery according to marks and numbers was demanded by the consignees and refused by the master. With respect to the master's right to refuse to allow the goods to be sorted and weighed on deck, I think it is proved that this sorting and weighing had been invariably required by Simmons and conceded to him. I have considered the case of Coulthurst v. Sweet, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 654, which appears to me, though not conclusive, in favour of Simmons's claim. But this is really not material, because the plaintiffs were clearly entitled under the bills of lading to the delivery according to marks and numbers, and that was refused to them. I think therefore they are entitled to have compensation for any loss which they sustained by reason of this refusal. But the really important question in the case relates to the liability of the owners of the ship for the state of deterioration in which the cake is proved to have arrived. The fact of damage being established, I have already decided in a previous stage of this very case (3 Mar. Law Cas. 219, 261), that the burden of proving affirmatively that such damage was in consequence of the excepted peril lies upon the defendants. And the same observation applies to the other branch of the defence, namely, that the damage was incurred by the intrinsic properties of the cake. It is to be inferred from what I have stated, that there is no real controversy as to the good order of these cakes when they were put on board, a fact which is amply proved by the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiffs; and it therefore only remains for me to consider whether the defendants have sustained either of the defences which they have alleged. I think it would be convenient to take the latter defence first. I am satisfied upon the evidence as I was in the case of the Figlia Maggiore, that with respect to oil cake shipped in proper order and condition as this was, the amount of deterioration proved in this case cannot be ascribed to any inherent vice or intrinsic property of the cake. Now with respect to the other defence, have the defendants proved that this injury was caused by peril of the sea? And this question resolves itself into another, What is peril of the sea? It is admitted that neither defective stowage, nor bad ventilation, nor the neighbourhood of a heating cargo, nor a distant heating cargo of such a kind as would throw off heat to affect the whole cargo, would fall within the category of peril of the sea. But it is alleged that the evidence disproves that any of these causes produced the damage in question. This is the negative contention. The affirmative contention is, that sea water combined with heat of weather, and the warmth of the water in the Gulf stream, and a state of weather which rendered it necessary to keep the hatches closed during a portion of the voyage, and the condensation of steam consequent thereupon, were the causes of the damage, and that these causes fall within the category of the excepted sea peril. Here it is right to observe that the master in his evidence being asked what he thought caused the damage, said the oilcake itself—the heat of the oilcake—the intrinsic heat. It is true that afterwards, when the suggestion is made to him that the necessary closing of hatches may have partly caused the damage, he adopts the suggestion. With respect to defective stowage generally and apart from the question of the bones I think the evidence is in favour of the defendants, both according to the plan which has been put in and the testimony of the witnesses; and no injury occurred to the oil-cake in this case, as it did in the former cases, from the tobacco which formed a part of the cargo. Nor is there any evidence that the clover seed, which formed part of the cargo, had an injurious effect on the cake. The subject of ventilation must be considered in connection with the allegation, that the state of the weather during the voyage and the constant necessity for keeping the hatches closed, caused the damage to the cake. In the first place the evidence as to the weather is not what could be desired; the log-book has not been produced here; it was said to have been left at New York but to that place a commission issued from this court to examine witnesses. It does not appear that any protest was made against the damage to the cargo caused by bad weather. With respect to the ventilation, it appears by the captain's evidence, that there was a large ventilator by the mainmast, another at the after end of the ship by the wheel, and an "air-streak" under the topgallant fore-castle. It is quite possible that these ventilators might have been adequate though several of the witnesses are of a contrary opinion if the hatches were properly and sufficiently opened; the captain swears that the weather prevented them from being opened; I have said that I do not think the evidence satisfactory upon this point. That there was a great rush of steam and heat, when the hatches were taken off, and for some time afterwards is undisputed. The hatches were taken off on the 12th Oct. and Kinnipie, who went on board to survey the damaged cargo, says that on the 19th Oct. he could scarcely see down the fore hatchway on account of the steam, and that there was a great stink. The hold was said to be like an oven by one witness, and Burstall, an experienced broker, says that on the 20th Oct. the steam in the fore hold dimmed his spectacles. I now come to the question as to whether the extensive damage to the cakes can be ascribed to other portions of the cargo which were of such a character as to generate the heat and steam whereby the cakes were damaged. This brings me to the consideration of the bones, which formed a part of the cargo. [His Lordship then commented at great length upon the evidence, and said.] Looking, therefore, to the facts proved with respect to the condition of these bones, and to the opinion of experts on the inferences of science applicable to such a state of things, I have arrived at the conclusion that the damage to the oil-cake was caused, in great measure at least, by the presence of these bones on board the ship. But this conclusion does not appear to me necessary for my judgment in favour of the plaintiffs. In my opinion it was incumbent upon the defendants to show that the extensive damage done to their cargo, was caused by "dangers of the sea," which is the only exception contained in the bill of lading. I think that upon the evidence before me, they have failed to do so, and on both grounds, therefore, I pronounce for the prayer of the plaintiffs, and make the usual reference to the registrar and merchants.

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Consignee—Right to sue—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111—24 Vict. c. 10.

C. and M. had been in the habit of receiving consignments of goods from N. and accepting his bills, and there was an account current between them. A cargo of sugar so consigned at a time N. was debtor in the account between them having suffered damage, C. and M. brought a suit in this court:

Held, that a sufficient property vested in C. and M. to satisfy the Bills of Lading Act.

Semle, a mere consignee to whom the property in the goods does not pass, has a right to sue in the Court of Admiralty:

Held, also, that sugar injured by drainage from other sugar improperly stowed was not damaged by "leakage" as named in the excepted perils.

This was a suit under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, against the Norwegian barque Nepoter, and her owners, and was instituted by Messrs. Cottam, Morten, and Co., as consignees of various parcels of sugar which formed part of the cargo.

The consignor had been in the habit of consigning goods for sale to the plaintiffs, who from time to time had accepted the consignor's bills, and credited him with the proceeds. On the account between them, the consignor was a debtor to the plaintiffs.

The bills of lading were not indorsed to the consignees, but they were named therein as the persons to whom the goods were to be delivered.

The bills of lading were in the following form:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by James Harvey, in and upon the good ship called the Nepoter, whereof is master for the present voyage Nielsen, and now in the port of Salt River, Jamaica, and bound for London, twenty hogsheads, forty-one tierces, forty-four barrels of sugar, fourteen puncheons of rum, seventy-eight tons of logwood, all on board being marked and numbered as E. M., and are to be delivered in the like good order, and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of London (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire and, all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted), unto Cottam, Morton, and Co., or to their assigns. Freight for the said goods, to be paid, 3s. 3d. per cwt. for sugar, 5d. per gallon for rum, and 20s. per ton for wood, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, the other to stand void. Weight and contents unknown. Not liable for leakage. G. NIELSON.

Dated in Salt River, Jamaica, 17th April 1868.

The petition alleged that the goods were not delivered "in good order and well conditioned;" that such nondelivery was "caused by the negligence or misconduct of the master and crew, or was otherwise a breach of contract or duty on the part of the master and of the defendants." And the answer alleged, first, that the plaintiffs were not consignees of the goods to whom the property in them had passed; secondly, that the goods were delivered in a proper state and condition to the plaintiffs; thirdly, that the nondelivery of the goods was not occasioned by negligence, breach of contract, or breach of duty on the part of the master or of the defendants; and, fourthly, that the damage was occasioned by leakage, for which the defendants were not liable.

Keene, Q. C. and R. G. Williams for the defendants.

July 27—Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—With respect to the first defence, which is one of law, the validity of it must depend upon the true construction of sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and of the practice of this court independently of that Act. Upon both grounds I am of opinion that this defence fails. I adhere to the construction of the statute which I expressed in the Figlia Maggiore, L. Rep. 2 A. & E. 106; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 532; and I think that these plaintiffs have a right under sect. 6 of 24 Vict. c. 10, to sue the defendants both for negligence and for breach of contract as "consignees of goods named in the bills of lading," even though the property did not pass; in other words, that it is not necessary to import into the Admiralty Court Act from the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111) the words "to whom the property in the goods shall pass." I am aware that this construction differs from that which Dr. Lushington put upon the statute in his judgment in the St. Cloud, Br. & L. 4; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54, and that I am taking a step beyond that which I took in the Figlia Maggiore; but after much reflection I have come to the conclusion that the Admiralty Court Act intended to give every consignee or assignee of a bill of lading a capacity to sue in this court for damage done to the goods mentioned in the bill. I think this, which is certainly the obvious construction of the plain words of the statute, is consistent with the intention of the Legislature to protect the absent owners; it must often happen, as in the present case, that an immediate proceeding, and one which would allow no time for communication with the owner, must be necessary for his protection. The evidence of damage caused by fermentation or the like process might, and not unfrequently would, be lost, in consequence of the delay which the necessity of such a communication would create; and I agree with Dr. Lushington in his general view of the objects of this statute in the St. Cloud: "The general intention of the Legislature cannot be doubtful. The statute is remedial. The short delivery of goods brought to this country in foreign ships, or their delivery in a damaged state, was frequently a grievous injury for which there was no practical remedy; for the owners of such vessels being resident abroad, no action could be successfully brought against them in a British tribunal. To send the merchant who had sustained a loss to commence a suit in a foreign tribunal, and probably in a distant country, could not be deemed a practical or effectual remedy. With a view to obviate a grievance so oppressive to British merchants, the enactment contained in the 6th section was passed. It was intended to operate by enabling the party aggrieved to arrest the ship in cases where, from the absence of the shipowner in foreign parts, the common law tribunals could not afford effectual redress." By the 7th section of the same statute (24 Vict. c. 10), it has been enacted that "the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." This court, confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, has, in the case of the Beta, L. Rep. 2 P. C. 447; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 988, put the largest construction on the words "any claim"—a fact which must be considered in weighing the reasons assigned by Dr. Lushington in his judgment in the St. Cloud. The reasons which appear most to have weighed with my learned predecessor for transferring the words of the Bills of Lading Act into the Admiralty Court Act, which he said "at first sight is rather a strong proposition," were as follows: A nude assignee would, if the owners of the ship were out of the country, have a right of action in the Admiralty Court, and in that alone; but if the owners of the ship were in this country, such nude assignee would have no right of action, either in the Admiralty Court or in one of the courts of common law. Such a consequence is so inconsistent with reason that I cannot believe it was the intention of the Legislature." But it appears to me, as perhaps it would to the learned judge if it had been brought a second time to his consideration, that this consequence is really not unreasonable; because, if the owners of the ship were in this country, the owner of the goods would know where and how to bring his action against them; whereas in the case of the owners being abroad, unless his agent could at once arrest the ship, no action could be brought at all, either in rem or in personam, in this country, although the cargo was discharged here; and all the evidence of the damage must necessarily be in this country. Another reason for putting this construction upon this statute is, that it would be in harmony with the usual practice of this court, which has always put aside technical objections, as to the parties who may institute or defend a suit, and allowed any person who has an interest to appear for the purpose of defending that interest—as in the common case of a bottomry bondholder defending a suit for wages. But if the construction of the statute in the St. Cloud be right, and my present construction wrong, I adhere to my opinion expressed in the Figlia Maggiore, that the assignee would have a persona standi on the ground of negligence or breach of duty, if not on the ground of the breach of contract; for I think that I must assign a distinct force to each of these grounds. I think it right also to add that, after careful perusal of the judgment in the case of Short v. Simpson, I incline to the opinion that a property did pass sufficient to entitle the consignee to sue in this court under these bills of lading in the particular circumstances of this case. It is true that bills were not drawn upon the cargo, but there was an arrangement between the consignor and the consignee according to which the consignee accepted bills drawn upon his firm by the consignor, and credited him with the proceeds of the goods sold from time to time. There was an account current between them; and at the time of the institution of this suit the consignor was considerably in debt to the consignee; and the mention of this fact leads me to notice another criterion of a species of property having passed to the plaintiffs in this case. An indorsee of a bill of lading, to whom a general balance is due, and a consignee of goods, who is intrusted to sell them and has a general balance against the consignor, have an insurable interest in such goods. This is the position of the plaintiffs in this case; and, therefore, I think a sufficient property vested in the plaintiffs to satisfy the Bills of Lading Act; and, moreover, they would have such an interest in the goods as would, according to all analogy derived from the practice of this court, entitle them to sue. Now, with respect to the defence on the facts of the case. The cargo in this case was the usual, if not the invariable, cargo from Jamaica namely, a cargo of sugar; and it is proved to my satisfaction, after due consideration of the evidence on the one side and the other, that the portion of the cargo which belonged to the plaintiffs—and it is to be observed that it was only a small portion of the cargo—was shipped in proper order, and after proper precautions, in the port of Salt River, Jamaica; and the condition in which the cargo generally was discharged at the port of London appears to have been as follows:—The upper portion was in a very good condition, as was also the lower portion, with the exception of the casks on the ground tier, which was consigned to the plaintiffs. On this tier there was an accumulation of drainage in the nature of molasses, part liquid, part encrusted, to the extent of two feet or rather more, up the hogsheads; some of the casks were full, some about half full, some about one-third, and some entirely empty. Not any casks on the bottom tier were absolutely uninjured, according to the evidence of Mr. Jack, who superintended the discharge of the cargo, and who appears to me a perfectly creditable witness. The fact, therefore, that the goods were not discharged in the like good order and condition in which they were laden appears to me to be proved. The next defence is, that this damage was not occasioned by negligence or breach of duty on the part of the master. This defence involves two considerations: first, whether, any precautions ought to have been taken to prevent the accumulation of drainage; secondly, if so, whether such precautions were taken. It appears from the evidence that all sugar cargoes drain, and that this sugar cargo drained, I think, rather less than the average. It appears that the drainage came out, for the most part, if not entirely, from the head of the cask. It is admitted that this drainage should find its way out through the ceiling in some way or other into the hold, and also that the drainage of this cargo did not so find its way. If this drainage does not escape, the lowest tier of casks must, as in the present case, receive injury. I have already adverted to the fact that these casks were embedded more than half way up in molasses; and to this fact there can be no doubt, in my opinion, that the damage done to this cargo was owing. The master frankly admitted that this was the first cargo of sugar which he had ever carried; that there were four holes, about 1½ in. in diameter, bored close to the after part of the pumps, for the purpose only of draining the water when the hold was washed. Other witnesses also speak to these holes. The result of the evidence appears to me to be that they were quite insufficient to afford the necessary means of egress for the liquid stuff to reach the pumps; and that other means ought to have been provided, whether by a greater number, and a larger size of holes, or by keeping the timber boards open by means of wedges, a precaution which appears to be generally taken before the vessel sails. It is clear that the skin of the ceiling of the Nepoter was too tight to allow the stuff to escape without some such precautions. I am therefore of opinion that precautions ought to have been taken by the master, and were not taken, which would have prevented the damage in this case. The last defence remains to be considered, namely, that this damage falls within the excepted perils mentioned in the bills of lading, that is, "not liable for leakage." But this defence appears to me also untenable. For it is not the leakage, properly speaking, which has done this injury to the cargo; but the accumulation of drainage upon the floor to such an extent that the casks were half-way immersed in it; and it was this mischief, which, by keeping out the air, caused the sugar to heat, and thereby, as a natural consequence, produced the emptiness of the casks. The circumstances, therefore, of this case render the judgment of the Privy Council in the Helene, B. & L. 429, inapplicable. Upon the whole, I am satisfied that the plaintiffs have established their case; and I must make the usual order of reference to the registrar to ascertain the amount of the damage; and I must accompany this sentence with costs.

THE NEPOTER.

Petition for adjudication—Non-attendance of petitioner at hearing—Dismissal of petition with costs.

If, upon the day appointed for the hearing of a petition for adjudication, neither the petitioning creditor, nor his solicitor, nor anyone on his behalf, attends to support the petition, the court will, upon the application of the alleged debtor, dismiss the petition with costs, pursuant to the discretion vested in the court by the 8th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

On the 7th Jan. 1870 E. A. Murton, who claimed to be a creditor of H. B., filed a petition for adjudication against him, and on the following day obtained an order for substituted service, and it was directed that service should be effected by inserting a notice in the Gazette, pursuant to 61st General Order of Jan. 1, 1870, requiring him to appear at the hearing of the petition on the day named, which was Feb. 1. A copy of the petition and order for substituted service were also left at the residence of H. B., who was then absent from home.

On the 1st Feb. H. B. attended with his solicitor at the hour appointed, and after waiting some time the learned registrar directed the solicitors for the petitioning creditor to be sent for, and in reply they stated that it was not their intention to attend. Upon this message being reported to the court, Treherne (solicitor), on behalf of H. B., asked that the petition might be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Registrar ROCHE consented to the application, and dismissed the petition accordingly.

Bill of sale—Description of grantor in — Apparent ownership.

The description of the maker of a bill of sale as an "esquire," he being at the time an actor or theatrical manager, is an insufficient description under the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36.)

Where the registration of a bill of sale is insufficient, as improperly describing the maker of the instrument, the furniture and effects comprised in it will pass to the assignees under the subsequent bankruptcy of the maker, notwithstanding that the holder of the bill of sale had, prior to and at the date of the bankruptcy, taken personal possession of the property, by placing his man in possession, with a copy of the bill of sale.

This case came before the court as a special case or the opinion of the Chief Judge. The facts were not in dispute.

In October 1869, the bankrupt gave a bill of sale of certain goods and furniture in his house to his father, in consideration of and as a security for a sum of 400*l.*, advanced by the father to the bankrupt in the month of October, 1869. The bill of sale was registered on the 20th Oct., and on the 23rd Oct. a man was put in possession under the bill of sale; the property, however, was not removed, but was left in the house, and the bankrupt continued to use it as before. The adjudication was made upon the bankrupt's own petition on the 8th Nov. 1869. The assignee now claimed the property comprised in the bill of sale, and which was upon the bankrupt's premises at the date of the adjudication, as being in the apparent possession of the bankrupt within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), and thus within the reputed ownership of the bankrupt at the date of his bankruptcy, with the consent of the true owner, under the 125th section of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849. It was also contended that the bill of sale was insufficient, the grantor, the bankrupt, being therein described as "Esq.", and all mention being omitted of his being at that time the lessee and manager of a theatre.

Finlay Knight appeared for the assignees, in support of their claim.

Bridge appeared in support of the claim of Mr. Vining, Sen., under the bill of sale.—The facts were stated at some length, and will be found in the judgment. The following cases were cited:

Gough v. Everard, 32 L. J. 210, Ex.;

Vicarino v. Hollingsworth, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 362.

The CHIEF JUDGE delivered judgment as follows:—The question in this case is whether the assignees in bankruptcy of George James Vining are entitled to certain furniture and effects, which, at the date of the adjudication, were in a dwelling-house occupied by the bankrupt, or whether the same effects belong to James Vining, to whom they had been assigned by the bankrupt by a bill of sale dated the 7th, and registered on the 20th Oct. in the last year. And the parties have agreed to submit the whole case, and all questions between them, to the decision of this court. The claims of the assignees have been argued upon two grounds: First, that the description of the assignor, the bankrupt in the deed, does not comply with the requisitions of the Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36), which prescribe that there shall be "a description of the residence and occupation of the person making or giving the same." The bankrupt is the lessee and manager of a theatre in London. He says that at the time of giving the bill of sale he was not under any acting engagement, although he did occasionally appear upon the stage; and it has therefore been argued that his description in the bill of sale as an "esquire" is sufficient. If this were the only point in the case, I should be of opinion, without any hesitation, that the description he has adopted is insufficient, and that the statute has not been complied with. The gentleman is by profession an actor, and although it is said that he was not at the particular time referred to under any engagement to act, yet he was undoubtedly a manager of actors. He had the conduct of a theatre, in which he must of necessity have had abundance of employment in preparing plays for representation, in engaging and directing such performers as were there employed, and in entering into a variety of personal contracts incident to his business and occupation as a manager, as well within the terms of the statute as within that which must be taken to be its meaning and object, viz., the giving, by means of the registration, the information to the persons who had dealings with him. I am of opinion that the bill of sale, notwithstanding its registration, is defective for want of an accurate description of the occupation in which the bankrupt was engaged. Upon this point, if authority were needed, it is furnished by the cases of Allen v. Thompson, 1 H. & N. 15; 25 L. J. 249, Ex.; and Adams v. Graham, 33 L. J. 71, Q. B. The assignees insist further, that, inasmuch as the furniture and effects in his house were at the date of the bankruptcy in his apparent possession the bill of sale, the requirements of the statute not having been fulfilled, is invalid as against their statutory title, and they rely upon the interpretation clause of the Act of Parliament which defines the apparent possession to be that of the person making the bill of sale "as long as the chattels shall remain in any house occupied by him, or shall be used and enjoyed by him in any place whatever, notwithstanding that formal possession has been taken by or given to any other person." The facts which it now becomes most important to consider, for the question is really one of fact, appear to be these. The bankrupt being in want of an advance of money applied to his father, the respondent, who agreed to lend and did lend him 400*l.* upon the security of the chattels assigned by the bill of sale; and I may add that there is no reason to doubt the perfect good faith of the transaction in this or any other respect. The money not being repaid, the respondent determined to enforce his security; and on the 25th Oct. last, by his agent William Backhouse, he took possession of the whole of the furniture and effects assigned by the bill of sale, and which then were, and still remain, in the house occupied by the bankrupt. Backhouse says that he was furnished with a copy of the bill of sale, and was desired by the respondent's solicitor to show it to any person claiming the furniture or interfering with his possession thereof; that he retained possession until the 16th Nov. last when he gave up possession to Vivian, another agent of the respondent. And Vivian says that on the 13th Nov. last he relieved Backhouse, and has ever since continued, and is still, in the like possession. Upon the day last-mentioned, the messenger in bankruptcy claimed to take possession of the goods, which Vivian refused to give him, or to relinquish his possession in favour of the assignees. Vivian, however, being unable to prevent him from remaining in the house the messenger is still there. The respondent's counsel insists that the description of the bankrupt in the bill of sale is sufficient; but even if it should be held not to be so, the point is immaterial, for that the Bills of Sale Act gives a preferable or paramount title to assignees in bankruptcy only where the apparent possession of the chattels is in the bankrupt at the time of the bankruptcy. And it is argued that in this case, and upon the facts which I have stated, there was no possession in the bankrupt, apparent or otherwise; and that the interpretation clause does not help the claim of the assignees, for that the possession taken and kept by the respondent was not that formal possession which is there mentioned, but was a real and actual possession taken and kept by him; that it was not in any sense a symbolical possession—a taking of a part to represent the whole, but that from the time when Backhouse went into the house the possession was, and has been, that of the respondent in his own right, and of his own property. Several cases have been referred to, and one of them, strange to say, is most strongly relied upon by each of the counsel as supporting his view. That is the case of Gough v. Everard, 32 L. J. 210, Ex. The question in that case was between a person who claimed as vendee of the property in dispute, under an instrument which, if it could be properly called a bill of sale, at least had not been registered under the statute, and a judgment-creditor of the vendor who had levied his execution against what he alleged were the goods of the vendor. The point therefore was, and could only be, whether, assuming the instrument to be a bill of sale and not registered, the vendee had such full and perfect possession as to exclude the operation of the statute upon the ground of some apparent possession remaining in the vendor, and so to negative the fact upon the presumption that this possession of the vendee had been formal only; or whether the chattels in question had been so sold to and possessed by the vendee as to make it immaterial to consider whether there was a bill of sale within the meaning of the statute, or whether it was registered or not. The property was of three kinds, first, timber lying upon a wharf belonging to another person deposited there until a purchaser could be found for it, and in the mean time unquestionably the property of the vendor until it had been assigned to such purchaser; secondly, timber and other moveable chattels the property of the vendor, and lying upon premises of which the vendor was the owner and occupier; and thirdly, the furniture and effects in a dwelling-house and counting-house which had also belonged to the vendor. These three several kinds of property the vendor sold to the vendee for the prices and upon the terms agreed upon between them. The fairness of the transaction appears to have been open to no suspicion. It was proved that, with respect to the first, the vendee after his purchase had taken persons to see the timber with a view to their buying it, and had in that respect acted as the owner. That as to the second, he had the key of the place in which the chattels were deposited delivered to him, and that he had sold, or offered to sell, some of these articles to purchasers. As to the third, it was proved that he had used and occupied the house and counting-house in which the furniture was placed, and had paid, as under the terms of his contract he had undertaken to pay, the wages of the servant who was in charge of the premises. These facts being proved, Bramwell, B., before whom the case was tried, left it to the jury to say whether the transactions between the vendor and vendee were bona fide. The jury found a verdict in the affirmative, and in favour of the vendee, and the case came before the full court upon a motion to enter the verdict for the defendant, when the question argued was whether the property was, at the time of the seizure, in the possession or apparent possession of the vendor within the meaning of the Bills of Sale Act; and whether it was subject to the execution of a judgment-creditor? The judges of the Court of Exchequer held that, upon the facts stated, there was no possession, or apparent possession, by the vendor within the Bills of Sale Act or otherwise so as to render the effects liable to seizure by an execution-creditor of the vendor. It seems to me impossible to doubt the correctness of this judgment, even if it were competent to me, or I were disposed, as I am not, to dissent from it. The facts proved before the jury, and commented upon by the judges, show most conclusively that the property which had once been that of the vendor had become the property of the vendee, and that the vendor had no right in it or any possession apparent or otherwise, and that much more than formal possession had been given to and taken by the vendee. Having given to this case the fullest attention, I must say I do not perceive that it has any direct bearing upon that which is before the court. The decision turns upon mere facts, and they being ascertained, there was no ground for saying that there was any distinction to be drawn between the actual possession and the apparent possession, both of which were united in the same person. Vicarino v. Hollingsworth, a case decided in the Queen's Bench, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 362, was also relied upon by the respondent, but I think that upon examination it will be found not to lay down any rule which can be applied to the present case. There a bill of sale had been executed by a trader to secure an advance of money. The lender, on the day of the execution of the bill, of sale sent a person who took and retained possession of the chattels comprised in the bill of sale, and it would appear that they had been actually removed and sold, but whether before or soon after the execution of the bankruptcy, which happened within a week of the bill of sale, does not distinctly appear, nor is it material. So that no question did or could arise respecting its registration. The assignees in bankruptcy brought an action against the lender for money had and received for their use. The only ground upon which they claimed was that, within the terms of the statute in bankruptcy, the goods were, at the time of the bankruptcy, by the consent and permission of the true owner in the possession, order, and disposition of the bankrupt. This raised a mere question of fact, "order and disposition" being in all cases only a question of fact. It was proved that the agent who had taken possession was a young woman who lived in the house with the bankrupt and his family, that she took her meals with them, sate in the same rooms, and lived as one of the family. On the part of the plaintiff it was contended that the possession by her was not real and substantial, but colourable only, and that the goods, notwithstanding her presence in the house, remained in the ostensible possession of the bankrupt, and, with the consent of the true owner, were within his order and disposition. The learned judge who tried the cause directed the jury "if they came to the conclusion that the young woman was bona fide in possession of the furniture, so that she would not have allowed the bankrupt or anyone else to deal with it contrary to her instructions, to return a verdict for the defendant, which they did. Upon a motion for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, the court was unanimously of opinion that there had been no misdirection; that the parties had intended an actual possession, and that the young woman had been put into possession for the purpose of preventing any attempt on the part of the bankrupt to dispose of the furniture. It was said by the Lord Chief Justice upon that occasion that the current of recent decisions had been less in favour of the title of assignees than formerly. And this may well be in cases of order and disposition, but cannot, I think, in any way influence the matter now before the court. The fact of the possession, the nature of it, the circumstances under which it was taken, the consent of the true owner, are all matters to be inquired into and determined by a jury. The question before me, although depending greatly upon facts, is simply whether the goods in question were or not at the time of the bankruptcy in the possession, or apparent possession—not ownership, as was remarked by Bramwell, B. in Gough v. Everett—of the bankrupt. The scope and object of the Bills of Sale Act is obvious. It was passed to prevent the mischief arising from a practice too commonly resorted to by debtors of making an assignment of their property to certain creditors who, when the insolvency of the debtor becomes apparent, enjoy a preference over other creditors. The mode of preventing this injustice and injury to the creditors which the statute has established is first to require a public registration, in the manner and form prescribed, accessible to all whom it may concern, of transactions by which a debtor, or a person about to contract debts, deprives himself of portions of his property. If this regulation be complied with, the persons who trust the debtor cannot be heard to say that they had not the means of satisfying themselves, so far as the visible possession of property is concerned, whether or not he was to be trusted. If it be not complied with, as for the reasons I have mentioned, I am of opinion that in this case it was not, it is declared to be null and void in certain cases as against, among other persons, assignees in bankruptcy. Then arises the question whether the goods in question were, or not, in the apparent possession of the debtor. Of course if, as in the case of Gough v. Everard, the actual possession was in the owner of the bill of sale, and there was not, and could not be, any apparent or other possession, it would be indifferent whether the bill of sale were registered or not. A bargain and sale or even a mortgage or pledge completed by delivery made and possession taken, would preclude any claim by assignees or any other persons. The goods were at one time the sole property of the bankrupt; they were, and have remained, and still are, in the house he dwells in. Agents have been put in possession of them for the purpose of protecting the title of the respondent under the bill of sale; but nothing has been done to change, in the view of the outer world, that appearance of ownership which the bankrupt was, and, for anything that appears, is still invested with. He says, in his affidavit, that, notwithstanding the entry by the agents of the respondent, he has had, and still has, the use of the goods. Now, having to discharge to some extent the function of a jury, I cannot hesitate a moment in saying, upon the facts in evidence, that, in the words of the interpretation clause in the statute, these goods, being in the bankrupt's house, used and possessed by him, are and were at the time of the bankruptcy, in his apparent ownership as defined by the statute. But then it is urged in argument that the words at the end of the interpretation clause, "notwithstanding that formal possession only have been given or taken" have the effect of qualifying the generality of the preceding enactment, and that where any other than merely formal possession has been taken, as is said to be the case here, although I am by no means convinced of that as a fact, the preceding definition of apparent ownership becomes of no effect. And in support of this argument reference has been made to an expression in Bramwell, B.'s judgment, in which he says, "the interpretation applies to cases where formal possession alone has been given." I do not, however, think that the context of the learned baron's judgment bears the construction which it has been attempted to put upon these words, nor can I read the statute in the manner suggested by the respondent. The plain enactment is in substance that if the owner of the bill of sale do not comply with the provisions of the statute his security shall be void as against assignees in bankruptcy with respect to chattels left in the apparent ownership of one who becomes bankrupt. The creditor is at liberty under his bill of sale, whether registered or not, to take possession of that which has been assigned to him, and to remove or deal with it as the owner. If instead of exercising his right he thinks fit to leave the goods which have been assigned to him, and which have thereby become his, in the house of his debtor, the bill of sale not having been duly registered, he leaves them in that debtor's apparent ownership, and he cannot be relieved from the consequences by proving only that it was not a merely formal possession which was taken by him. To decide otherwise would, in my opinion, be not only to impair the Bills of Sale Act in a very mischievous degree, but it would be to misconstrue its plainly expressed enactments. The order therefore will be to declare that the assignees are entitled to the chattels comprised in the bill of sale as part of the bankrupt's estate to be administered under the bankruptcy. Having regard to the manner in which the question has been submitted to this court for its decision, I make no order as to costs, except that the assignees are to have their costs out of the estate.

Ordered accordingly.

COURT OF PROBATE.

Reported by W. LEXCESTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Feb. 8.

In the Goods of DUGGINS.

Will—Name of attesting witness signed by another person—Probate refused.

The name of a witness who appeared on the face of the will as having subscribed and attested it, was not signed by him, but by his wife, at his request, in his presence, and in the presence of the testator and the other attesting witnesses.

Held that this was not a subscription within the words of the statute, and refused probate.

E. Duggins died Oct. 7th, 1867, having previously executed a will on Oct. 20th, 1860. One of the witnesses was Wm. Edwards, and his name appeared on the will as an attesting and subscribing witness. He had not, in fact, subscribed the will, but his wife, Susannah Edwards, who was present at the time of execution, had signed his name for him, at his request, he being an illiterate person, in the presence of the testator, her husband, and the other attesting witness.

A. Charles now moved for probate of the will, and asked the court to declare either that the subscription by Susannah Edwards, the wife, was in fact a subscription by the husband, or that Susannah Edwards was in fact an attesting and subscribing witness, although she signed the name of her husband. [Lord PENZANCE.—The case of The Goods of Hannah Cope, 2 Rob. 885, is against you.] He admitted that that case went so far as to show that to give directions to another person to sign a name was not a subscription by the person whose name was signed, but on the second point he submitted that it was not absolutely essential that a witness should sign his own name, provided that he was an attesting witness, and signed with the intention of attesting the will. He cited In the Goods of Oliver, 2 Spinks. The case of Pryor v. Pryor, 29 L. J. 114, P. & M., was against him, but he distinguished that case from the present, inasmuch as the name signed was that of a person not present at the transaction.

Lord PENZANCE, J. O.—I think this application cannot be granted. The will is signed by the testator in the presence of witnesses, and that part of the statute no doubt is satisfied. But the statute also requires that the signature shall be made and acknowledged, not only in the presence of witnesses, but also that the witnesses shall attest and subscribe the will. One of the attesting witnesses, Wm. Williams, did so subscribe and attest the will, but Wm. Edwards did not subscribe nor write his name, nor put his mark, nor did he, in fact, touch the will. Upon the authority of the case I have quoted, I am of opinion that some other person writing the name of a witness is not sufficient to satisfy the words of the statute. The same section in which those words occur provides that a testator shall subscribe the will at the foot or end thereof, and then it goes on to say it shall be done by the testator, or some other person by his direction. Provision is then made for somebody else writing the name of the testator, but no such provision is made with regard to the attesting witnesses. I think, therefore, the will has not been attested by Wm. Edwards. Then it is suggested that the attesting witness is not Wm. Edwards, but Susannah Edwards. To make that out it would be necessary to show that the signature of Wm. Edwards was either the signature of Mrs. Edwards, or that if it were not she subscribed it as her signature with the intention of attesting the will. There have been cases in which witnesses have signed somebody else's name, and if the court were satisfied that this had been done inadvertently it would not be right to hold that the witness had failed in his object of attestation. But that is a very different thing from holding that a person who never intended to sign her name did so because she has written the name of somebody else. I am bound therefore to reject this application.

STONE v. STONE.

Statute of Limitations—Breach of trust—Covenant to settle—Covenant to invest in joint names—No investment made—Liability of person in whose name an investment was to be made—Lapse of time.

In 1814, S., after his marriage executed a settlement, which recited that he had, prior to his marriage with his then wife A., agreed to settle 1000l. in manner thereafter mentioned, and also to enter into the covenant therein contained, and that he had paid into the hands of G. the sum of 1000l. G. then covenanted with S. that he would stand and be possessed of the said sum of 1000l., and also such further sum as should be paid to him as thereafter mentioned, upon trust (with the approbation of S. testified in writing), to invest the same sum upon the securities therein mentioned in the names of G. and S., and from time to time (if S. should so think fit and direct by writing under his hand), to alter the securities, and to apply the income thereof to S. during his life, and on his death to his wife A. for her life, and after the death of the survivor to hold the capital on trust for the children of the marriage as the survivor of S. and A. should by will appoint, and in default of appointment, among the children of the marriage in equal shares. There was a further covenant by S. with G., that S. would at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the settlement, pay to G. the further sum of 1000*l.* to be held by him upon the same trust as the first 1000*l.*

In 1821 G. died; in July 1851 A. died; and in July 1868 S. himself died. There were two daughters of the marriage who survived S. After the death of S. it was found that there were no investments to answer the two sums of 1000*l.*, and it was believed that they had never been paid to G., though the evidence did not prove this conclusively. A suit having been instituted to administer the estate of S., the two daughters carried in a claim against his estate for the two sums of 1000*l.* mentioned in the settlement. James, V. C. held that S. was not a trustee of either of those sums, and that consequently the claim of the daughters was barred by the Statute of Limitations:

On appeal held (reversing the V. C.'s decision), that with regard to the first sum of 1000*l.*, mentioned in the settlement to have been actually paid to G., S. had constituted himself a trustee of the covenant entered into by G. for investment, and was bound to enforce that covenant. Consequently the claim against the estate of S. in respect of the first 1000*l.* was not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

But, with regard to the second 1000*l.*, it was held (affirming the V. C.'s decision), that as S. was only liable upon a legal covenant, the claim of the daughters was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

This was an appeal by Miss Eliza Parish Stone and Mrs. Georgiana Cole, two daughters of John Stone, the testator in this cause, by Ann Stone, his first wife, from a decision of James, V. C., whereby his Honour refused to admit a claim made by the appellants against the estate of John Stone under the following circumstances:—

The suit was instituted to administer the estate of John Stone, and to carry into execution the trusts of his will. In an indenture dated the 17th Feb. 1814, and made and executed between and by John Stone of the first part, Ann Stone, his wife, of the second part, and Robert Gatcombe of the third part, there were the following recitals:

Whereas the said John Stone did, by a certain agreement or memorandum in writing, made and executed previous to his marriage with the said Ann Stone, agree to settle the sum of 1000*l.* in manner hereinafter mentioned, and also to enter into the covenant herein contained; and whereas the said John Stone hath paid into the hand of the said Robert Gatcombe the sum of 1000*l.*, at or before the sealing and delivery of these presents, the payment and receipt whereof he, the said Robert Gatcombe doth hereby acknowledge.

The indenture of settlement contained the following covenant by Robert Gatcombe:

He, the said Robert Gatcombe, doth hereby, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, covenant, declare, and agree with and to the said John Stone, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he, the said Robert Gatcombe, shall and will stand and be possessed of, and interested in the said sum of 1000*l.* and also such further sum as shall be paid to the said Robert Gatcombe as hereinafter mentioned, upon the trust: and to and for the ends, intents, and purposes hereinafter mentioned, expressed and declared of and concerning the same—that is to say, upon trust that he the said Robert Gatcombe, his executors, administrators, or assigns do and shall (with the approval of the said John Stone, testified by some writing under his hand), lay out and invest the sum of 1000*l.* in Parliamentary stocks or in the public funds, or otherwise put and place the same out at interest on Government or real securities, or on the security of lands held for any long term or terms of years absolute in the names of him the said Robert Gatcombe, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and of his the said John Stone, and from time to time (if the said John Stone shall so think fit and direct by writing under his hand), to alter and change such stocks funds and securities wherein the same shall be lent and invested, and shall and do pay, apply, and dispose of the interest, dividends, and proceeds to arise by or out of the said trust money in such manner as is hereinafter mentioned.

The indenture went on to declare the trusts, the income being payable to John Stone for his life, and after his death to his wife, Ann Stone, for her life. After the death of the su vivor of them the capital was to go to the children of the marriage in such shares as the survivor of the husband and wife should appoint, and in default of appointment to be divided between the children in equal shares. Then followed a covenant by John Stone for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, with Robert Gatcombe, his executors, administrators, and assigns, that he John Stone would, at the expiration of twelve months from the date of the indenture of settlement, pay into the hands of Robert Gatcombe, his executors or administrators, the further sum of 1000*l.*, which sum when paid to Gatcombe, his executors, or administrators, was to be put and placed out at interest in such manner and upon the several trusts, and to and for the several ends, intents, and purposes, and under and subject to the several provisions, declarations, and agreements thereinbefore declared of and concerning the first sum of 1000*l.*

Robert Gatcombe died in the year 1821. There was no conclusive evidence to show that either of the sums of 1000*l.* had been paid to him by Jno. Stone, but the belief of the parties was that neither of the sums had been paid to him. On the 5th July 1861 Ann Stone died, and on the 7th July 1868 Jno. Stone died. At the time of his death no investments of the two sums of 1000*l.* could be discovered. This suit having been instituted on behalf of children of Jno. Stone by a second wife, to administer his estate and to carry into execution the trusts of his will, the present appellants carried into chambers a claim against his estate for the two sums of 1000*l.* The Vice-Chancellor, when the matter came to be argued before him, was of opinion that Jno. Stone had not by the settlement constituted himself a trustee of either of the sums of 1000*l.*, and that therefore the claim was barred by the Statute of Limitations. His Honour consequently refused to admit the claim, and from that decision the present appeal was brought.

Eddis, Q. C., and Dumergue, on behalf of the appellants, contended that under the terms of the settlement Jno. Stone had in fact made himself a trustee of both the sums of 1000*l.*, and that therefore the claim of the appellants was not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Bristowe, Q. C. and Lindley, on behalf of the executors of John Stone, argued that by the terms of the settlement no trust attached to John Stone, even with respect to the first sum of 1000*l.* until he should have given a written direction to Gatcombe to invest the money. Till that direction had been given Gatcombe was the sole trustee, and it would have been impossible for this court to compel John Stone to give a written direction to Gatcombe to invest the money. As to the second sum of 1000*l.* there was no liability on the part of John Stone beyond a legal covenant to pay a sum of money.

Eddis, Q. C. was heard in reply.

regard to that sum, John Stone had entered into no other obligation than a legal covenant, and it would be very unwise to imply a trust in a case where it was clear that no trust was intended. The obligation was a mere legal one, and, being so, was, after the lapse of time that had taken place, barred by the statute. The case of Rolfe v. Gregory, did not apply, as there was a direct trust. With respect, however, to the first sum of 1000*l.*, the case was different, and his Lordship could not agree in the conclusion of the Vice-Chancellor. His Lordship could not allow that the settlement left it any way at the option of John Stone whether he would be a trustee of that sum of 1000*l.*, or that he could, if he chose, decline to assume that trust. The 1000*l.* was to be put into Gatcombe's hands, and then to be invested in the joint names of himself and Stone. Stone was to have the right to point out the manner of investment, but if he omitted to do so that was not to prevent the investment being made. Stone was bound to give his written approbation to the making of an investment in the names of himself and Gatcombe, and, if Stone did not do this, Gatcombe was still bound to make an investment in the two names. Stone, in fact, constituted himself a trustee of the covenant entered into by Gatcombe, and it was his duty to enforce the fulfilment of that covenant, and to take all the steps necessary for that purpose. As he neglected to perform this duty his estate must be liable for the consequences. Therefore, the claim of the applicants would be admitted so far as it related to the first sum of 1000*l.*

Bankruptcy—Creditors' deed—Registration—Certificate—Jurisdiction to cancel the registration and revoke the certificate—Fraudulent deed—B. A. 1861, ss. 192, 197—Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868, s. 1—Gen. Ord. 22nd May 1862, B.

The Court of Bankruptcy has, in a proper case, jurisdiction to cancel the registration of a creditors' deed, registered under the B. A. 1861, and to revoke the certificate of protection given to the debtor upon the registration of the deed, inasmuch as such a deed is a substitute for bankruptcy; the registration makes the deed a record of the court; and the court may, under sect. 197 of the Act, have to take action upon the deed.

The case differs entirely from that of a judgment registered with the master of a court of common law, as he does not make the registration in the character of an officer of that court, and the thing which he registers does not, unless it is a judgment of that court, become a record of the court.

*A debtor, formerly in the army, and afterwards an officer of a regiment of volunteers, had an income from his pension, pay, and allowances, amounting to 310*l.* a year. His only property was his furniture, worth 50*l.* His debts amounted to more than 620*l.* He executed a deed of composition with his creditors by which he was to be released from his debts on payment of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound in two months. The deed contained a provision that, if it should not be assented to by the necessary statutory majority of the creditors within a time named, it should be void. The deed appeared to be duly assented to by the creditors, but by a majority in value which only exceeded the necessary statutory majority by about 10*l.* Among the as-* *senting creditors were two sons of the debtor for moneys advanced to the father; the elder son's assent being given for 265*l.*, and the younger son's assent for 17*l.* 10*s.* This deed was registered under the B. A. 1861, and the usual certificate of protection given to the debtor. It appeared upon examination of the father and sons in the Court of Bankruptcy that the assent of the younger son to the deed was given when he was an infant; and that there was included in the elder son's debt a sum of 28*l.* for interest, which he had no right to charge. The father admitted that the deed was executed for the purpose of relieving the eldest son from the necessity of having to contribute to his support:*

Held, that this was a fraudulent deed, and the order of the commissioner, made on the application of a non-assenting creditor, cancelling the registration of the deed and revoking the certificate, was affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Thring, late Commissioner of the Liverpool District Court of Bankruptcy.

George Hudson Greaves was for many years a sergeant-major in a regiment of the line. He retired upon a pension which amounted to 45*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* per annum. In the year 1863 he was appointed to be captain and adjutant of the 64th Regt. Lancashire Rifle Volunteers. In that capacity his pay amounted to 10*s.* per diem, or 182*l.* 10*s.* per annum, and he also had an allowance for forage for a horse and for a servant, which amounted to 5*s.* 3*d.* per diem, or 95*l.* per annum. His whole income from these various sources amounted, after making the necessary allowance for income-tax, and some other deductions, to about 310*l.* per annum. Two of his sons, who earned their own living, lodged in his house, and paid him respectively 60*l.* and 40*l.* a year for their board and lodging, which did not include their dinners. The eldest son was assistant secretary to an insurance company in Liverpool, and had a salary of 250*l.* a year; the second son was a clerk in a merchant's office at Liverpool, and had a salary of 100*l.* a year. Both his sons lent him sums of money; the elder son to a considerable amount. He ultimately became much embarrassed, and on the 22nd Oct. 1869 he executed a deed of composition for the benefit of his creditors. This deed provided that Greaves should pay his creditors, on or before the 7th Feb. 1870, a composition of 2*s.* 6*d.* in the pound on the respective amounts of their debts. In consideration of this the creditors agreed to release him in full from his debts.

The deed contained a proviso that, unless it should be assented to by a majority in number representing three-fourths in value of the creditors whose debts should respectively amount to 10*l.* or upwards on or before the 17th Nov. 1869, it should be void and of no effect. This deed was registered under the Bankruptcy Act 1861, on the 11th Nov. 1869. The affidavit of the debtor and the accounts filed by him under the Bankruptcy Act 1861 and the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868 showed that the total amount of Greaves's debts was 622*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.*, of which the debts of less than 10*l.* amounted to 35*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*, the debts of 10*l.* and upwards amounting to 587*l.* 4*s.* There were sixteen creditors whose debts amounted to 10*l.* and upwards, and of these eleven assented to and five dissented from the deed. The debts of the eleven assenting creditors amounted to 451*l.* 4*s.*, and the debts of the five dissenting creditors amounted to 136*l.* The requisite statutory majority of three fourths in value would have amounted to 440*l.* 8*s.*, consequently the actual majority exceeded that sum by only 10*l.* 16*s.* The largest creditor was the debtor's eldest son, and his assent was given to the deed for a sum of 265*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* The account which he delivered of this debt showed that he claimed this sum in respect of moneys from time to time advanced to his father, against which on the other side were set off the sums which were from time to time due to the father in respect of board and lodging. The balance of 265*l.* 4*s.* 2*d.* included a sum of 28*l.* 19*s.* claimed for interest on the moneys advanced. The other son assented to the deed for a sum of 17*l.* 10*s.*, also in respect of moneys lent to the father.

The evidence showed that the debtor had, besides his pay and allowances, no property except his household furniture, which he valued at 50*l.* The father and his sons were also examined in the Court of Bankruptcy, and it appeared from what was then elicited, that at the time when the younger son's assent to the deed was given he was an infant, he having attained twenty-one on the 16th Nov. 1869, whereas the deed was registered on the 11th Nov. 1869. It appeared also that the father had never agreed to pay the eldest son any interest upon the moneys advanced by him. The father, in the course of his examination, said that he entered into such an agreement with his eldest son in the year 1861, but it was shown that at that time the eldest son was only fifteen years of age, and that he made no advances to his father until the year 1865. The eldest son in his examination admitted that he expected to be repaid the moneys which he lent to his father by means of the board and lodging which the father was to provide for him. Upon cross-examination the father said that his object in executing the deed was to relieve his son from the necessity of having to contribute to his support. Under these circumstances some of the dissentient creditors applied to the commissioner to have the registration of the deed cancelled, and the certificate of protection given to the debtor revoked, and his Honour made an order accordingly. In giving his judgment he said:—

The principle which governs this description of case has been very clearly laid down by Lord Cairns, in Ex parte Cowen, L. Rep. 2 Ch. 563. He there says, "The position of the majority of the creditors is a very strong one; that of the minority is very weak, and requires to be carefully guarded by the court, especially as it has been held that a deed under these sections need not contain a cessio bonorum It was much pressed in argument that wherever the court finds a deed to be unreasonable in its provisions it will be treated as invalid, and that it is unreasonable if the amount of composition be not in fair proportion to what the debtor is able to pay. But in my opinion there is a statutory power given to the majority of the creditors to bind the minority. They are made the judges of the propriety of the arrangement, so long as they exercise their power bona fide, and it certainly seems to me that it would be contrary to the spirit of the Act that this court should sit in review on their decision as to the quantum of composition they may agree to accept. But this is subject to the paramount obligation that this power, like all other powers, must be exercised fairly, so that there may be a bona fide bargain between the creditors and the debtor. If it should be found that the bargain was tainted with fraud, the arrangement will not be binding on the non-assenting creditors. If, for example, it were found that there was a bargain with some of the creditors to give them some peculiar benefit, that would be a fraud. But even without any ingredient of fraud, if the creditors, from motives of charity and benevolence, which might be highly honourable to them, were willing to give the debtor a discharge on payment of a composition wholly disproportioned to his assets, that would not be such a bargain as the Act requires, and would not bind the non-assenting minority." This decision has been followed by the Lord Justices in Ex parte Deacon, (infra) and by the Court of Queen's Bench in Mart v.

Smith (infra), where Cockburn, C. J., says: "I never could bring myself to think that it was intended that the majority of the creditors should be enabled to relieve the debtor of his liability to pay his debts, as far as his assets would go, at the expense of those creditors who were not disposed to take the same benevolent view of the position of the debtor as the majority of the creditors." Now, what are the facts of the present case? The deed is carried by a sum barely exceeding the statutable amount, and depends entirely on the debt of the son, contracted in the manner which I have detailed. It is impossible for a moment to contend that the amount of the composition is proportioned to the ability of the debtor. Why, if one-fourth of his income were put aside for little more than three years the creditors would realise 10*s.* in the pound. Then arises the question of bona fides. There does not appear to have been any meeting of the creditors, or any examination or inquiry into the state of the debtor's assets, or the nature and extent of his liabilities, and the debtor himself has stated that the deed was entered into for the purpose of relieving his eldest son. Under these circumstances I do not find that the deed was absolutely tainted with fraud; but I am clearly of opinion that the arrangement was made for the benefit of the debtor and his sons, and not in the interests of the general body of the creditors. This case consequently falls within the principle laid down in the judgments which I have cited. I, therefore, order the registration of the deed to be cancelled in conformity with a decision of Mr. Commissioner Bacon, in Re Wilde, 17 W. R. 368, in a very similar state of facts; and I further order the debtor to pay the costs of the applicants.

From this decision Mr. Greaves appealed.

De Gex, Q.C. and Ernest Reed, on behalf of the appellant, contended (1) that there was no jurisdiction to cancel the registration of the deed; (2) that if there was jurisdiction a proper case was not shown for exercising it. On the first point they urged that the registration of the deed was not an act of the court, but a purely statutory proceeding, and the statute made no provision for cancelling the registration. A deed was not necessarily a good deed because it was registered. The proper course for a dissentient creditor was to come under sect. 198 to ask the leave of the court to issue execution against the debtor notwithstanding the deed. No one could be injured by leaving the deed as it stood, as, if it was bad, a dissentient creditor would not be stopped in proceeding at law, or in getting leave to issue execution. The decision of Mr. Commissioner Bacon in Re Wilde was given without all the previous authorities being brought to his Honour's attention. On the second point they urged that the deed was bona fide, and that the creditors would get more under it than they could possibly obtain under a bankruptcy, the debtor's only property being 50*l.*, which was considerably less than the amount of composition offered. The sons were as competent to assent as the other creditors, as their debts were real debts. The debtor's pay ought not to be taken into account, as no part of it could be set aside for the creditors without the consent of the War Office, and that would not be given in a case where the debtor's pay was not more than enough for the proper maintenance of his position as an officer. They cited

Hart v. Smith, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 61; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 409.

Little, Q. C. and Ford North, for the respondents, contended that the deed did not comply with the statutory requisites, as there was not a sufficient assent by the creditors. The assent of the younger son was worthless, as it was given when he was under age, and the sum of 28l. 19s. claimed by the elder son for interest ought to be struck off. The result would be that there would not be the requisite majority of three-fourths in value. By sect. 1 of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 104), the fulfilment of the conditions there mentioned is made a statutory condition precedent to the validity of the deed. The registration of the deed in the present case was procured by a misstatement; it was said that the necessary majority in value of the creditors had assented, whereas in truth they had not. The creditors who assented must be taken to have done so only upon the footing of there being a valid deed. The court has power to order the cancellation of the registration, for it has by the Act a duty imposed upon it with reference to the registration of the deed, and is bound to see that duty properly performed. The deed, when registered, becomes a record of the court, and the certificate of protection given to the debtor is issued under the seal of the court. The court must have power over its own records. The case of Ex parte Ness relates to the registry of a judgment, which is not a record of the court, and is really an authority in our favour. Ex parte Page and Re Rawlings are not really against us. As to Re Savin there was no judicial determination that the power to cancel registration did not exist, and Turner, L. J. in what he said did not seem to have properly considered that the statutory effects of registration only followed if the prescribed statutory conditions were duly fulfilled. Re Wilde is a distinct authority in our favour, and must be overruled if the appellant is to succeed. In bankruptcy the court has always asserted and exercised a jurisdiction to supersede or annul an adjudication, obtained by an abuse of the process of the court, with regard to the right of creditors who have proved.

Ex parte Prosser, Buck. 77.

Ex parte Brookes, Buck. 257.

Ex parte Battier, Buck. 426.

De Gex, Q.C. in reply, urged that the deed could not be pleaded in defence of an action at law by one of the assenting creditors, unless it could be produced in evidence; and if the registration were cancelled the deed could not be produced in evidence at all: (The Bankruptcy Act 1861, sect. 194.) If, therefore, the registration were cancelled, the rights of the appellant as against the creditors who assented to the deed would be affected, whereas if the deed remained registered it would not, if invalid, interfere in any way with the rights of the dissentient creditors. Registration is essential as a matter of evidence, and can do no harm to any one. It should, therefore, remain for what it is worth. He referred to Rossi v. Bailey, L. Rep. 3 Q.B. 621; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 130.

Ex parte Stanford, 1 Q. B. 886.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—First of all, what one has to ascertain is, whether there are facts which would justify such an order being made if there is jurisdiction to make it. As regards the facts, I have no hesitation in saying that they are such that, if the court has jurisdiction, it ought unquestionably to make the order. [His Lordship stated the facts.] Under these circumstances neither of those two sons gave or could give a valid assent; and, to speak in plain terms, I hold this to be a fraudulent deed, and I do not mean to speak otherwise of it than as fraudulent in the plainest sense of the term. That being so, the next question to consider is whether there is jurisdiction to cancel the memorandum. Before I go to that I may observe that Mr. De Gex has presented his argument thus—namely, that the registration and the certificate are only prima facie evidence, and that there are other creditors who are interested in this matter. I do not say that in every case where a deed may be questioned the registration of that deed ought to be cancelled, but I do say that where a deed is fraudulent it unquestionably ought to be cancelled, and that there is jurisdiction to cancel it, especially where no act has been done under that deed, and where every creditor must be taken to have assented on the supposition that a valid assent to the deed must be obtained, or that it could not be registered. That being so, all I have to consider is whether the court has or has not jurisdiction. Certainly nothing that was said by Lord Westbury in Ex parte Page, and nothing that was said by Turner, L. J. in Re Rawlings and Re Savin goes at all to decide, or, in my judgment, to show, that the court has not jurisdiction. And when we come to consider this matter I think it is absolutely essential that the court should have jurisdiction. The case is not at all like the case of Ex parte Ness in the Common Pleas, where the master of the Common Pleas happens to be the person whose duty it is to register judgments. But he does not register judgments as an officer of the Court of Common Pleas, or as being under the jurisdiction of the Common Pleas; nor does the thing which he registers, unless it happens to be a judgment of the Common Pleas, form in any sense a record of the Court of Common Pleas.

Then, again, with respect to the registration of births and deaths, that has nothing to do with any court at all. What we have to with here is, first of all, a thing substituted for bankruptcy; secondly, a thing which is to form a record of the court; and, thirdly, a thing on which the court may have to take action, because, if we turn to the 197th section, it is this: that from and after the registration of such deed the debtor and the creditors and all parties may come upon the footing of that registration, and take action, and get judgment on almost every question that can possibly arise on the footing of that deed. It would be strange, I think, if a matter is a record of the court, that the court should not have jurisdiction over its own record. But, beyond and besides that, there is this fact, that when the registration has been made and the matter has become a record of the court, the direction is that a certificate shall issue, and that certificate is to issue under the seal of the court; and to suppose that, if a certificate of that description under the seal of the court was obtained from the court upon a fraudulent representation that certificate could not be recalled, is in fact to suppose that the court could not exercise one of the most ordinary jurisdictions which is exercised by it every day. I have no hesitation in saying that where you have a matter to be registered by an officer of the court, in respect of which that officer is amenable to the court, and where the thing to be registered is to be a record of the court, on which the court has to act, and with reference to which the court has duties to perform, this court has jurisdiction, without its being mentioned in the Act of Parliament, to cancel that registration and revoke that certificate.

That being so, I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed with costs; and I may state, with reference to the case before the present Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, that although he does not go into his reasons in that judgment, I have no doubt whatever that that case, and in fact other cases, have been well considered before that judgment was given; and I believe it was not only the opinion of the learned Chief Judge, but the unanimous opinion of all the commissioners, that this was a jurisdiction which could be exercised, and certainly it is in this case a most proper and salutary one.

Re THE HEYFORD COMPANY (LIMITED);

FORBES'S AND JUDD'S CASES.

Company—Winding-up—Subscriber of memorandum—Allotment of fully paid-up shares to him.

The appellants (F. and J.) and P. subscribed the memorandum of association of this company for 50, 50, and 1350 shares respectively, in the ordinary way, there being nothing to show that the shares were fully paid-up. In the articles of association an agreement was embodied and adopted, by which P. was to sell and transfer certain property to the company, and was to accept in part payment of the purchase money 1500 fully paid-up shares. He executed the transfers, and 1350 of the 1500 shares were allotted to him, and fifty shares to each of the appellants, who made no payment in respect of them. The remaining fifty were in like manner allotted to another nominee of P. The company was ordered to be wound-up, and F. and J. contended that they could be settled in the list only as holders of fully paid-up shares, but it was Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that buying the shares of P. was not a satisfaction of the obligation which, by signing the memorandum of association, F. and J. had entered into, and that their names must consequently be inserted in the list for fifty shares on which nothing had been paid.

This was an appeal by Mr. Forbes and Mr. Judd against an order of the Master of the Rolls, which settled their names on the list of contributories of the company in respect of fifty shares each, upon which nothing had been paid.

The facts of the case are fully stated in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 632, and it is unnecessary to add anything to that report.

Roxburgh, Q.C., for the official assignee.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said:—Mr. Roxburgh, I do not think we ought to call upon you. It appears to me that Migotti's case proceeds upon this simple principle—that when a person subscribes to the memorandum of association of a company for so many shares, by virtue of that act, coupled with the enactments contained in the Company's Act 1862, he has placed himself in this position, that he (that individual) must take the shares which he has so subscribed for, and must pay for them, as was said by Giffard, L. J. in that case, either “in malt or in meal.” If he has chosen to put his name down as a subscriber, he has undertaken to take the number of shares set opposite to his name. Then it is said that here there is an agreement with Pell that Pell, having sold this property to the company for 30,000*l.* which is the presumed value, is to be paid for it by having 1500 shares allotted to him, and that he is content to put his name down for 1350 shares, and to allot the remaining 150 shares in such manner as regards the two appellants, as that they shall be considered as having taken fifty fully paid-up shares, and so to have satisfied their obligation to the company. If that be a proper way of dealing with a company's shares, then instead of Pell finding two shareholders, each of whom should take fifty shares, he might have split these 100 shares, and he might have put 100 persons as shareholders on the register of this company, none of whom would have given anything to increase the funds of the company, but who would have been told, “You have satisfied any obligation you might otherwise have been under by my saying, I hand over to you my shares, and those shares represent the shares which you have undertaken to subscribe for with the company.” I apprehend that the engagement they entered into did not cease upon those shares being given to them in that manner, but that their obligation was to take shares issued by the company to them, for which they undertook to pay. Migotti's case went upon the principle that I have stated—putting your name down, you must accept the issue of those shares, and you must pay for them in one way or the other—“either in meal or in malt.” Then, when you come to Drummond's case, all that that case amounts to is this: Drummond put down his name for a certain number of shares, and he was thereby held bound to take and pay for that number of shares. Although he took a certain number of shares, and although he was bound to pay for them, yet he satisfied his obligation in this way. He undertook to accept certain shares in another company with which he had been connected, and which was to be amalgamated with the other company. He satisfied the engagement he entered into, namely, he made payment by means of the shares which he had contracted to take, and it was quite right that the account should be settled as between him and the company, and, if there was a balance between the two, that that balance should be handed over. They were entitled at once by the very nature of the transaction to take the shares on the one hand, and fulfil the obligation on the other. The two things were performed simultaneously. With great submission to the Master of the Rolls as to his observations in the present case, I do not see any difference in principle, when a debt is contracted with the company, whether it is before or after the shareholder has contracted to take shares. Of course it must be assumed that the company was in a position at the time to contract the debt. If there be a debt, then the material existence of the debt seems to be of no consequence beyond this: is it an existing valid debt at the time calls upon the shares are due? So in Pell's case what happened was this: Pell entered into this agreement with the company. He agreed to sell certain property for 30,000*l.* In explanation of what I have last said, I assume that the company was in a position to contract with Pell for 30,000*l.* Of course a contract of that kind, if ultra vires, would be set aside. But assuming that it is a valid and existing debt due from the company to Pell, and that they bought this property for 30,000*l.*, and had agreed to pay for it in this manner, when Pell came to ask for his 1500 shares, according to the express terms of the contract, he might say, you have agreed with me for this price, and you have it in the land, in the leases, and in the other things handed over to you, and you can not ask me to pay anything for these shares. As regards hardship to the outside world there is none. The company and its shareholders are in just as good a condition as if it had been paid for in cash. Therefore, plainly and distinctly, he pays what is due, and the difference between the case as decided by the Lord Justice and by the Master of the Rolls seems to have been this: The Master of the Rolls seems to have thought that, being obliged to pay the full consideration of the shares, he was not to be taken as paying that full consideration, it being paid in the form of a sale of his leasehold estate and so on, but that there ought to be an inquiry what that leasehold estate was worth, and if it was worth less than the sum stated, and for which the shares were issued, he ought to be charged with the difference. That is the effect of the Master of the Rolls' decision. But that did not invalidate the contract. Of course if there was no power in the company to enter into such a contract then the contract must be set aside, and Pell must pay what was due on the shares. That seems to have been the opinion of the Lord Justice on appeal. He assumed, the contract not being impeached, that it was a good contract. It is said that these two gentlemen have contributed their money to the company simply by reason of some arrangement with Pell, by which they had been substituted for Pell in his contract as to a portion of the amount to be paid; that is, that he should take 1350 shares, and that they should be substituted as his nominees in respect of 100 of the shares remaining, and that in that respect alone are they to be considered as having contributed to the assets of the company. If that be so, that completely overthrows the whole ratio decidendi in Migotti's case, because if that can be done Pell might just as well have distributed the 100 or 150 shares to as many shareholders, and all the persons who might have made themselves responsible might raise the same contention.

Therefore the whole case reduces itself to this simple proposition, that buying shares of Pell is not a satisfaction of the obligation they have entered into, and that therefore the decision of the Master of the Rolls appealed from must be confirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

LORD JUSTICE GIFFARD said.—The question raised in this case is a very plain and simple one. First of all, to my mind the decision in Migotti's case is clear enough. If a man agrees to take shares in a company, and he takes shares belonging to some one else, by taking those shares from somebody else, and not from the company, he does not satisfy the contract he has entered into with the company. In the court below, first of all, it was said that Drummond's case was inconsistent with Evans's case; but to my mind there is no inconsistency between Evans's case and Drummond's case, because Evans's case was a case in which a person had signed a memorandum of association, but had taken no shares at all. He had agreed to become a shareholder, and he was very properly put on the list. Drummond's case was a case of a different description. That was a case in which there had been an arrangement between two companies for what is termed an amalgamation, and each of the shareholders in the one company were to take shares in the other company in respect of their interest in the property of the company which was about to be amalgamated, and there had moved consideration from Drummond to the company for the shares which Drummond took, and in consequence of that he satisfied the contract entered into between him and the company. There was, in point of fact, direct dealing between the company and him, and the company got the benefit of the property in which he was interested. So in Pell's case. Pell sold the property to the company, and took shares from the company. There was a direct agreement between him and the company, and that direct agreement satisfied the claim subsisting between him and the company by reason of his having signed the memorandum of association. In this case what these gentlemen purport to do is not to take shares belonging to the company, but to take shares belonging to Pell, and they have paid nothing to the company. If they bought them from Pell it would be entirely and completely a transaction as between them and Pell, with which the company would have nothing to do. So plainly is this case to be distinguished from Migotti's, that I think it ought never to have been taken from the Chief Clerk to the Master of the Rolls, and, in my judgment, ought not to have been brought from the Master of the Rolls here, and that being so in my opinion, the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Re THE BANK OF HINDUSTAN, CHINA, AND JAPAN. MITCHELL AND ASPINALL'S CASE.

Winding-up—Contributory—Deed of inspectorship—Subsequent calls—Liability for—Process to enforce.

M. and A., partners, held shares in their joint names in the above-named bank at the time when a resolution for voluntary winding-up was adopted. They subsequently executed a deed of inspectorship, which provided that their estate should be administered according to the rules in bankruptcy, but it contained no cessio bonorum. It was duly registered. The schedule contained the names of the liquidators as creditors for calls at the time of its execution, but not for any estimate of future calls. Such calls were, however, made, and as they were not paid Stuart, V.C. granted the usual balance order against the debtors, but ordered them to apply in the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to issue process. On appeal Held, that as the deed was subsequent to the commencement of the winding-up, the order must be discharged, and the liquidators must prove under the deed.

This was an appeal by Messrs. Mitchell and Aspinall against an order of Stuart, V.C., made in the winding-up of the above-named bank, that the appellants should pay the balance ascertained to be due from them to the bank, notwithstanding the execution by them of a certain deed of inspectorship under the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act 1861, but that the liquidators of the bank must thereupon apply to the Court of Bankruptcy for leave to issue process against the debtors according to the course of this court.

The case before his Honour is fully reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 812, and it appears necessary only to state in addition to the circumstances there set forth that the inspectorship-deed contained no cessio bonorum.

Karslake, Q.C. and Willis supported the appeal, contending that after due registration of the deed all personal liability on the part of the debtors ceased as completely as if there had been an adjudication of bankruptcy against them. The liquidators should prove under that deed, and the 75th section of the Companies Act 1862 would have enabled them to prove for the full amount to which the contributories might in any possibility become liable for calls. They referred to

Martin v. Powning, L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 356; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 133.

Greene, Q.C. and Lindley, for the liquidators, supported the order, contending that, as it was necessary to ascertain in the winding-up the amount due from each contributory, and the order did no more, but left it then to the liquidators to proceed for the recovery of that amount in the court where the deed was registered, it was manifestly right; and this was the more essential as the winding-up was a voluntary one. But as there was no cessio bonorum, and as, consequently, no trustees were appointed, the appellants could alone be settled on the list of contributories; and if that were not done, the shares which they had held would be wholly unaccounted for. At the utmost, however, the calls made subsequently to the deed were not proveable under it, and the order, so far as the balance was made up of such calls, ought not to be disturbed. They commented upon and distinguished the authorities relied on by the appellants.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—The first question to be determined in this case is whether or no the first call is a debt proveable under the inspectorship-deed, or by whatever name it may be called. I quite agree that if it is not the same as Ex parte King in this respect—namely, if this call is a debt not proveable under the deed—then the form of order which has been adopted would be a proper form, because the party would beyond all question be liable to pay. But when we look at the question it is, I think, sufficiently plain, because the deed is made between the debtors of the one part, and certain persons who are inspectors of the other part, and between “the several persons, companies, and co-partnership firms who, at the date hereof, are respectively creditors of the said debtors or one of them, or of Mitchell or Aspinall in respect of their late partnership, or who would be entitled to prove under a joint adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtors.” That of course includes all persons who could prove under an adjudication of bankruptcy; and if under an adjudication of bankruptcy this call could be proved, it would make all persons who could prove parties to the deed.

One need not go into the law; that is now settled—if bankruptcy, or that which is equivalent to bankruptcy, come after the order for winding-up, there may be a proof. That is settled by Ex parte

Hastie following the cases at common law, and it has, I think, also been followed by common law decisions. But then it has been said that only those creditors are included whose debts are due according to the ninth article of the deed; but that depends upon how you read the word due there. It is a very comprehensive term. To my mind it does not mean a debt payable at this moment, but “due” means a debt which existed at the date of the deed, and which is provable under it. That is quite manifest when you read the terms, because when you come to look to the ninth article, it is this—this property is to be applied “in or towards paying the debts due from the said debtors, or any of them, to the said creditors, regard being had in the application of the joint and separate estates for the payment of the said joint and separate debts, to the rules, rights, and equities which govern the administration of joint and separate estates in bankruptcy;” which, of course, means that you are to administer that estate by paying everything which, if there was a bankruptcy, would be provable under the bankruptcy. That, therefore, disposes of that part of the case.

Then we come to the other part of the case, whether it was right that the order should be made in this form, which in terms directs these parties actually to pay the sum within four days. Now as to the amount, there is not, and never has been, the slightest dispute between the parties. It is perfectly clear that if these parties are liable at all, they are liable to pay this amount; if there ought to be a proof, it ought to be a proof for this amount. In the first place, I do not think this question is open to me, because I think it is quite concluded by Ex parte King. That was decided by the present Lord Chancellor as Vice-Chancellor in the first instance, and subsequently by Lord Cairns as Lord Justice, and I should not consider myself at liberty to overrule an antecedent decision of this court, unless there had been some inadvertent mistake, or something of that kind; but when a decision has been come to, and all the grounds for coming to that decision have been opened before the court, and considered by the court—and in that case beyond all question, every one of those grounds, must have been considered by the court—and the court has looked at the deed, and looked to see whether the deed was a good one or not, and determined that the deed was a good one, and that a certain portion of the debt was provable under the deed, and therefore made an order in a particular form, but found that another portion of the debt was not provable under the deed, and that therefore as regarded that question there ought to be an order for payment, I am not at liberty to overrule it.

I cannot help thinking that the Vice-Chancellor has overlooked what the result of the decisions in the courts of common law has been, because if his order were to stand, beyond all question it would be wrong in any court of common law to consider any one of these inspectorship-deeds—or, in other words, they would not be properly pleaded as an answer to any action; and every person whose affairs were wound-up under a deed of this sort would have no defence to an action, and would be compelled to have, whether he liked it or not, judgment against him, unless he had some other grounds of defence; and he must then go to the Court of Bankruptcy, and have it determined there whether execution should be issued or not. That, I think, in the first place, is a most inconvenient state of the law; and in the next, it is opposed to scores of cases the courts of common law have had to consider whether the deed was a good deed or not; or, in other words, whether the deed was pleadable or not; and they had to consider that question, because, if the deed was a good deed and was pleadable, it followed that there ought to be no judgment at law.

PEARCE v. MORRIS.

That being so, I am of course very much relieved from the difficulty of setting my own opinion against that of the Vice-Chancellor, because these are the opinions of the courts of common law, the opinion of the present Lord Chancellor, and the opinion of Lord Cairns on the subject; and I must confess that I think these opinions are quite consistent with good reason and good sense, because the inconveniences of the alternative course would be very grave; and the Legislature has enacted, in so many words, that a deed of this sort, if it fulfil certain conditions, shall have precisely the same effect as if it were executed by all the creditors. That being so, we turn to this deed, and we find it does contain a release. It really has not been argued that it does not contain all the requisites under the statute. The only argument is that it does not apply to this particular debt; but if it does apply to this particular debt, it does contain all the requisites under the statute. That being so, what we have here is a release executed for all practical purposes by this company and the official liquidators of this company.

Under all the circumstances, therefore, the proper course is, I think, to discharge the order of the Vice-Chancellor. But I think it will be right to preface my order by saying this: that the court being of opinion that the amount (517*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*) is a debt proveable under the deed, make no other order except to discharge the order of the Vice-Chancellor, and give the appellants the costs below; I cannot give them the costs of the appeal. Costs are, in similar circumstances, given in the Privy Council, and I am not at all sure that it would not be a good thing if the rule here were altered; but here the ordinary course in all cases is to give only the costs below. The liquidator will have his costs out of the estate.

PEARCE v. MORRIS.

Mortgage—Acceptance by mortgagee of amount tendered—Right to conveyance and title-deeds—Costs.

A., who had contracted with a mortgagor for the purchase of a portion of the mortgaged property, tendered to the mortgagee the full amount of his principal, interest, and costs, which was accepted by the mortgagee, who, however, refused to convey the real estate, and to deliver up the title-deeds to A.

Held that A. had been premature in filing his bill before he obtained his conveyance, but that the mortgagee having accepted A's tender, was bound to convey the legal estate, and to deliver up the title-deeds to him. A., however, must pay the costs of the suit.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decree of the Master of the Rolls, reported 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 287.

The facts were shortly these:—The defendant Morris was mortgagee of an estate in the neighbourhood of Maidenhead. Pearce, the plaintiff, had contracted to buy part of the estate from the mortgagor, and had accepted the title, subject to confirmation, by certain persons appearing to be beneficially interested therein. In this state of circumstances, Morris gave notice that he intended, under the powers vested in him as mortgagee, to proceed to a sale of the mortgaged property. Pearce thereupon tendered to Morris the amount of his principal, interest, and costs, and Morris accepted the tender. Pearce applied to Morris to convey to him the legal estate in the mortgaged property, and deliver up the title-deeds, but Morris refused. Pearce then filed his bill against Morris alone, praying that Morris might be decreed to execute a conveyance and deliver up the deeds. In the court below it was held that Morris, having accepted the plaintiff's tender, could not dispute his right to redeem, and was therefore bound to convey the legal estate to him and deliver up the deeds, the costs of the suit to be paid by the defendant.

The defendant appealed.

Elisha v. Elisha, 1 Seton on Decrees 384, 455, 475;

Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 J. & W. 134;

Titley v. Davies, 2 Y. & C. C. C. 399;

Henley v. Stone, 3 Beav. 355.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Hatherley).—With regard to the point which has been argued upon the question of the position of mortgagor and mortgagee, in a transaction of this character, the authorities have now completely settled what the proper course to be taken upon the part of anybody interested is, as to asserting his right to redeem, and tendering the money. Of course, if the money is accepted it is carried a step further. Then, as far as his rights in equity are concerned, any person interested in the equity of redemption is entitled to redeem; and when, being so entitled, he tenders the purchase-money, and whatever interest is due, to the mortgagee, he, having a part in that equity of redemption, is entitled to the delivery of the title-deeds, and to have a conveyance made to him of the property. In what form that conveyance shall be drawn depends upon the circumstances of the case. The case of Smith v. Green, and the subsequent case referred to by Mr. Southgate of Elisha v. Elisha, show how that ought to be dealt with by the person who takes the conveyance and the deeds. Provision is made reserving any portion of the equity of redemption that he is not interested in, giving those parties the opportunity at the proper time of coming themselves and redeeming by paying their portion of the debt. In making use of the phrase, "when the proper time comes," I mean in the case of a tenant for life. I had to consider that point very expressly in the case of Wicks v. Scrivens. The tenant for life, having a conveyance, and having the deeds, cannot be redeemed by those in remainder; he retains the life estate, and when their turn comes for having possession of the estate they can then obtain a redemption of that charge which the tenant for life so acquired. I think, therefore, looking to the position in which the court is now placed in this matter, and seeing that any person having an interest in the estate is entitled to a conveyance; it is impossible, with regard to the interest of the parties concerned in the property, to hold that there must necessarily be a Chancery suit in order to determine who the persons are who are entitled to the other parts of the equity of redemption. All that either the court or the mortgagee has to attend to is, that the person tendering him the money has an interest, whatever it may be, in the equity of redemption. It would be very mischievous to mortgagees if the court were to hold that they were bound to inquire into the titles of all the persons who have got other interests in the equity of redemption ; or that they cannot ascertain that matter without a suit ; or, if they accepted their money without a suit, that it was at their peril, because they have been constituted trustees for other parties. It would also involve mortgagors in a vast amount of litigation and costs, which would be entirely unnecessary in most cases. A mortgagee, though a trustee, when he is paid off (as in the case of Cholmondeley v. Clinton) by the right person, has a plain duty to perform. He is only a trustee in this sense, namely, for the persons interested in the equity of redemption. As far as the authorities have gone hitherto, he is not entitled to convey to a mere stranger to the estate. It appears to me, as at present advised—and I say “as at present advised” because I am not aware of any express authority upon the point—that he is only entitled to convey to some person having an interest in the estate, so long as that person’s interest in the estate gives him a right to redeem. Then the mortgagee has to discharge his duty fully by making a conveyance to the person tendering him the money and handing him over the deeds. As regards the form of the conveyance, I apprehend it should be drawn in such a manner as that there should be very little difficulty arising upon the subject afterwards. But still, I think it desirable that there should be expressed on the face of the conveyance a statement of some kind or other with reference to the exact position of the parties, and showing that the person so redeeming, having only a partial interest, is to hold subject to the rights as regards all the persons who hold other interests, of redeeming him. That I think should have been stated in the decree, and so far, it appears to me, that there must be a variation in the decree. The point which, I confess, has given me most trouble in the case has been with reference to the costs of this defendant. The court always feels reluctant to depart in any way from the course which the case has taken in the court below with reference to the matter of costs ; so much so, that it is a well known rule of the court that if the decree is sought to be varied in respect of costs only, no appeal can lie. In this case it seems to me that a grave question did arise in this respect. The mortgagee is told by the person who tenders him the money that he is the owner of a portion of the estate by contract, or that he has entered into a contract to purchase it. Of course the mortgagee is himself in considerable peril if he refuses. I am not saying whether he would or would not be entitled absolutely to refuse, but if he does so, and it turns out that the person tendering the money is entitled to redeem, then he loses all subsequent interest. It may turn out of course that the person who has entered into this contract may finally not be the owner of the estate, because the contract may go off, and the matter may never be completed. He has ground for asserting a right which I apprehend would entitle him to do what he did here (especially under the pressure which was put upon him by the threat of the mortgagee to sell), he is entitled to come and make a tender. But whether he is entitled to make a conveyance and to have a delivery up of the deeds until his title is completed, is quite another matter. I confess it appears to me, upon the best consideration that I can give to the case, that, although he is entitled to tender the money, and if he turns out ultimately to be the owner, as the owner he is entitled to demand a conveyance and a delivery up of the deeds, yet I do not think he is in that condition that he can be said to have actually got the complete title which is necessary to enable him to complete his purchase and perfect it. It is that part of the case which has given me the most anxiety. It does appear to me that this gentleman was premature in filing a bill to have the deeds delivered up to him or to have a conveyance made to him unless indeed he did so because the party had threatened to deliver up the deeds to a third person. There is something to that effect said in the bill, but nothing verified. Further than that, when the bill was filed the defendant did what he was bound to do ; he undertook to do nothing whatever as to parting with the deeds until the whole matter was determined between the parties. The case of James v. Bion has been cited as an authority by the appellants, who have put their case a great deal too high. It was cited to show that a man is not bound to make this conveyance unless he has before him a clear account of who all the parties interested in the equity of redemption are. I do not think that the case of James v. Bion decided any such thing ; but it decided that he is entitled to require that of every man who is a stranger. The party says : “ I am not bound to take your word that you are entitled ; I am not bound to part either with the deeds or with the property, or to accept the money from anybody who is a stranger to the estate ; I am not bound to transfer my mortgage ; therefore you must do something to show me that you are the owner, and you must prove yourself to be the owner.” I think this gentleman is entitled to do that also ; and, having taken the money, he is bound to hand over the deeds to the person who proves himself to be entitled. But, until that proof is made—by which I mean proof with reasonable certainty that nobody disputed it—he is not bound to hand them over. That was the point decided in the case in Swanston, where a person brought his suit, asserting that he was the heir, and gave prima facie evidence of it ; and, upon the person claiming to be paid, the Lords Commissioners were asked for an issue to try whether he was the heir or not. But, on the rehearing before the Lord Chancellor, the defendant in the issue, who was the plaintiff in the redemption suit, succeeded in showing that that was erroneous ; and, in the absence of any claim to the contrary, he made out a sufficiently prima facie case. So I say here, that the affidavit does satisfy me that a conveyance had been made to this gentleman, and his title by purchase was complete. But it was not so when the bill was filed ; because, when the bill was filed, he states that he entered into a contract. In paragraph 9 he says : “ The plaintiff has accepted the title to the said property, subject to the confirmation of his said purchase by certain persons appearing to be beneficially interested therein, and alleged by the plaintiff to be necessary parties to the conveyance of the said land to him.” Of course, if persons who are beneficially interested are supposed to be necessary parties to the conveyance, it is not a matter of conveyance, at least, not prima facie ; they may be mortgagees, that would be a conveyance, the mortgage having been paid off ; but if they are persons having an interest, as in the case of dower, any person having an interest over which the vendor had no control, the parting with which the vendor could not compel, in that case the title could not have been accepted in the vague manner in which it is described, and the conveyance would not have been complete. Therefore, I certainly must hold that the mortgagor is not bound in that state of things, to convey, because the court would not force him, although he had accepted the tender in its inchoate title, which might or might not be perfected, to make the conveyance, and hand over the deeds until such title had been perfected, and until the purchaser, who himself tells you the difficulty, had shown that that difficulty was cleared up, and that he was therefore in a condition to make the purchase. I think, upon that ground, I am bound to hold that the bill was filed prematurely. But it seems that the inchoate title is really now perfected and made out, and is ripe for decision, and that the decision ought to be in pursuance of every form of decree which I have consulted, that this gentleman now being entitled to a portion of the estate, having paid off the mortgage, is entitled to have the conveyance made and the title-deeds delivered up to him. I do not enter into the question suggested by Mr. Jessel as to the possibility of its turning out upon a balance of account hereafter that there might be something due as regards the purchase-money to the vendor, and to show that he has no right to have the estate conveyed at all. That is a matter which, it appears to me, ought not to be entered into, because if I were to enter into inquiries of that description, I should in effect be saying that there should be no conveyance in these matters without having a Chancery suit. The plain and simple rule is this: The mortgagee is some one who pays off some portion of the debt, which gives him a title; and upon that being done, has handed over to him the deeds of conveyance, and he is the person to hold, subject to all equities. One point which has troubled me a great deal is with respect to the costs, especially as upon that point I differ from the judgment of the court below. Undoubtedly this gentleman asserted his rights, and they were asserted again at the bar, much higher than those which he could effectually maintain. He asserted the right to be the judge—to hold the deeds and to hold the legal estate as trustee for all the various purchasers, as they should make out their titles to him. They were to come and show him their titles, and he was to be a sort of arbitrator or judge to determine what the state of their title was, and to hand over their portions of the money. That is putting it a great deal too high. But, nevertheless, it appears to me that I cannot lay too much stress upon that, considering that in effect, the persons who came to him were not in a position to assert an immediate right to that which he now asks for, and which I hold him to be entitled to, as the Master of the Rolls did. He might be asserting a somewhat extravagant view of what his rights ultimately would be whenever the plaintiff's title should be complete, but we do not find the defendant threatening any adverse steps. He simply says, he will hold the legal estate and deeds until all that is done, he does not threaten to part with the deeds or create any adverse title. That being the state of things, the matter might have been left until the plaintiff could complete his purchase. I confess, therefore, I think the decree as to the costs erroneous. Having to alter the decree upon a point which was discussed at the hearing, in directing that there should appear on the face of the conveyance the circumstance of this gentleman holding all the property, only subject to the right of redemption of the owner of that other portion of the property, I feel myself competent to say that this gentleman, like every other mortgagee, ought to have his costs. I throw aside the circumstances which Mr. Southgate has pressed upon me, but which, as he has urged them, I ought to notice. They amount to suspicion and no more. He calls my attention to this, that this gentleman became a transferee of the mortgage after the sale had taken place to Coleman and to this gentleman himself. He also calls my attention to the fact that he immediately gives notice of sale on becoming possessed of the mortgage, and tenders the money. Then, Mr. Southgate says he finds him afterwards setting up Coleman's right in the shape of notice, and that he finds Coleman filing a bill; and after the filing of the bill, the mortgagee supporting Coleman. But I think that is open to the observations which were urged upon me by Mr. Jessel, namely, that no misconduct is alleged in the bill, so that this gentleman could not know what he has to meet. No such accusation being charged by the bill, no opportunity was given him of offering an explanation. Although prima facie there are suspicious circumstances, they might have been cleared away for aught I know, if his attention had been directed to them, and he had been desired to answer the charge. Nothing of the sort appears in the bill. It is a plain simple bill saying that this gentleman is wrong in his law. To a certain extent no doubt he was wrong in his law, but I think the plaintiff has been precipitate in taking the steps he has taken. I have no reason to believe that the plaintiff was contemplating any steps improper for him to take. It is simply raising two points, as to how much of the estate he has a right to redeem on perfecting his title through other persons. I think upon the whole, the proper decree to make, varying that of the Master of the Rolls, is this:—First, tax the costs of the defendant Morris, and upon the plaintiff paying such costs, direct the conveyance as before, down to the words, "direct him to convey the legal estate in the mortgaged premises in the plaintiff's bill mentioned," and after the word "mentioned" to introduce these words: "subject to the portion of the said premises in which the equity of redemption is vested in any other person than the plaintiff to such right or equity of redemption." That I think ought to be the form. Then the rest of it will run on as before directed, of course striking out the part which directs the defendant to pay the costs of the suit.

CHAN.]

PEARCE v. MORRIS.

Villiers.—No costs of the appeal?

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—No costs of the appeal.

Villiers.—I presume we may add the costs to our security.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—That affects other persons. I cannot do that. I have not got those parties before the Court. That would be making other parties who are not here, pay the costs.

Villiers.—We have notice from the mortgagor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I cannot charge a number of absent people with costs.

Jessel.—We have paid the plaintiff's taxed costs. I think the order should go to direct the repayment of those costs to us.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—Yes, there must be a repayment.

JARRATT v. ALDHAM.

Settlement executed under misapprehension—Bill to set aside—Subsequent confirmation—Lapse of time.

A., a tenant in tail, immediately upon attaining the age of twenty-one, in 1857, executed a disentailing deed, and resettled the estate to the use of himself for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to his brothers and sisters and their children in like manner, with remainder over and with power for himself to jointure and charge portions. A. executed this settlement under the advice of a friend of the family, and in ignorance of its real effect, though it was read over to him by the family solicitor, who prepared it. A. married in 1859, and then executed a settlement, in which he recited the deed of 1857, and exercised the power to jointure and charge portions.

ROLLS.]

JARRATT v. ALDHAM.

[ROLLS.]

In 1868 he filed a bill to set aside the deed of 1857 without prejudice to the jointure and portions charged by him on the occasion of his marriage :

Held, that the settlement of 1859, in which A. confirmed a portion of the deed of 1857, operated as a confirmation of the whole deed.

Semble, that independently of the confirmation, the mere lapse of time would have barred A.'s title to relief.

The plaintiff attained the age of twenty-one on the 16th April 1857, and became entitled to considerable real estate in Yorkshire as tenant in tail. On the following day he executed a disentailing deed affecting the greater part of the property, and on the 18th April 1857 he executed a settlement of the disentailed property, by which settlement the property was limited to the use of the plaintiff for life, with remainder to the use of his first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the use of his brother John Jarratt for life, with remainder to the use of John Jarratt's first and other sons in tail male, with remainder to the use of the plaintiff's daughters in tail male, with remainder to his sisters and their children in like manner, with remainders over, and with power for the plaintiff to charge a jointure of 300*l.* a year, and to raise 6000*l.* for portions for younger children.

This settlement was executed by the advice of a friend of the family, and the plaintiff alleged that he executed it in ignorance of its real effect, of which he was not aware until he obtained possession of the deed in 1865.

In 1859 the plaintiff married, and on that occasion he executed a settlement, in which, after reciting the settlement of the 18th April, 1856, he exercised the power to jointure.

The present bill was filed in 1868 against the trustees of the settlement of the 18th April 1857, and the remaindermen, for the purpose of setting aside the deed of re-settlement of the 18th April 1857, without prejudice to the jointure.

The circumstances under which the deed of re-settlement was executed and the evidence are fully examined in the judgment.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., and Charles Hall, for the plaintiff, submitted that the plaintiff, having executed the deed under influence and misapprehension, and without independent advice, was entitled to have it set aside. They cited Coutts v. Ackworth, 21 L. T. Rep. (N. S. 224; L. Rep. 8 Eq. 558 ; Wollaston v. Tribe, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 449 ; L. Rep. 9 Eq. 44.

Southgate, Q. C., and W. W. Streeten appeared for the trustees of the settlement.

Jessel, Q. C., and W. Pearson, for the persons interested in remainder, contended that this was the case of an ordinary family settlement not executed under undue influence, but with the advice of the family solicitor; it was, therefore, not a case for setting aside the deed. Moreover, by executing the power to jointure the plaintiff had in effect confirmed the settlement. They cited

Hoghton v. Hoghton, 15 Beav. 278 ;

Wright v. Vanderplank, 8 De G. M. & G. 133.

Hickson v. Lombard, L. Rep. 1 E. and I. 314.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C., was heard in reply.

Feb. 23.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is a bill which is filed for this purpose : It prays "that the indenture of re-settlement of the 18th April 1857 may be declared not to be binding on the plaintiff without prejudice to the jointure and portions charged by the plaintiff on the occasion of his marriage as aforesaid." That is very peculiar. It does not seek to set aside the settlement absolutely, it only seeks to set it aside, without prejudice to certain things done subsequently. The transaction itself took place in the year 1857, just after the plaintiff attained his age of twenty-one years. It was a general settlement of all his affairs. I think upon reading the whole of the evidence, without going into the exact details of it, it is quite clear that the plaintiff himself exercised very little judgment or wish in the matter. Mr. Denison, who was an old friend of the family, thought it would be right, it being necessary to do something with respect to the settlement of the affairs for the purpose of raising portions for his sisters, that the whole thing should be settled, and that the estate in question—an estate of about 2000*l.* a year—should be settled and be put out of the control of the plaintiff. Accordingly, I think from the best of all possible motives, Mr. Denison deriving no sort of benefit from it himself, he persuaded the plaintiff to allow him to arrange what should be done for the settlement of his affairs. Thereupon Mr. Denison went to Mr. Baxter, the family solicitor, and gave him instructions how to proceed. It is quite clear that the instructions proceeded from Mr. Denison ; that no communication took place with Mr. Jarratt beforehand ; and that it was not till subsequently that any communication passed between them. What took place is singular enough in other respects, for the settlement having been proposed to be made in one particular way by instructions to the conveyancer, Mr. Denison thought it ought to be altered so as to make it in accordance with the will of Mr. Jarratt, from whom the property was derived. Accordingly he gave instructions for such alterations ; and upon the evidence I cannot find the slightest trace that the plaintiff himself had anything to do with those alterations. When the matter came before the plaintiff I think he was made fully aware of it, that Mr. Baxter explained the whole matter to him, and that he voluntarily executed the deed. I am convinced that he did not understand the full effect of it at the time, and that he was controlled by the advice of the old family friend ; and if he had come within a reasonable time afterwards, and no steps had been taken subsequently, I do not see how the deed could have been maintained. I think this court must in that case have directed the deed to be set aside. But the subsequent transactions give a totally different character to the whole case. The remarkable thing is that this bill is not filed till Jan. 1868, the transaction itself having taken place in 1857, that is to say, it is not filed until eleven years afterwards. In addition to that, most serious alterations took place, and one of the most serious alterations is this—that in 1859 he married a lady, and he made a settlement upon the marriage. It is very properly observed by the gentleman who advised the plaintiff, Mr. Hall, who drew the bill and carefully so framed it, that the plaintiff offers to confirm everything which was entered into by that transaction. But I do not think that that is sufficient. In my opinion he has confirmed the whole of the transaction absolutely and indiscriminately, and he is not at liberty to say, "I will adopt one part of it which I have adopted hitherto and will set aside the rest," and it is not possible so to affirm it. What took place upon the plaintiff's marriage was to this effect : He made a marriage settlement in 1859, by which, having reserved to himself a right of jointuring his wife to the extent of 300*l.* a year, and also portions for younger children in the sum of 6000*l.* ; and having a power of jointuring 200*l.* upon the rest of the property, he gives that jointure to his wife, and he also made provision for the younger children. At that time it is quite clear that the matter was entered into upon the faith and upon the substance of the former settlement; and without going into the evidence of Mr. Denison and Mr. Baxter, every word of which I believe, though they are naturally disposed to do what they can to support the transaction in which they were the principal actors, the evidence of Mr. Dunn, the father of the lady, is conclusive, and it is impossible, I think, to get over it. Mr. Dunn says, "I have a perfect recollection of what took place upon the treaty for the marriage. The plaintiff then told me that his estates were entailed, except an estate at Wallinglay, and that he was entitled to a life interest under the deed of entail, and that after his death the estate would go to his eldest son, and that the other children, if there were any, would be provided for. He also told me that he could settle 500*l.* a year on his wife for her life, and proposed to settle that sum on my daughter. Mr. Fisher, of Doncaster, acted as the solicitor of me and my daughter, in preparing the marriage settlement, and I clearly remember that the deeds, and all concerning them, had to be submitted to Messrs. Baxter and Co. for their approval on the part of the plaintiff. I and my daughter consented to the marriage, which was solemnised on the faith of the plaintiff's representations, and on the faith that the settlement of the plaintiff's estates was a valid and effectual settlement." Mr. Fisher also gives evidence to the same effect. He goes into it very fully, and this paragraph is very material: "I well remember that on the 28th Oct. 1859, the plaintiff saw me on the subject of his then approaching marriage with Miss Dunn, and wished me to see the deeds by which his property was settled as to his power to create a jointure for his intended wife. The plaintiff told me that his deeds were with his solicitors, Messrs. Baxter and Co., of Doncaster, and he offered to give me a written authority to them to show me the deeds." He does give them a written authority, which was produced, and they showed him the deeds of settlement; then three days afterwards he explains to the plaintiff and Mr. Dunn what the powers were which he had under the settlement; and thereupon he draws the marriage settlement. It is very true that the plaintiff only proposed to affirm certain of the transactions; but I am of opinion that this amounts to an absolute and complete confirmation of the settlement, when he knew what the matter was. In the case of Milner v. Lord Harwood (18 Ves. 259), Lord Eldon expressly held that where a person confirmed a portion of a deed, it operated as a confirmation of the whole transaction; and in that case the settlor said nothing about it, but merely confirmed a part of the transaction. I am of opinion that the present case must be treated in the same manner, and that it is impossible for the plaintiff to say that he did not know of the effect of the transaction until 1865, when he got the deeds into his possession, because it is obvious that it was perfectly well known to him at the time of his marriage in 1859. It is true that he had a sister married, who may have some interest under this settlement. It is not sworn that this marriage took place expressly upon the faith of the settlement, but it is to be observed that the marriage took place subsequently, and that various interests have arisen under it. My opinion is that, regarding the whole of the transaction, the plaintiff cannot, after the acts on his part, now come here to set aside the settlement. The result is that I must dismiss the bill, but I shall not give any costs except to the trustees.

SWIFT v. WENMAN.

Husband and wife—Settlement of wife's property—Divorce equivalent to death of husband.

By a marriage settlement the wife's property was vested in trustees upon trust for the separate use of the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife, with remainder for the children of the marriage, and in default of children, if her husband should die in her lifetime, for the wife absolutely.

The wife obtained a decree for dissolution of the marriage, of which there was no issue:

Held, that the wife was absolutely entitled to the trust fund, and that it must be paid over to her.

This was a suit instituted by a Mrs. Swift against the trustees of her marriage settlement for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that she was absolutely entitled to the trust fund under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff was married in Oct. 1843, at which date she was an infant. In contemplation of the marriage articles of agreement for a settlement were entered into, by which it was agreed the husband should pay the sum of 1000*l.* to the trustees of the settlement, and should insure his life in their names in the further sum of 1000*l.*; and it was thereby provided that these sums and also certain property to which the plaintiff was entitled under her father's will should be settled for the separate use of the plaintiff during the joint lives of herself and her husband, with remainder to the survivor for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage; and if there should be no children, then, if her husband should die in her lifetime, upon trust for the plaintiff absolutely.

The plaintiff attained her age of twenty-one in March 1845, and a settlement of the property to which she was entitled under her father's will was then executed in accordance with the articles, but the husband did not pay over to the trustees the sum of 1000*l.*, nor did he insure his life in accordance with the articles, and no property of his was subject to the provisions of the settlement.

There was no issue of the marriage; and in 1854 the plaintiff's husband deserted her and went to Australia, where he married another woman. Thereupon the plaintiff instituted a suit in the Divorce Court against her husband for dissolution of the marriage, and on the 15th Feb. 1868 she obtained a decree nisi for dissolution of the marriage on account of adultery and bigamy. On the 3rd Nov. following the decree became absolute.

The Divorce Court having no power to deal with the settlement in consequence of there having been no issue, the plaintiff filed the present bill praying that it might be declared that she was absolutely entitled to the trust fund, and that the same might be paid over to her.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and T. A. Roberts, for the plaintiff, submitted that the dissolution of the marriage had the same effect as the death of the husband, and that, therefore, as there were no children, the trust property belonged to the wife absolutely. They cited rest in the trust fund, and that as there was no issue of the marriage, a decree must be made in the terms of the bill. The trustees would have their costs out of the fund.

Re THE FREEHOLD LAND AND BRICKMAKING COMPANY; Ex parte MASSEY.

Company—Winding-up—Bill of costs—Solicitor's lien—Liquidator's remuneration—Priority—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 28.

In the winding-up of a company the costs of the petition are the first charge on the estate, and next to them come the costs of the winding-up, including the bill of costs of the solicitor employed, which bill of costs must be paid before any payment is made by way of remuneration to the official liquidator.

This was a petition by Mr. Massey, a solicitor, praying that he might be declared entitled to a charge under the 28th section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, on the assets of the above-named company under the following circumstances.

In Oct. 1866, John Clarke Kent, a shareholder in the company, filed a bill against the company, the directors and the promoters, seeking to have his name removed from the register of shareholders, and to have the money which he had paid in respect of his shares returned, on the ground of fraudulent misrepresentation and suppression of facts. In this suit of Kent v. The Freehold Land and Brickmaking Company, Wood, V. C., made a decree in favour of the plaintiff, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 588, which, however, was reversed on appeal by Lord Cairns, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 493.

The company had been ordered to be wound-up before the appeal was heard; and after the appeal had been decided against Kent, he paid 400*l.* to the official liquidator in compromise of an action which the latter had commenced against him to enforce payment of certain calls which had been made on his shares.

Mr. Massey claimed a charge for his costs of the suit on the amount so recovered or preserved in the suit under the 28th section of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, and he also claimed a lien on all the sums obtained in the winding-up for his costs of the winding-up.

The assets of the company were not sufficient for the payment of the solicitor's costs, and of the official liquidator's remuneration.

Mr. Massey had ceased to act as solicitor for the official liquidator:

The 28th sect. of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, is in the following words:

In every case in which an attorney or solicitor shall be employed to prosecute or defend any suit, matter, or proceeding in any court of justice, it shall be lawful for the court or judge before whom any such suit, matter, or proceeding has been heard, or shall be depending, to declare such attorney or solicitor entitled to a charge upon the property recovered or preserved, and upon such declaration being made such attorney or solicitor shall have a charge upon and against, and a right to payment out of the property, of whatsoever nature, tenure, or kind the same may be, which shall have been recovered or preserved through the instrumentality of any such attorney or solicitor; for the taxed costs, charges, and expenses of or in reference to such matter or proceeding; and it shall be lawful for such court or judge to make such order or orders for taxation of, and for raising and payment of such costs, charges, and expenses out of the said property as to such court or judge shall appear just and proper; and all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charge or right. Provided always that no such order shall be made by any such court or judge in any case in which the right to recover payment of such costs, charges, and expenses is barred by any statute of limitations.

Jessel, Q. C. and D. Holmes appeared in support of the summons.

Roxburgh, Q. C. and Jones, for the official liquidator, contended that after payment of the solicitor's costs out of pocket, the surplus should be divided between him and the liquidator, as the assets had been recovered by their joint exertions. The following case was referred to:

Re Audley Hall Cotton Spinning Company, L. Rep. 6, Eq. 245.

Lord ROMILLY.—In winding-up petitions the petitioner is entitled to have his costs paid first; they are the first charge on the estate, and next to them come the costs of the winding-up including the bill of costs of the solicitor employed. The bill of costs must, therefore, be paid before anything is paid by way of remuneration to the official liquidator. The present petition is, however, quite unnecessary, as the petitioner might by application in chambers have obtained an order for payment of his bill of costs. I will, therefore, make no order on the petition.

Solicitors for the petitioner, Stuart and Massey.
Solicitor for the official liquidator, A. J. Cox.

Re BAYLEY'S SETTLEMENT.

Settlement—Construction—"Younger sons"—Vesting—Period for ascertainment of class.

By a marriage settlement certain real estate was limited to the use of the wife for life with remainder to the use of all and every the son and sons (other than and except an eldest or only son) and daughter and daughters of the marriage in equal shares as tenants in common, and to the heirs of their respective bodies issuing. And it was thereby provided that in case any such younger son or sons should become an eldest or only son before he or they should attain the age of twenty-one years then the share or shares of such younger son or sons so becoming an eldest or only son as aforesaid should go over to the others or other of the said younger son or sons, daughter or daughters, as tenants in common, and to the heirs of their respective bodies issuing.

The second son of the marriage became the eldest and only son, and obtained the family estate after he attained the age of twenty-one, but before the period of distribution:

Held, that the period of distribution was the time for ascertaining the class to participate, and that the second son was excluded from participating as a younger son.

Windham v. Graham, 1 Russ. 331, examined and explained.

This was a petition for payment out of court of a fund paid in under the Trustee Relief Act.

Upon the marriage of James Bayley, the younger, with Elizabeth Franklin, in the year 1812, two settlements were executed, one of which comprised the real estate of the husband, and the other the real estate of the wife. By the former settlement, the husband's real estate was settled on him for life, with remainder, subject to a limitation to secure a jointure for the wife, to the use of the first and other sons of the marriage in tail male. By the second settlement, which recited the former settlement, and was expressed to be made in consideration of it, the wife's real estate was limited, subject to an annuity, to the use of the wife for life, with remainder "to the use of all and every the son and sons (other than and except an eldest or only son) and daughter and daughters of the body of the said James Bayley, the younger, on the body of the said Elizabeth Franklin to be begotten, in equal shares as tenants in common, if more than one, and to the heirs of their respective bodies issuing. And if any one or more such younger son or sons, or daughter or daughters, shall depart this life and there shall be failure of issue of his or their body or respective bodies, or in case any such younger son or sons shall become an eldest or only son before he or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, then as well as to the original share or shares of such younger son or sons, daughter or daughters, who shall so die, or whose issue shall so fail, and of such younger son or sons so becoming an eldest or only son as aforesaid, as to the share or shares which shall survive or accrue to any such younger son or sons, daughter or daughters, or to their or any of their issue by the decease or failure of any other the said younger son or sons, daughter or daughters, or by any other younger son or sons becoming an eldest or only son before he or they shall attain the age of twenty-one years, to the use of the survivor or others or other of the said younger son or sons, daughter or daughters, to be divided between or among them, if more than one, as tenants in common, and to the heirs of their respective bodies issuing; and if all such younger son or sons, daughter or daughters, save one, shall die without issue, or in case all such younger son or sons, save one, shall become an eldest or only son, or if there shall be but one such younger son or daughter, then as to the entirety of the said hereditaments and premises to the use of such remaining, or such one or only younger son, or such only daughter, and the heirs of his or her body issuing, and in case there shall be no younger son or daughter of the said James Bayley the younger on the body of the said Elizabeth Franklin begotten, or being such they and every of them shall depart this life, and there shall be failure of issue of their respective bodies, then in default of such issue to the use of the only or eldest son and child of the said James Bayley the younger by the said Elizabeth Franklin, and the heirs of his body issuing."

The husband died in 1842. There were several children of the marriage, and the eldest son, Edward, became tenant in tail on his father's death of property comprised in the first settlement.

Edward Bayley died in Jan. 1859 without issue, and without having executed a disentailing deed. One brother, John Salmon Bayley, and two sisters survived him. On the death of Edward Bayley, John Salmon Bayley, who attained twenty-one in 1852, became tenant in tail of his father's estate, and he died in March 1859, leaving an infant son, who is the present tenant in tail of the property comprised in the first settlement.

Mrs. Bayley died on the 30th Sept., 1867; part of her real estate had been sold under a power of sale contained in the settlement, and the proceeds of sale had been paid into court. A petition was now presented by the two daughters for the payment of the fund out of court, and the question to be decided was whether the present tenant in tail of the husband's estate was entitled to share in the fund, or whether his father, John Salmon Bayley had become an eldest son within the meaning of the settlement, so as to preclude his issue from sharing in the fund.

Jessel, Q.C. and Wickens, in support of the petition, submitted that the second son had become an eldest son within the meaning of the settlement, as he took his father's estate; that he and his issue were therefore excluded from sharing in the fund, which they submitted must go to the petitioners in equal shares. They cited

Lord Teynham v. Webb, 2 Ves. Sen. 198;

Ellison v. Thomas, 7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 342; 1 D. J. & Sm. 18;

Collingwood v. Stanhope, L. Rep. 4 E. & I. App. 43.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C. and Charles Hall for the infant tenant in tail, contended that the second son not having become an eldest or only son before he attained the age of twenty-one, he was not excluded by terms of the settlement, which must be construed strictly, from sharing in the fund. They cited

Windham v. Graham, 1 Russ. 331;

Heneage v. Hunloke, 2 Atk. 456.

Jessel, Q. C. was heard in reply.

Feb. 28.—Lord ROMILLY read the words of the settlement, as above set forth, and stated the facts of the case and continued:—The question to be determined is, whether John Salmon Bayley was one of the younger sons within the words of the limitation, and whether his estate is entitled to share in the property. It is argued that he was a younger son within the limitation for this reason, because in the words I have read he is to forfeit it if he becomes an eldest son before attaining twenty-one, which he did not do. It was suggested that this specifies the only case in which he is to lose it, that in every other case he must take it, and that it is a case of Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, and the case of Windham v. Graham (sup.), is cited for the purpose of establishing that proposition. But, after considering the whole of the cases and rules of court upon the subject, I am of opinion that the argument cannot prevail, and that under the proper construction of this limitation, in the events which have happened, John Salmon Bayley took no interest in this property. The state of the authorities is somewhat singular in this respect. It is in fact a contest between two principles of law—that of the vesting at the time of the birth of the child, and that of ascertaining who are the class at the period of distribution. The rule is quite settled that when an estate is given to a person, and, after his death, to his children, those children take vested interests from time to time as they are born. But here the estate is given to younger children, and the cases seem to establish that that means the children who do not take the family estate. I am of opinion that the rule is quite established, that the period of distribution is the time when the class is to be ascertained in these cases of younger children, and in the present case the period of distribution was the death of the mother, who died in 1867. John Salmon Bayley was not then in existence, and I am of opinion that he cannot be considered as a member of the class to be ascertained at that period. I think the cases cited to me are very strong on that point. Windham v. Graham (sup.), seems to be a case which was decided the other way; but I think, upon examining that case, that the distinction taken by Mr. Jessel is a correct one, and that Windham v. Graham, does not affect the rule at all. I repeat again that it has always been a contest between the two rules of the vesting of the estate and the period when the class is to be ascertained. In Windham v. Graham there were two funds, 4000*l.* and 6000*l.*; and the Master of the Rolls (Lord Gifford) determined that with respect to one of those sums there could be no question, because the words of the settlement were distinct and positive that it should become a vested interest on birth and treated specially. Lord Gifford considered that this indication of what was to be done with respect to the sum of 4000*l.* was a clue to show what the intention was with respect to the 6000l., and that they must both go in the same way. Therefore he determined that the rule of vesting applied in that case, and not the period of distribution. Of course it is admitted, in all these cases, that the settlor or the testator, whichever it is, can fix the time if he pleases, and give directions exactly as he likes; and any directions given by him will control the rule of law upon the subject. It is, therefore, really a question of intention. In Windham v. Graham Lord Gifford determined that the intention was shown by the words which were used in the direction for the vesting of the property. In this case I think that the intention to be gathered from the settlement is the other way. I think that the rule of construction is the same whether in a will or a settlement. I do not think there is any difference. I admit there might be some distinction if it were an executory settlement, as in the singular case Mr. Hall referred to, in which articles of settlement were executed on the same day; but there is no question of that sort upon the present occasion, and I am of opinion that upon the true construction of the settlement, in the events which have happened, John Salmon Bayley had ceased to be a member of the class to take, and that, therefore, the petitioners, the two daughters, are entitled to have the maternal estate. The costs of all parties will come out of the estate.

ASHTON v. BLACKSHAW.

[V.C. M.]

ASHTON v. BLACKSHAW

Bankrupt—Bills of Sale Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 36)— Married woman—Separate estate.

A husband in 1868, after marriage, assigned his household furniture to a trustee for his wife. The deed of assignment was never registered under the Bills of Sale Act; the husband was adjudged a bankrupt in 1869, and the assignee under the bankruptcy took possession of the furniture. Upon motion by the wife to restrain such assignee from disposing of the furniture:

Held, that inasmuch as the Bills of Sale Act provided that property could not be taken out of the order and disposition of a bankrupt, except by bill of sale registered under the Act, the assignee in bankruptcy was entitled.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain an assignee in bankruptcy from removing or disposing of certain household furniture and effects under the following circumstances. The plaintiff, Annabella Ashton, who sued by her next friend, was married to her husband, Thomas Ashton, on the 17th July 1862, at which time there was standing in the name of her brother, Daniel Love, as her trustee, a sum of 500l. Consols. In 1863, this sum was lent to Thomas Ashton upon the understanding that all his household furniture and effects should be assigned by him for the separate use of his wife. It appeared by evidence in the case that after this payment had been made the plaintiff frequently urged her husband to carry out his agreement in this respect, and two years after the payment—viz., on the 3rd April 1868, Thomas Ashton executed a deed poll, by which in consideration of love and affection he assigned to Frederick Clayton as trustee for the plaintiff all his household furniture and effects, which were described as being placed in F. Clayton's possession by the delivery of a chair in the place of all the chattels assigned. This deed was prepared by an auctioneer, and did not contain many of the legal phrases usually inserted in similar documents. There was no mention of separate use in the trust declared in favour of the wife. Steps were taken to register this deed as a bill of sale in the Court of Queen's Bench, but the registration had never been effected, inasmuch as Thomas Ashton was inaccurately described in the deed.

Thomas Ashton executed a deed of composition with his creditors in Dec. 1868, and on the 21st Oct. 1869 he was adjudicated a bankrupt on his own petition, and the defendant, John Blackshaw, was appointed creditors' assignee under the bankruptcy. On the 18th Dec. Blackshaw took possession of the furniture, and threatened to sell it for the benefit of Ashton's creditors.

The suit was instituted against Blackshaw, the assignee in bankruptcy, the plaintiff's husband, Thomas Ashton, and her trustee, Frederick Clayton, and the bill prayed for a rectification of the settlement, so far as might be necessary, for the purpose of creating thereby a binding trust of the furniture and effects for the separate use of the plaintiff, in accordance with the object and intention with which such deed was executed, and that in the mean time John Blackshaw might be restrained from removing or disposing of the said household furniture and effects.

Upon the motion for an injunction being made, it was arranged between the parties that the motion should be taken as the hearing of the cause.

Cotton, Q.C. and Hastings, for the plaintiff, submitted that the object of the parties had been to create by the deed of April 1868 a trust in favour of the plaintiff, and that if such intention was not effectually carried out, the failure had occurred by the common mistake of all parties, and the deed ought to be altered and to be made to agree with the parol agreement, by which a valid trust had been created. The goods which had been taken were not in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, but in the possession of the wife.

Glasse, Q. C. and Haddan for the defendant.—It was intended that the deed should operate as a bill of sale, and as it did not come within the exceptions in the 7th section of the Act, it must be registered as a bill of sale in the manner prescribed by the Act. The deed was void against the assignee both at law and equity.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This was originally a motion by the wife of a man who had become a bankrupt, to prevent his assignees taking possession of certain furniture which had become, by certain transactions mentioned in the bill, the property of the wife. The plaintiff, Annabella Ashton, being entitled to a sum of 500l. to her separate use, married in 1862, and in 1866 this sum was sold by her trustees, and advanced to her husband. This advance was made upon a contract by the husband that he would secure to the separate use of his wife all his household furniture and effects. No settlement was executed till 1868, but it was sworn by the wife that she constantly urged her husband to make a settlement, and the deed of the 3rd April 1868, by which the agreement was ultimately carried out, was an inartificial document, prepared by an auctioneer, and the words "separate use" were not used in the trust for the plaintiff. If there were no other objection to the document but this, I am clearly of opinion that the wife would be entitled to have the settlement rectified. It has been arranged that this motion shall be treated as the hearing of the cause, and the only question is as to the effect of the Bills of Sale Act. Before that Act it was not necessarily assumed that a man in possession of household furniture was the owner of it. If the possession of the goods was in accordance with the provisions of the deed, the order and disposition clause in the Bankruptcy Act did not apply. For example—if the assignment was made for a loan to be repaid at the expiration of a year, and the mortgagor was to have possession of the goods until default was made, if the mortgagor became bankrupt within the year, the clause had no application. If, however, the bankruptcy took place after the expiration of the year, the goods, if in the reputed ownership of the mortgagor, could be taken by the assignees in bankruptcy. [The Vice-Chancellor referred to Clark v. Crownshaw, 3 B. & Ad. 804.] Now, how did the Act affect this? [The Vice-Chancellor read the preamble and the first section of the Act.] The words of the first section imply that the deed should be good if registered, provided that the possession was in accordance with the title. To take the case which I have before supposed of a mortgage made for a loan to be repaid at the end of a year, the bill of sale, if registered, would protect the goods if the possession was in accordance with the title in the same way as a bill of sale before the Act. But if, as in Stansfield v. Cubitt (sup.), the possession and right were inconsistent, the law was the same as before the Act. In Stansfield v. Cubitt there was an assignment out and out; and when the assignee has a right to take possession, and allows the assignor to remain in possession, there is no alteration in the law. The policy of the Act was that there must be a registration in all cases in which the assignor remained in possession. A person knowing the assignor to be owner, was entitled to assume that the property remained the same until the possession was changed, unless a bill of sale was registered. The Act was intended to include all cases not expressly excluded, and as this is a purchase of furniture by a wife with her separate property, registration was therefore necessary in this case. It was not a marriage settlement, and was therefore not protected. I take the transaction as being in reality a purchase for the benefit of the wife, and the assignment as being intended for her benefit, so that the possession was in accordance with the deed. Before the Act the bill of sale would have been good, inasmuch as the possession was consistent with the title; and if registered it would have been good under the Act, but not being registered, it was absolutely void as against assignees in bankruptcy. The bill fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

LONGUET v. HOCKLEY.

Practice—Costs—Petition—Tenant for life.

Upon a petition by a tenant for life for the payment to her of the income of a fund in court under an administration suit, the costs of all parties were ordered to be paid out of corpus.

A testator, by his will, devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate and stock in trade to trustee in trust for investment in the public funds or Government securities, and to pay the income of the investments to his sister (since deceased) for her life, and after her death to pay the same for the maintenance of Eliza Longuet until she attained the age of twenty-one years, and upon her attaining that age, in trust to pay to her for her separate use and benefit all the principal money and stock so to be invested, and after her decease to pay the same to her children in equal shares. In 1836 a suit was instituted, on the equity side of the Court of Exchequer, for the administration of the testator's estate, and the usual inquiries were directed. A petition was presented by Eliza Longuet, then Mrs. Vallentin, for the payment to her during her life of the income of a fund which had been found due to the testator's estate, and which was then standing in trust in the cause, and also asking that the costs of all proper parties to the petition might be payable out of the corpus instead of the income.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR made the order as prayed, and was of opinion that it was a proper case for the costs to come out of the corpus.

V. C. JAMES'S COURT.

Reported by Hon. ROBERT BUTLER, Barrister-at-Law.

Re THE TIMES ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Assurance company—Amalgamation—Novation of contract.

The deed of settlement of Company T. provided that the company might be dissolved by resolution duly passed and confirmed, and that upon dissolution the immediate liabilities should be discharged, and if possible an undertaking obtained from another assurance company to pay the future claims, and that so much of the funds of Company T. as should be agreed upon to be sufficient to enable the other company to comply with the undertaking, should be transferred to the other company.

In 1852 a life policy was effected with Company T., the business of which was in 1857 transferred to Company A., in consideration of 9500l., Company A. undertaking the liabilities of Company T., and to indemnify them. Company T. was afterwards dissolved, the money was paid, and the T. policies were handed over. The policy-holder paid premiums to, took receipts from, and in 1863 accepted a bonus from Company A.

In 1867 the policy-holder assigned his policy to the petitioner as a policy in Company T., "now amalgamated with Company A." In 1869 the life dropped.

Held, that there had been a complete novation of contract with Company A., and the petition to wind-up Company T. was dismissed.

This was a petition on the part of Joseph Nunneley to have the above-named company wound-up.

The company was incorporated under the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 110, and by the deed of incorporation provisions were made for dissolving the company upon resolutions being passed and confirmed at extraordinary general meetings to that effect; and it was further provided that immediately upon the dissolution of the company the directors should, out of the funds and property of the company, satisfy all immediate claims, and should make over their business and liabilities to the directors of some other assurance company who would be willing to give an undertaking to satisfy all demands which might be made on the Times Company. On the 10th Dec. 1852 Charles Christie insured his life for 200*l.*, by two policies of 100*l.* each.

On the 21st Jan. 1857, an agreement was entered into by the agents of the Times and Albert Assurance Companies, by which, in consideration of the sum of 9500*l.* to be paid by the Albert to the Times Company before the 23rd Feb. 1857, and in consideration of the Albert taking upon itself to become responsible for the payment of the liabilities of the Times Company, and of the directors of the Albert indemnifying the Times Company, it was agreed that the Times Company should transfer and make over the business and all the benefits and goodwill thereof to the Albert. That within thirty days the Times should give to the Albert the names of its agents and policy-holders. That the Albert should be at liberty to advertise the transfer of the business and to give the policy-holders notice thereof, and that the Times should give notice to the policy-holders to pay the premiums to the Albert.

On the completion of that agreement the books and documents belonging to the Times Company were transferred to the Albert.

By a deed dated the 4th March 1857 the Times policies were assigned over in trust for the Albert, and at the same time notices were sent by the Times Company to their policy-holders, informing them of the transfer, and of the fact of the amalgamation of the Times Company with the Albert. The secretary of the Albert also wrote informing them that the Albert had undertaken all liabilities with respect to the policies issued by the Times office.

In 1863 the Albert declared a bonus, and sent circulars to the policy-holders therein, giving them notice of it, and requesting their signature as to the application of the money. This circular was headed "Albert Life Assurance Company," and was to be returned to the secretary of the Albert. Christie signed the circular, and directed the payment of the bonus to be made to himself, which was accordingly done. Christie also received receipts for his premiums from the manager of the Albert.

On the 16th Dec. 1867 Christie assigned his two policies of assurance to Joseph Nunneley, stating them to be policies in the Times Assurance Company, now amalgamated with the Albert.

On the 11th Aug. 1869 a petition was presented to wind-up the Albert. On the 13th Aug. 1869 Christie died; and on the 17th Sept. following the order was made to wind-up the Albert.

O. Morgan, Q.C., and M. Cookson, for the petitioner, submitted that this case was on the same footing as that of The Family Endowment Society, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 775. They cited also Winter v. Janes, 4 M. & Cr. 101.

Roxburgh, Q.C., and J. N. Higgins, for the Times Company, referred to Re the Waterloo Life Assurance Company, Carr's case, 33 Beav. 542, but were not called upon.

Fry, Q.C., and Smithett, for opposing shareholders of the Times, who had not been served.

Williams's case, 1 H. & M. 672.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I am of opinion that this case is in many important respects substantially different from that of the Family Endowment Society, in which I made an order for winding-up the society, which order was affirmed by the Court of Appeal. In this case the petitioner claims under an assignment of a policy assigned to him expressly as a policy "in the Times Assurance Society, now amalgamated with the Albert." He took the assignment with an intimation that the policy was merely at that time a contract (which had not ripened into a claim) with a society which amalgamated with another. Then, when we look to what took place at the time of the amalgamation, which was as far back as the year 1857—nearly thirteen years before the presentation of this petition—we find that the circumstances were these. The policy of the petitioner (I shall consider it as his policy) was a policy by which the Times office undertook, in consideration of his paying to the directors of that society an annual sum or premium, that the assets of that company should, subject to the provisions of their deed of settlement, be liable, on the death of the life assured, to pay a certain specified sum. There was a condition that there should be a premium paid to the directors of that society. No premium since that year has ever been paid to any directors of that society. Possibly that circumstance having arisen through default, if it were a default, or through a wrong, if were a wrong, of the society itself in not having it directors or officers to receive it, would give the persons who held the policy a right of action against the company which by its own act had prevented the person assured from complying with the terms of the policy. That is by the way. But the society also in its deed of settlement had a provision of which I must hold that every person who contracted with the society had knowledge; just as if every word of that deed of settlement had been written in extenso into the policy of assurance itself. In that way the person effecting the assurance had distinct notice that the company was to be dissolved in a certain manner, and under certain circumstances, and the assets divided; that is to say, that the company, if it should be minded to dissolve, should call two general meetings for that purpose, and upon the passing of a resolution to that effect at the confirmation meeting, the company should be dissolved. Then every creditor who had a present demand capable of being paid or satisfied, must have the amount paid or satisfied. With regard to outstanding liabilities which might or might not ripen into claims which were contingent upon the policies being kept up, and of course expectant on the dropping of lives, it was expressly provided that the directors were, if possible, to procure from some other company an undertaking to pay and satisfy the liabilities, and then having made their terms, and paid whatever the assets would allow to that other company to enable them to comply with their undertaking, they were then to be dissolved and the business concluded, and all existing assets divided amongst the shareholders. That was the position in which the person who had effected the policy placed himself in regard to the society. It seems to me that this may have been a very foolish thing for him to do; but I suppose persons would assume, if any company were selected to take the business and assets of their company it would be one that was solvent and respectable, and it would be done honestly and bona fide; and if it were done honestly and bona fide, there does not seem to be any substantial objection to it. Of course if a better office took the liability, it would be difficult to say that there was anything which would be injurious to the interests of the policy-holders. Nor must we try the prudence of such a provision as that by the light which is now thrown retrospectively upon it by the fact of the Albert, eleven years afterwards, having failed. One must take it that the provision in the original deed of settlement, at the time it was made, was intended to be a provision for the transfer to a bona

Re THE TIMES ASSURANCE COMPANY.

fide and substantial office. If it were otherwise, I suppose this court would have power enough to prevent the transfer to any sham office, or the doing of anything which was not honest and substantial. That being so, the policy-holder, at all events, was in this position, when there was a choice given to him as to whether he would take the security of the Albert; he might either have taken the security or refused it. If he refused it, he might have enforced such claim as he might have at that time against the Times office for their breach of contract with him. But then the Albert and the Times both write to the policy-holders and say, "We have made arrangements," not, as has been pressed upon me, arrangements for the amalgamation of the two companies. There was no fraudulent representation there. What they have done is, they have said, "We have made arrangements for the amalgamation of the businesses of the two companies, that is to say, the business of the Times Life Assurance Company has been amalgamated with the Albert Life Assurance Company, No. 11, Waterloo-place, Pall Mall, at which place the united business will be conducted henceforth." That was, in truth, the nature of the transaction. One office was taking a small business of a small assurance office having the benefit of the existing policies and contracts of that office. Then the Times say to the policy-holders, "The united business will be conducted henceforth under the title of the Albert and Times Life Assurance and Guarantee Company, which company is now responsible for the sum assured under your life policy; and we have the satisfaction of adding that the Albert Life Assurance Company has been established nearly twenty years, and that by the amalgamation therewith of the business of the Times Life Assurance and Guarantee Company considerably increased security is afforded to the policy-holders of the latter." That is to say, not that you have got the security of the Albert in addition to the security of the Times which is to continue liable, notwithstanding that provision in the deed of settlement; but you have got the security of a much better office, of an older one and larger one. Then the Albert say, "we shall be happy to make the usual endorsement upon your policy on your forwarding the same to this office." The endorsement appears not to have been made, but following this the policy-holder goes and pays—not to the directors of the Times Company, or any persons whom he could have supposed to be directors of the old Times office; but to the directors of the company who were carrying on the amalgamated business—the premiums on the policy, which premiums are accepted by that company. It appears to me, if the case were reversed, upon that alone if he had been minded to say, "I am not a creditor of the Times which is an insolvent concern; I am a creditor of the Albert," that the Albert would not have had a shadow of a defence to such a claim on behalf of the policy-holder with whom they had so dealt. Beyond that there is this: The policies were policies with participation in profits, that is to say, participation in profits of the Times Office. Then there comes a time when it is arranged there shall be a participation in the profits of the amalgamated company, the one with the new name which the Albert has taken; then a circular is sent to every policy-holder giving an account of the bonus or profit on the policies, and in what way he may have it—either in addition to the amount assured, in present payment, or in reducing the amount of premiums. Accompanying that, there is a document containing a very full account of what the society is. The one I have before me was issued in the year 1863, but they are all in the same form. It gives an account of what the office is, "The Albert Medical and Family Endowment Life Assurance Company, established 1838;" there is the chief office, the city office, the officers, trustees, directors, and so on. Then there is the "position, business, and progress" of the company; the assets exceed so much; the subscribed capital exceeds so much; the annual income is so much; and then "the directors beg leave to submit to the proprietors a statement of business for the year 1861," and so on. Then they give an account of what the whole business of the society has been, what the profit has been, and the mode in which the proportion of that profit is to be distributed between the policy-holders of the whole company, entirely excluding therefore any possibility of a notion on behalf of the policy-holder that when he received this circular and the intimation that a bonus had been allotted to him, it possibly might be a bonus upon the business of the Albert kept entirely separate and distinct from the old Times Life Assurance and Guarantee Company. It is quite manifest from this that there was one business of the office, which was carrying on the amalgamated business with the other amalgamated businesses. Then there is an offer made to this policy-holder. He accepts that offer, and does, upon the footing of the transfer of the business to the Albert, accept a share—it is a small one it is true—but he does upon two occasions, except a share of the profits of the Albert Company as being a person assured with the Albert. After that, I am of opinion that there is, in this case, a complete novation. The Albert has told the policy-holder, "we treat you as a policy-holder of ours." He accepts the position of being a policy-holder of the Albert, and after so many years it seems to me that it would be very oppressive upon the shareholders of the other company if I were compelled to come to a different conclusion in the case of a person who, with his eyes open, has really dealt with the Albert as the office which was to pay him the amount of his policy when it became payable. I believe in a case somewhat similar to this, Vice-Chancellor Malins came to a like conclusion, distinguishing the case of a policy-holder from that of the petitioner in The Family Endowment case, who was an annuitant, on the ground that there had been payment of premiums, and so on.

Fry.—It was the case of Re National Provincial Life Assurance Society (V.C.M., 28 Jan. 1870).

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I do not know whether there was any bonus in that case. Therefore it would have been sufficient for me to have rested my judgment entirely upon the fact that the same point in substance had been decided by a co-ordinate branch of the court, from which it would not be seemly for me to differ unless that decision had been reversed by a superior tribunal; but I have thought it right to go into this case at full length, and to give my reasons why, if it had come before me in the first instance, I should not have differed from the judgment of the learned Vice-Chancellor. Independently of that, I should have come to the conclusion that I have, and therefore I must dismiss the petition.

Roxburgh asked for his costs.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said the petition must be dismissed with costs as to the Times.

Fry asked for his costs. He said that considerable doubt existed as to whether there were seven members of the Times in existence. If so, winding-up would be impossible.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR refused to give any costs to the shareholders not served, and directed the WALKER v. WALKER.

Practice—Revivor and supplement—Infant born since decree—Necessary party—Omission to make infant a party—Supplemental order nunc pro tunc—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 52.

After a decree had been made in an administration suit an infant was born, who soon after his birth became interested in possession in the estates, but was overlooked in the subsequent proceedings. A sale having been made and approved, upon investigation of the title the omission was discovered:

Held, that it was not necessary to revive the suit; but a supplemental order was made that the proceedings should be of the same force and effect as if the infant had been made a party immediately after his birth.

This was a suit to administer the trusts of the will of Nicholas Walker, who died in 1856.

By his will the testator gave and devised all his real and personal estate to his brother John and his nephew Wainman Holmes, the younger, upon trust, after the death of his widow Elizabeth, as to one moiety, for the children of his brother John in equal shares, and as to the other moiety for the children of his sister Ann, wife of Wainman Holmes the elder in equal shares.

The testator died on the 2nd Aug. 1856.

The bill was filed on the 5th Feb. 1859, by two of the children of Ann Holmes, four infant children of John Walker, and one born since the death of the testator, against John Walker, Wainman Holmes the younger, Elizabeth Walker, and Wainman Holmes the elder, and Ann, his wife.

On the 19th Feb. 1859 a decree was made, directing the usual accounts and inquiries, and on the 8th Aug. 1859 the chief clerk made a certificate.

On the 27th Aug. 1859 another infant child of John Walker was born; but he was overlooked in the subsequent proceedings in the suit.

On the 12th March 1860, on further consideration, the real estate was ordered to be sold. Under this order several sales were made, and at length one was made, which was confirmed on the 23rd Dec. 1869. On investigation of the title in this last instance the omission of the infant from the proceedings in the suit was discovered.

Wickens, for the plaintiffs, now moved for a supplemental order, making the infant a party nunc pro tunc. He cited Morgan's Chancery Acts and Orders, 4th edit. p. 213, note (2), and the authorities there referred to.

Fry, Q.C. (amicus curiæ) referred to Griffin v. Morgan, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 351.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR at first thought an order of revivor would be necessary, but finally held otherwise, and made a supplemental order, to the effect that, the court being of opinion that the direction contained in the order dated the 12th March 1860, and the sales thereunder, were for the benefit of the infant, ordered that the said order, and the inquiries and accounts thereby directed, and the proceedings thereunder, be carried on and prosecuted as against the infant, and be of the same force and effect as if he had been made a party to the suit immediately after his birth.

WILSON v. WILSON.

Practice—Revivor and supplement—Death of one of two plaintiffs—Revivor unnecessary.

Plaintiffs claiming to be respectively tenant for life and tenant in remainder in fee, of one third of the entirety of an estate, filed a bill against a defendant who claimed the entirety, to restrain the cutting of timber. The tenant for life died:

Held, that it was not necessary to revive the suit, and that the surviving plaintiff was competent to continue the suit alone.

This was a motion by a defendant, Thomas Wilson, to dismiss the bill for want of prosecution.

The bill was filed by Sarah Wilson, as tenant for life, and the Rev. Benjamin Powett, as tenant in remainder in fee of certain real estate, against Thomas Wilson, and parties claiming to be interested in the other two-thirds of the estate under the same title as the plaintiffs, praying that Thomas Wilson might be restrained from cutting timber.

Thomas Wilson claimed to be owner in fee of the entirety of the real estate.

The injunction was moved for, and ordered to stand to the hearing on the defendant's undertaking.

On the 13th Aug. 1868, the defendant, Wilson, put in an answer.

In March 1869 the plaintiff Sarah Wilson died, and in November a summons was taken out to adjourn the time within which to file replication or give notice of motion for decree; but nothing had been done notwithstanding numerous applications on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff alleging that the suit was abated.

Fry, Q.C., for the defendant Thomas Wilson, supported the motion.

North, for the plaintiff, contended that the suit had abated and was defective, and cited

The usual order was made that the bill be dismissed for want of prosecution unless notice of motion were given, or the cause set down, or replication filed within one month; the plaintiff to pay the costs.

BEWDLEY (No. 2) ELECTION PETITION.

Election Petitions.

Reported by F. O. CRUMP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE BOROUGH OF BEWDLEY (No. 2) (a.)

Thursday, April 29, 1869.

(Before BLACKBURN, J.)

Register—Jurisdiction of revising barrister—Notice of objection—Express decision—6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, s. 98.

By sect. 98 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18, power was given to election committees to inquire into and decide the right to vote of any person who, being upon the register of voters in force at the time of such election, shall have tendered his vote at such election, or not being upon such register, shall have tendered his vote at such election, in case the name of such person shall have been specially retained upon such register, or inserted therein, or expunged or omitted therefrom, by the express decision of the revising barrister who shall have revised the list of voters from which such register shall have been formed:

Held, that the intention of the Legislature was that where a matter of fact has been fairly raised before the revising barrister, and the revising barrister has heard it, and come to an express decision upon it, then his decision may be reviewed by an election committee—now an election judge—in order to see that injustice has not been done.

A revising barrister decided that a notice of objection was bad when it was good:

Held, that this was an express decision reviewable by the election judge, and giving him jurisdiction to inquire whether the vote of the person objected to was good or bad.

The principal decision in this matter is reported 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 676.

Stephen, Q. C., Chandos Leigh, and Sturge appeared for the petitioner; Giffard, Q. C. and Poland for the respondent.

BLACKBURN, J.—I must take this case as a mixed question of law and fact, in order to see what the jurisdiction is. First of all, the Act of Parliament originally establishing the register of voters, and requiring the revision before the barrister, made the register conclusive at the time of the election; the returning officer must go by the registration, and the registration alone, at the time of the election; but there was some doubt as to the extent to which an Election Committee of the House of Commons might think that they should look into it; it was, no doubt, part of the scheme of the revision that points of law might be reserved for the Court of Common Pleas; and the decision of the Court of Common Pleas upon those points of law was made final. Questions of fact there was no appeal upon at all unless it was to an election committee. Then the Act of the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 18, s. 98 (which is the one now in force), after reciting the doubts, says that "It shall and may be lawful for any such committee" (and now the election judges stand in the place of the committee) "to inquire into and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon the register of voters in force at the time of such election, shall have voted in such election, or, not being upon such register, shall have tendered his vote at such election, in case the name of such person shall have been specially retained upon such (a.) This second judgment in the matter of this petition was inadvertently omitted, and being of some importance it is here inserted.

register, or inserted therein, or expunged, or omitted therefrom by the express decision of the revising barrister who shall have revised the list of voters from which such register shall have been formed; and also that it shall and may be lawful for such committee to inquire into and decide upon the right to vote of any person who, being upon such register, shall have voted in such election, so far as the same may be disputed on the ground of legal incapacity at the time of his voting under and by virtue of any statute now or hereafter to be in force, or on the ground of any legal incapacity at the time of his voting which may have arisen subsequently to the expiration of the time allowed for making out the list of voters from which the register of voters in force at the time of such election shall have been formed. There were some other provisions relating to other matters. Now I consider the effect of that to be, that inasmuch as on matters of law there was an appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, yet upon matters of fact the decision of the revising barrister would be final, and it was not a matter that he could send to the Court of Common Pleas." Supposing, for example, the barrister had taken some peculiar view of the evidence, and had found that houses were of the value of 10*l.* when most men would not have thought they were of the value of 5*l.*, or had held that houses were of the value of 10*l.* when most men thought they were of the value of 15*l.*, such matters as that he could not have sent to the Court of Common Pleas. I think what the Legislature had in view was, that where a matter of fact has been fairly raised before the revising barrister, and the revising barrister has heard it, and come to an express decision upon it, then his decision may be reviewed by the election committee in order to see that injustice has not been done. Now, in the present case, it comes with a rather peculiar sort of express decision. The first case coming before the revising barrister, the case of Chillingworth being upon the overseers' list, would have stood upon the overseers' list without any decision of the revising barrister at all, unless somebody properly objected to it. If anybody properly objected to it, then the revising barrister would have to hear the evidence upon both sides, and to come to an express decision upon the merits. As was right and proper, it was first necessary to see that there was an objection, and that there was a notice of objection which was good, and consequently the revising barrister should have inquired into the merits of the case. The revising barrister after hearing and considering it came to a conclusion which I must treat as an erroneous conclusion, considering myself, as the superior authority, to be right, and the revising barrister wrong; he decided that the notice of objection was bad when, in fact, it was good. Then the first question is, is that retaining his name by "an express decision?" If the barrister had been right in saying that the notice of objection was bad, the name could not have been removed from the list at all; but when he, upon this preliminary point, decides that he will not enter into the merits at all, and erroneously decides so, when he ought to have entered into them, I think we must consider it as "an express decision" retaining the name, and consequently enabling me to enter into the merits. It would not follow from that, that Chillingworth's was a bad vote, and should have been struck off, but only that I have the jurisdiction to inquire whether it was a good vote or not. Then after this had been decided, and after it had been stated that a great many names would depend upon this decision, and that the objections were the same, I find upon the facts before me (and I must take a view of the matter which is formed upon the facts), that in fact in each case where the form of the notice of objection was actually the same, the objection to it would arise, the same infirmity, if it had been an infirmity, in the notice of objection. I come to the conclusion that the barrister having had his attention called to the fact that there were many such notices to the same purpose, it would have been neither respectful nor useful to attempt to argue against the decision he had already come to; and, consequently, the two advocates did say, "There is no use contesting this further, and it will govern a good many cases." I come to the conclusion from the evidence that when the barrister was calling over the names, and when there was no objection made, he did not, in fact, know in which particular cases it was that no objection was brought forward, because there really was a notice of objection, but in the form of the one which he had already decided to be a nullity, and in which particular case the objection was not brought forward, because there was really no objection at all, I think it is very probable that if I had the revising barrister here he would say he acted upon that assumption. Had the revising barrister been called, and had he given his evidence half an hour after this had happened, and he had been asked whether James Baker's name was one to which there had been really an objection, but which was not brought forward because it was in this defective form, and whether it was an objection which for some other reason was not a good one and was not brought forward, I feel little doubt that the revising barrister would have said, "It is impossible for me to tell; I know if the objection was in the same form as the other, they agreed not to bring the objection forward because I had decided it before, but whether it applied to the particular case of James Baker or not I do not know; if it did, they were quite right in not bringing it forward." I have no doubt the revising barrister would have said so if his memory had been sufficient to have enabled him to do so. Now, coming to that conclusion, I have to see whether or not his not entering into the merits of James Baker's case was in consequence of his express decision, that the notice of objection in Baker's case was no objection at all, or whether it was not so to be considered. Well, I have stated the facts and the conclusion I have come to upon them. Therefore, in this case, I can come to no other conclusion than that it amounts in point of law to just the same as if it had been stated over again to him, and it had been said, "Sir, in James Baker's case there is a notice of objection, and it is exactly the same as the other case, and I do not press it;" and the revising barrister had nodded his head and said, "Very well." Of course it would have saved some discussion and trouble now if it had then been specifically said, "Well, then, sir, since you have so decided, it may be important at some future election, and we will make a list of thirty or forty names which your decision in this case will govern;" and the barrister had said, "Yes," it would have saved time and trouble in the inquiry now; and in any future case that arises it may be well to do so. But I think the substance and effect is exactly the same as if it had been so said. Taking that to be so, I must take the decision in Chillingworth's case to be a decision which applies to govern the subsequent cases in which the point was exactly the same. What I now decide does not go further than this, that Baker's case is one which was in the overseer's list, into the merits of which the barrister by express decision refused to enter, and it is now open to the petitioners to enter into the merits of the case to show that the name ought to have been struck off by the revising barrister. If they make out their case, I will strike it out now; if not, I will retain it.

FRANCIS v. COCKRELL.

Action—Negligence—Construction of stand on a race-course—Liability of member of race committee who receives money for places on the stand—Implied warranty.

The defendant acting on behalf of himself and several other persons interested in certain horse races entered into a contract with Messrs. E., by which Messrs. E., engaged to erect and let to them a temporary stand for the accommodation of persons desiring to see the races. The defendant, on behalf of himself and his colleagues, all acting gratuitously, received a sum of money, which was appropriated to the race fund, from each person who used a place on the stand. Messrs. E. were competent and proper persons to be employed to erect the stand, but it was in fact, though unknown to the defendant, negligently erected by Messrs. E., and fell and injured the plaintiff who had paid for admission to the stand, and was on it at the time it fell.

Held that the defendant, by receiving money from the plaintiff as the price of his admission to the stand, entered into a contract with the plaintiff by which he impliedly warranted that due care had been used in the construction of the stand by the persons employed to erect it as well as by himself; and therefore that the defendant was liable for the injury sustained by the plaintiff owing to the negligent construction of the stand by Messrs. E.

Redhead v. Midland Railway Company, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628, commented upon.

This was a special case stated by consent of the parties given at the trial before Mellor, J., at the Gloucester Assizes, on the 16th August 1867, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, subject to the opinion of the court on the following facts, as found by the arbitrator.

This action is brought to recover compensation in damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff from the falling of a grand stand which had been erected to enable persons to view the steeplechases at Cheltenham whilst he was upon it for that purpose on the 13th April 1866.

Steeplechases have been holden at Cheltenham annually for many years on the 13th and 14th April.

The steeplechases for the year 1866 were got up, managed, and conducted as those of former years had been.

There was no formal election or appointment of a committee. Meetings were held for the purposes of the steeplechases, and any subscriber to the race fund or any person interested in the steeplechases was eligible to attend them, but the same gentlemen usually attend the meeting each year.

The following gentlemen usually attended the meetings for the steeplechases of 1866, namely, Sir Alexander Ramsay, Hugh Darby Owen, P. F. Durham, Benyon Barton, Price Lewis, James Rossiter, William Robert Holman, William Smart Davies, Frederick Jacobs, and the defendant (who is a saddler), who has for many years resided and carried on business in Cheltenham, and also William Barnett and Charles Scott, since deceased.

A Mr. Jacobs acted as honorary secretary, as he had done in former years. He was paid as usual a fixed sum for his outlay.

He first started the meetings for the year 1866. The meetings were holden sometimes at his verbal, and at others by his written request to some or all of the gentlemen who usually attend them.

FRANCIS v. COCKRELL.

[Q. B.]

The first meeting for the year 1866 was holden as usual about a month or six weeks before the time of the steeplechases.

It took as usual about a month or six weeks to get up the steeplechases.

At each meeting, and there were several before the steeplechases took place in 1866, one of the members, always Sir Alexander Ramsay when he was present, was voted to the chair.

The defendant was a subscriber to the steeplechases, and attended all the meetings of the committee for that year except one.

At one of the meetings the day was fixed when the races should be holden for 1866, and the prizes which should be and were given to the winners were determined upon. Sir Alexander Ramsay, Lord Fitzhardinge, Lord Tredegar, the Earl of Coventry, Col. Berkely, Mr. Calmore, Mr. Price Lewis, Capt. Durham, and other gentlemen (not including the defendant), were invited to act as stewards, and they did so act. A judge to determine the winners of the races was appointed, and certain of the gentlemen present were requested to see to various parts of the grounds and to undertake various duties in the getting-up, carrying out, and conducting the steeplechases, which they did.

A fund was formed for the holding of these steeplechases, called the race fund, which consisted of the subscriptions of any person that thought proper to subscribe, the receipts from the various stands and booths permitted to be erected on the course, and for the carriages permitted to enter and stand thereon, the money received from the sale of the cards of the races, and the surplus remaining from the previous year.

The race fund was deposited in a bank, in the names of the defendant, Sir Alex. Ramsay and Capt. Calmore. The latter never attended any of the meetings for the year 1866. He was absent, and gave authority to the bank to pay the cheques signed by the defendant and Sir Alex. Ramsay, which the bank did.

There was a surplus from the fund of the previous year applicable to the race fund for 1866.

At one of the meetings for 1866 the copyright of the cards of the steeplechases was authorised to be sold by auction, and it was so sold, and the proceeds were added to the race fund. Printed cards stating that they were published by authority were issued and sold by the purchasers of the copyright to persons attending the steeplechases.

The ground for various booths was let under the directions of gentlemen attending the meetings to persons who applied for the same, and the amounts received for such letting were added to the fund.

The fund was applied by the gentlemen attending the meetings to the expenses incidental to getting up, managing, and holding the steeplechases, the cost of the erection of stands, the payment of the ground-rent for the course, and the prizes for the winners.

The gentlemen who attended the meetings and acted as aforesaid did so gratuitously, as also did the defendant.

A meeting was holden at the Queen's Hotel in the month of March 1866. Several of the gentlemen who usually attended were present, and the defendant being one, Sir Alex. Ramsay was moved into and took the chair. It was discussed whether they could have a grand stand, and in the discussion the then state of the race fund, and the probable future takings were considered, and it was decided that they could have it. The defendant was present and took part in the discussion. When it was decided to have a stand the chairman was desired to request the defendant to order it, as usual, with certain modifications, as hereinafter mentioned, then determined upon; and he did so request the defendant, and the defendant agreed to order it. It was also determined in like manner that the public should be admitted to the grand stand and paddock in front upon paying as theretofore 5s. each person, and the defendant was requested to let the refreshment room under the grand stand, and manage and superintend the taking of this admission money; and he agreed to do so and did.

The defendant had been for several of the previous years in like manner requested to perform the like duties, and had performed them.

The grand stand, for many of the previous years, had been erected by Messrs. Eassie, of Gloucester, architects and builders, and none of those had ever been found insufficient or improper.

Messrs. Eassie are very experienced and competent and proper persons to be employed by the gentlemen attending the meeting, or by the defendant in and about the erecting of a sufficient, safe, secure, and proper grand stand for the purpose required.

The defendant, after being so requested as aforesaid, went to Messrs. Eassie, and told them that it was determined to have a grand stand as usual, with certain modifications, as hereinafter mentioned, and asked them to submit their offer in writing.

Messrs. Eassie caused to be written and sent a letter, of which the following is a copy:—

High Orchard Works.
London Offices, 19, Great George-street,
Westminster, S.W.

Gloucester, March 26th, 1866.

The Secretary of the Steeplechase Committee, Cheltenham.

Dear Sir,—We hereby offer to erect a race stand for next month's meeting, of same size as usually hired by you of us at previous meetings, but with weighing and other rooms, modified as arranged with Mr. Cockrell, last year. We engage to hand same over for your use on the Saturday preceding the race, if desired, or two clear days from first race day, providing we get notice by return of post of the acceptance of our tender. Price will be 66l. 10s. (payable within a week after races) subject to a deduction of 5l., our general donation to the general fund. The fittings to comprise desks in weighing room, and judge's box, as before. Yours truly,
W. EASSIE and Co.

The ring fence to be hurdles, and provided by yourself, as usual.

This offer was accepted at one of the meetings at which the defendant was present and acted, and Messrs. Eassie erected a grand stand upon the course rented by the gentlemen attending the meetings at a part determined upon at one of the meetings, with the modifications referred to under the terms of the before mentioned letter, and the ring fence of hurdles was provided by the direction of the gentlemen attending one of the meetings.

The grand stand so erected was built of timber, with a refreshment bar at the bottom, on the ground, and a part above raised over the refreshment bar for persons to stand or sit to see the steeplechases, and which was reached by steps from the ground. There were also in it a steward's box, weighing room, and other conveniences.

It was erected upon the ground enclosed by the ring fence of hurdles aforesaid. This ring fence included a piece of ground between the front of the grand stand and the course, where persons could also stand and see the steeplechases, and it also included the betting ring and saddling paddock. It was erected about the same spot as the stand of 1865, and in a similar manner to that stand at which no accident occurred.

No person was employed by the gentlemen attending the meeting, or the defendant, to survey the stand after it was so erected, nor did they or any of them, nor did the defendant, personally inspect the stand until after it had been repaired subsequently to the accident. There was not any formal handing over of the stand by

FRANCIS v. COCKRELL.

[Q. B.]

Messrs. Eassie to the gentlemen aforesaid or any one on their behalf; but Messrs. Eassie were not entitled to, and did not, in fact, exercise any control over the admission of spectators to the inclosure to the stand. Messrs. Eassie employed their foreman to superintend the erecting of the stand; and when its erection was ended, on Thursday, the 12th April, reported to the defendant that it was finished, and Messrs. Eassie, as was usual, directed their foreman to be there on the race day, in case any alteration or small thing should be required to be made. ●

The gentlemen attending the meetings, and the defendant, and the stewards, did not, nor did any or either of them, personally interfere in the erection of the stand.

The public were admitted within this ring fence upon payment of 5s. for each person, at a gate placed for the purpose, and at which a ticket was given to entitle the owner to re-admission if he afterwards went outside.

The defendant appointed a person to prevent anybody entering within the said ring fence without paying the 5s., and to take the money from those who did enter; and during part of the time of the steeplechases the defendant himself stood at the gate, took the money, and admitted persons.

Any person entering the ring fence at the gate aforesaid and paying 5s., had the right to go upon the grand stand in the place made for the purpose, to see the steeplechases.

The stewards exercised the right of entering the ring fence without any payment. Each of the gentlemen attending the meetings who held no official position, would be compelled to pay the same as one of the public. The defendant, from his position, had the right to enter without any payment.

The plaintiff was a stranger at Cheltenham; and on the 13th April 1866, being the first day of the steeplechases there, he paid 5s. at the gate, and to the person respectively placed and appointed there for the purpose, took his ticket and entered the ring fence and thereupon became and was entitled to go upon and did lawfully go upon the grand stand in the place appointed for the purpose, to see one of the steeplechases; and whilst he was so lawfully there, and without any fault or omission on his part, the portion of the grand stand near which he was, broke, gave way, and fell, and the plaintiff was thrown to the ground and was thereby injured.

The said grand stand, and the part that broke, gave way, and fell, were in fact negligently and improperly erected, and insufficient for the purpose for which they were erected and used; and the said grand stand and the said part part aforesaid, so broke, gave way, and fell, from being so negligently and improperly erected and being so insufficient as aforesaid, and not from any other cause whatsoever.

Before and at the time the said grand stand and part so broke, gave way, and fell as aforesaid, the gentlemen attending the meeting, the plaintiff, the defendant, and the stewards aforesaid, were not, nor had any or either of them, any notice or knowledge that the said grand stand and part, or either of them, had been or was so negligently and improperly erected or so insufficient as aforesaid.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: first, whether or not the plaintiff is entitled to recover compensation from the defendant for the injuries sustained by him under the circumstances aforesaid? if he is, then, secondly, whether he is so entitled in an action of tort or on contract. If the former, the verdict for the plaintiff is to stand but is to be reduced to 180*l.*; if the latter, then the verdict is to be reduced to 175*l.* If the plaintiff is not entitled to recover then the verdict for the plaintiff is to be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict for the defendant is to be entered.

Mellish, Q.C. (with whom were H. James and Harington) for the plaintiff.—There can be no doubt that there existed a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, the defendant being a member of the race committee, and the person who appointed the receiver of the 5s. payments, receiving the 5s. himself during part of the time; and it makes no difference that the profits were not to go into the pocket of the defendant or the other members of the committee, but to go to the race fund; this amounting merely to the fact that the profits were to be applied as the committee thought fit. The defendant, in inviting, for reward, the public to go to the stand, must be taken to have contracted that it was a safe place to go to, and must therefore be held liable for negligence in the construction of it. It is not contended that there is an absolute warranty of its safety, but that there is a warranty that due care has been taken in its construction, otherwise the plaintiff would be without remedy, for there is no privity between him and Messrs. Eassie, who erected the stand; whilst, on the other hand, if the defendant is held liable to the plaintiff, Messrs. Eassie will be liable to the defendant. Negligence, no doubt, must be proved to have existed, but it is clear in the present case that there was negligence. In Grote v. The Chester and Holyhead Railway Company, 2 Ex. 251, in an action against a railway company for compensation for injury received by the plaintiff by the breaking down of a bridge, over which he was passing in a passenger train, it was held a proper direction to the jury to determine whether the defendants had engaged the services of competent engineers who had adopted the best method and had used the best materials, and that if the defendants had done so they would not be liable; but that the mere fact of their having engaged the services of such a person would not relieve them from the consequences of an accident, arising from a deficiency in the work. In answer to the argument that the defendants had done their duty in employing a competent engineer, Parke, B. said:—"It seems to me that they would still be liable for the accident, unless he also used due and reasonable care, and employed proper materials in the work." And the same learned judge said that "a coach proprietor is liable for an accident which arises from an imperfection in the vehicle, although he has employed a clever and competent coach-maker." [LUSH, J. referred to Brazier v. The Polytechnic Institution, 1 F. & F. 507, which was an action against the defendants for not properly maintaining a staircase, whereby the same fell down, and the plaintiff, who had paid for admission to the Institution, was injured, there having been alterations which, it was alleged, caused the fall, where Wightman, J. left two questions to the jury—viz., (1) whether the defendants themselves were guilty of negligence and (2) whether the persons employed by the defendants to make the alterations had used the necessary skill and caution to effect that object; and a rule, though granted as against evidence, was not granted on the ground of misdirection.] The widest door would be opened to negligence if those who have the management of public entertainments are not held liable for negligence in the construction of the structures to which the public are invited for reward to come. [HANNEN, J.—You say there is a duty on the defendant to employ a competent person to erect the structure, and also to employ some one else to see that the first person has properly performed his contract. Where is this duty to end?] The same objection would apply to the circumstances of the case of Grote v. The Chester

FRANCIS v. COCKRELL.

and Holyhead Railway Company, but it was not considered to diminish the defendant's liability. Pollock, C. B., in that case states the rule to be "that if a party, in the same situation as that in which the defendants are, employ a person who is fully competent to the work, and the best method is adopted, and the best materials are used, such party is not liable for the accident." "If the jury," said the Chief Baron, "have been directed in conformity with this rule, there is no ground for the present application. It cannot be contended that the defendants are not responsible for the accident, merely on the ground that they have employed a competent person to construct the bridge." In Burns v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Company, 13 Ir. Com. Law Rep. 543, Pigot, C.B., stated the rule as to carriers of passengers thus—"Although a carrier of passengers does not warrant the safety or the due arrival of his passengers, yet I consider that he must be considered as warranting that the vehicle in which he conveys them is, at the time of the commencement of the journey, free from all defects, at least, as far as human care and foresight can provide, and perfectly road-worthy;" and the same principle applies to the present case. In Hole v. The Sittingbourne and Sheerness Railway Company, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 750; 30 L. J. 81, Ex., a railway company was authorised by Act of Parliament to construct a drawbridge over a navigable river, but so as not to obstruct the passage of vessels for more than a limited time; and the company agreed with a contractor to construct the bridge and complete the work as required by their Act of Parliament, but he failed to do so, and prevented the navigation; it was held that the railway company were liable, and not their contractor, for damages sustained on account of the navigation being impeded. "A party cannot," said Pollock, C.B., "avoid the responsibility incurred in acts of this sort by employing another to do the work. . . . If a person employed to build a house does it so as to darken the windows of a neighbour, no doubt the builder would not be liable, but the master who ordered it to be so built. It is his duty to know what is in course of being done, and to see that no mischief is arising or injury occasioned."

Matthews, Q.C. (with whom was Huddleston Q.C.) for the defendant.—The facts of this case are peculiar. The defendant is a saddler having no special knowledge, and undertaking no special duty which should fix him with liability. Any person who took an interest in the races, including the plaintiff himself, might have become a member of the committee. The position of the defendant is analogous to that of a gratuitous bailee; there is no express contract made by him with the defendant. [LUSH, J.—With whom then was the contract as to the payment of the 5s. made; and if the plaintiff had been turned out after payment, against whom could he have proceeded?] In Wood v. Leadbitter, 13 M. & W. 838 the plaintiff who had paid a guinea for a ticket for the stand at the Doncaster races, was held not entitled to bring an action of trespass for his expulsion. [LUSH, J.—The question there was a different one, namely, whether the plaintiff had a right to enter, or whether he was there by the leave and licence of the owner of the close, and it was held, that he was not, in the absence of a deed. But the court said as to the payment of a guinea by the plaintiff; "whether it may give the plaintiff a right of action against those from whom he purchased the ticket, or those who authorised its being issued and sold to him, is a point not necessary to be discussed; any such action would be founded on a breach of contract, and would not be the result of his having acquired by the ticket a right of going upon the stand in spite of the owner of the soil."]

If the defendant has not himself been guilty of any want of reasonable care in the performance of his duty, it is submitted that under the circumstances of the present case he cannot be held liable. In the cases cited the duty cast on the defendants was much larger than can be imposed on the present defendant. In Grote v. The Chester and Holyhead Railway Company (ubi sup.) the engineer employed was a servant of the railway company, and there was no question like that as to a sub-contractor. In Pike v. The Polytechnic Institution, 1 F. & F. 712, it was held that the defendants were not responsible for latent defects on the staircase (whether in construction or in materials), at the time they took the building, but were only responsible for any want of due care to keep it in a reasonably safe condition, and were liable for repair of it in an improper manner, tending to weaken its strength. The defendants, said Erle, C. J. to the jury, "are not to be deemed to have warranted the staircase as safe, or to have insured to the public that they might safely use it. They would be bound to use due care to make it reasonably fit for public use; and it is for you to say whether there was any want of due care in this instance." Negligence must consist in the breach of some duty, and it is submitted in the first place, that the defendant has not been guilty of any negligence in the breach of any duty that he undertook or that he ought to be held to have undertaken to perform. Even in the case of a shopkeeper who invites people to go to his shop he is only bound to exercise reasonable care to prevent danger to his customers. In Indermaur v. Dames, L. R. 1, C. P. 287; 14 L. T. N.S. 486 (confirmed in error), Willes, J. summarises the law on this subject, viz., "as to the duty of the occupier of a building with reference to persons resorting thereto in the course of business, upon his invitation, express or implied. The common case is that of a customer in a shop, but it is obvious that this is only one of a class; for whether the customer is actually chaffering at the time, or actually buys or not, he is, according to an undoubted course of authority and practice, entitled to the exercise of reasonable care by the occupier to prevent damage from unusual danger of which the occupier knows or ought to know, such as a trap-door left open, unfenced, and unlighted. This protection does not depend upon the fact of a contract being entered into in the way of the shopkeeper's business during the stay of the customer, but upon the fact that the customer has come into the shop in pursuance of a tacit invitation given by the shopkeeper with a view to business which concerns himself. . . . The class to which the customer belongs includes persons who go not as mere volunteers, or licensees, or guests, or servants, or persons whose employment is such that danger may be considered as bargained for, but who go upon business which concerns the occupier, and upon his invitation express or implied. And with respect to such a visitor at least, we consider it settled law that he, using reasonable care on his part for his own safety, is entitled to expect that the occupier shall on his part use reasonable care to prevent damage from unusual danger which he knows or ought to know; and that where there is evidence of neglect, the question whether such reasonable care has been taken by notice, lighting, guarding, or otherwise, and whether there was contributory negligence in the sufferer, must be determined by a jury as a matter of fact." In similar language the duty of a canal company is stated by Tindal, C. J. in The Lancaster Canal Company v. Parnaby, 11 A. & E. 242. "The facts stated in the inducement show that the company made the canal for their profit, and opened it to the public upon the payment of tolls to the company; and the common law in such a case imposes a duty upon the proprietors, not perhaps to repair the canal or absolutely to free it from obstructions, but to take reasonable care so long as they keep it open for the public use of all who may choose to navigate it, that they may navigate it without danger to their lives or property." So that even where persons are expressly invited to come on the premises of another for reward, the exercise of reasonable care is the only duty that the law implies on the part of the occupier. Where persons are not invited but only allowed to go on the premises of another, the duty is not even so strong. In Gautret v. Egerton, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 375; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 17, which was a case of this sort, Willes, J. says, "assuming that these were private docks, the private property of the defendants, and that they permitted persons going to or coming from the docks, whether for their own benefit or that of the defendants, to use the way, the dedication of a permission to use the way must be taken to be in the character of a gift. The principle of law as to gifts is, that the giver is not responsible for damage resulting from the insecurity of the thing, unless he knew its evil character at the time, and omitted to caution the donee." . . . To bring the case within the category of actionable negligence, some wrongful act must be shown, or a breach of some positive duty; otherwise a man who allows strangers to roam over his property would be held to be answerable for not protecting them against any danger which they might encounter whilst using the licence." In Southcote v. Stanley, 25 L. J. 339, Ex. the declaration alleged that the plaintiff was lawfully in the defendant's house as a visitor by his own invitation, and that for the purpose of leaving the house, the plaintiff with the defendant's permission and knowledge, opened a glass door of the defendant's, which it was necessary to open, and that by the carelessness, negligence, and default of the defendant, the door was in an insecure and dangerous condition, and unfit to be opened, by reason whereof, and of the carelessness, negligence, default, and improper conduct of the defendant, a piece of glass fell from the door upon the plaintiff and injured him; and the Court of Exchequer held, upon demurrer, that the declaration disclosed no cause of action. [HAYES, J. referred to Collis v. Selden, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 495, where a declaration alleging that the defendant wrongfully, negligently, and improperly hung a chandelier in a public house knowing that the plaintiff and others were likely to be therein and under the chandelier, and that the chandelier unless properly hung was likely to fall upon and injure them, and that the plaintiff being lawfully in the public house, the chandelier fell upon and injured him, was, on demurrer, held bad as not disclosing any duty by the defendant towards the plaintiff for the breach of which an action could be maintained.] The defendant here was bound to do nothing more than employ a competent person to erect the stand, and that he did. The sub-contractor may be regarded as an independent contractor, and many cases have held that a person who employs an independent contractor is not liable for negligence on his part in the performance of his contract; e.g. Allen v. Hayward, 7 Q. B. 960, where commissioners appointed for improving navigation employed a contractor who made a drain which, from a defect in the materials, could not resist water, and the neighbouring land was in consequence flooded, and the commissioners were held not liable for this act of the contractor, though the misfeasance was one for which, if committed by an agent or servant whose act in this respect was the act of the commissioners, they would have been so liable.

the contract made by a person who invites the public for reward to come to a place of amusement supplied by him. Whether the defendant had co-contractors or not is immaterial; he either himself received, or appointed the person who did receive, the 5s. He must be taken to have contracted that reasonable care has been employed in the construction of the stand; he is liable for the neglect of that reasonable care, and cannot escape liability by employing others to do the work. In Pickard v. Smith, 10 C. B., N. S., 480, Williams, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "If an independent contractor is employed to do a lawful act, and in the course of the work he or his servants commit some casual act of wrong or negligence, the employer is not answerable. To this effect are many authorities which were referred to in the argument. That rule is, however, not applicable to cases in which the act which occasions the injury is one which the contractor was employed to do; nor, by a parity of reasoning, to cases in which the contractor is intrusted with the performance of a duty incumbent upon his employer, and neglects its fulfilment, whereby an injury is occasioned."

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 21, 1870.—The judgment of the court (Cockburn, C. J., Lush and Hannen, JJ.), was now delivered as follows by HANNEN, J.—The facts material to the determination of this case are these: The defendant, acting on behalf of himself and several other persons interested in the Cheltenham Steeplechases, entered into a contract with Messrs. Eassie, by which they engaged to erect and let to the defendants a temporary stand for the accommodation of persons desirous to see the races. The stand having been erected, the defendant, on behalf of himself and his colleagues, received money from visitors for the use of places on the stand. Messrs. Eassie were competent and proper persons to be employed to erect the stand; but it was in fact negligently erected by them, and in consequence of its being so negligently erected, it fell, and the plaintiff who had paid for admission, and was upon the stand looking at the races, was injured by the fall. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant knew of the improper construction of the stand. We think it clear that the defendant, by receiving money from the plaintiff as the price of his admission to the stand, entered into some engagement with him with reference to its condition; but in order to determine whether the defendant is liable in damages for the injury which the plaintiff has sustained, we have to consider what the extent of that engagement was. The nearest analogy to this case seems to be afforded by that of carriers of passengers. The carrier is paid for providing the means of transporting the passenger from place to place. The defendant received payment for providing the means of supporting the spectator at a particular place. This distinction does not appear to give rise to any difference of principle between the contracts to be implied in the one case and in the other as to the safety of the means provided for carriage or support. The recent decision of the Exchequer Chamber affirming the judgment of this court in Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company, L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 379; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 628, has established that there is not in such a case any implied warranty that the carriage provided is in all respects fit for its purpose. But that decision, while it gives confirmation (if any were needed) to the proposition that the carrier undertakes that he has used due care in providing safe means for the conveyance of the passengers, expressly leaves undetermined the further question the carrier also undertakes that due care has been used by those who have contracted with him to provide the means of conveyance: (See p. 393 of the former report.) In the present case, it is not found that the defendant was himself wanting in due care, and no power to draw inferences of fact is given to the court, and, if it were, we should not be able to draw the inference that the defendant was personally guilty of any want of care. He had employed competent and proper persons who had efficiently executed similar work on previous occasions. The circumstance that the defendant did not himself survey or employ anyone to survey the stand after it was erected, does not in itself establish the charge of negligence; for it does not appear that the defect was such as could have been discovered on inspection; and even if it had been, it cannot be laid down as necessarily a want of care not to inspect, although it would in some circumstances be evidence from which a jury might properly find that due care had not been taken. It becomes necessary for us therefore to consider whether the contract by the defendant to be implied from the relation which existed between him and the plaintiff was that due care had been used, not only by the defendant and his servants, but by the persons whom he employed as independent contractors to erect the stand. It is said in the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company that "warranties implied by law are for the most part founded on the presumed intention of the parties, and ought certainly to be founded on reason, and with a just regard to the interests of the party who is supposed to give the warranty, as well as of the party to whom it is supposed to be given." Applying this rule to the present case, we think that the contract by the defendant with the plaintiff did contain an implied warranty that due care had been used in the construction of the stand by those whom the defendant had employed to do the work, as well as by himself. In the ordinary course of things, the passenger does not know whether the carrier has himself manufactured the means of carriage, or contracted with someone else for its manufacture. If the carrier has contracted with someone else, the passenger does not usually know who that person was, and in no case has any share in the selection. The liability of the manufacturer must depend on the terms of the contract between him and the carrier, of which the passenger has no knowledge, and over which he can have no control; while the carrier can introduce what stipulation and take what securities he may think proper. For injury resulting to the carrier himself by the manufacturer's want of care, the carrier has a remedy against the manufacturer; but the passenger has no remedy against the manufacturer for damage arising from a mere breach of contract with the carrier: (Longmeid v. Halliday, 6 Ex. 766.) Unless, therefore, the presumed intention of the parties be that the passenger should, in the event of his being injured, by the breach of the manufacturer's contract, of which he has no knowledge, be without a remedy, the only way in which effect can be given to a different intention is by supposing that the carrier is to be responsible to the passenger, and to look for his indemnity to the person whom he selected, and whose breach of contract has caused the mischief. We have already stated that we consider the same reasoning which is applicable to the case of a carrier of passengers is applicable to the case of a person who, like the defendant, provides places for spectators at races or other exhibitions. But not only do we think that when the reasons of justice and convenience on the one side and on the other are weighed the balance inclines in favour of the plaintiff, but we are also of opinion that the weight of authority is on the plaintiff's side. All the cases bearing on this subject are collected and commented on in the judgment in Redhead v. The Midland Railway Company. It will only be necessary to refer to a few of them. In the earlier decisions the language of the judges is, perhaps, ambiguous. Thus in Christie v. Gregg, 2 Camp. 81, Sir James Mansfield says: "The carrier did not warrant the safety of the passengers. His undertaking as to them went no further than this, that as far as human care and foresight could go, he would provide for their safe conveyance. Therefore if the breaking down of the coach was purely accidental, the plaintiff had no remedy for the misfortune he had encountered." Taken strictly, this would support the plaintiff's contention, because if the manufacturer whom the carrier employed was guilty of negligence, the undertaking was not fulfilled that the carriage should be safe "as far as human care and foresight could go." But it is just possible that Sir James Mansfield meant "as far as human care on the defendant's part could go." The same remark is applicable to what is said by Best, J. in Crofts v. Waterhouse, 3 Bing. 319, 320. But it is clear that Alderson, B., in Sharp v. Gray, 9 Bing. 459, considered that the carrier of passengers was liable not only for those defects of construction which he might himself guard against, but also those which arise from want of care on the part of the maker. But in Grote v. Chester, 2 Ex. 255, the point now under consideration was distinctly raised. There an accident happened from the defective construction of a bridge over a railway, for the erection of which the company had employed a competent engineer. It was left to the jury in effect to say whether the engineer, as well as the company, had used due care and skill. For the defendants it was objected that they would not be liable unless they had been guilty of negligence; and after verdict for the plaintiff it was argued for the defendants that as they had engaged the services of the most competent engineer in the construction of the bridge, they had done their duty; upon which Parke, B. said, "It seems to me that they would still be liable for the accident, unless he also used due and reasonable care, and employed proper materials in the work." And later, with reference to the case of Sharp v. Gray (ubi sup.) he says, "The coach proprietor is liable for an accident which arises from an imperfection in the vehicle, although he has employed a clever and competent coachmaker." And the court held that the jury had been properly directed, saying, "It cannot be contended that the defendants are not responsible for the accident merely on the ground that they have employed a competent person to construct the bridge." In Burns v. The Cork and Bandon Railway Company, 13 Ir. Com. L. Rep. 543, the same point appears to have been raised upon the pleadings. The action was for not carrying the plaintiff safely. The defendants pleaded that the cause of the accident (a defect in a crank pin) was not capable of being detected by them, and that the crank was purchased from competent manufacturers, and that the defendants before the journey duly examined the crank, and had no notice of the defect. To this plea the plaintiff demurred. The court gave judgment for the plaintiff, holding the plea bad because, amongst other reasons, it did not contain any averment negating carelessness on the part of the manufacturers. Pigott, B. says, "If the defendants had been the manufacturers of the engine they would have been bound to aver and to prove that due care and skill had been exercised in the process of its manufacture. Are they to be relieved from legal liability because they allege that they have purchased it from a competent manufacturer? See also the decision of Wightman, J. in the case of Brazier v. The Polytechnic Institution, 1 F. & F. 509. We think, therefore, that both on

THE ILFRACOMBE RAILWAY COMPANY v. NASH.

Company—Shareholder — Register of shareholders — Director—Qualification shares—Implied assent to hold shares.

N. became one of the original directors of a railway company at the solicitation of R., the promoter of, and subsequently solicitor to, the company. The qualification of a director was twenty shares, but R. promised N. that he should have twenty fully paid-up shares given to him as his qualification. The company was not bound by this promise, and had no power to allot paid-up shares except for value received. N. acted as a director of the company, and received fees for his services. He was from time to time present at the sealing of the register, on which his name was entered as the holder of twenty unpaid shares. He also received notices of calls due on these shares, but he took no notice of the applications. He also concurred in a report, which spoke of him as eligible for election as director. Subsequently R. procured twenty fully paid-up shares to be transferred to N., and N.'s name then stood on the register as the holder of twenty fully paid-up shares, and twenty other shares on which nothing had been paid. No letter of allotment was ever sent to N.:

Held, that N. was holder as well of the twenty unpaid shares as of the twenty fully paid-up shares.

This was a proceeding by writ in the nature of a writ of scire facias, to recover 500*l.* from the defendant as being a shareholder in the Devon and Somerset Railway Company.

The declaration stated, in substance, that the plaintiffs obtained in the Court of Common Pleas a verdict for 10,750*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* against the Devon and Somerset Railway; that on the 10th day of Aug. 1866, execution issued, but there could not be found any of the goods of the said company, whereon to levy; that the defendant then and now was the holder of twenty shares in the said company, and that there remained unpaid in respect of each of the said shares the sum of 25*l.*, and the said court having ordered that the plaintiffs should be at liberty to issue a writ of scire facias against the defendant, the defendant was required, within eight days, to appear and show cause why the plaintiffs should not have execution against him for the said sum of 10,750*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, to the extent of the money now remaining to be paid in respect of his shares.

To this the defendant pleaded that he was not, on the 10th Aug. 1866, or now the owner of or entitled to the said twenty shares or any of them; and secondly, that the said shares were before and at the time when the defendant became the holder of the same, and when his name was entered as a shareholder, fully paid-up shares, and that never since that time did there remain unpaid in respect of any of the shares any sum of money.

The cause came on to be tried before Mr. Justice Keating at the sittings in Middlesex, after Trinity Term last, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed, subject to the opinion of the court on the following case.

1. The Devon and Somerset Railway Company hereinafter called "the company," is incorporated by the Devon and Somerset Railway Act 1864, which Act forms part of this case. This Act came into operation the 29th July 1864.

2. The plaintiffs, in an action brought in the Court of Common Pleas, recovered by the judgment of the said court against the said company, the sum of 10,750*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, and duly issued execution on the said judgment against the property and effects of the said company, and there could not be found sufficient whereon to levy such execution, and the writ of scire facias against the defendant issued pursuant to an order of this court made on the 8th May 1868.

3. J. T. Nash, mentioned in the 4th and 16th sections of the Devon and Somerset Railway Act 1864, is the defendant.

4. The capital of the said company was by the said Act 500,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 25*l.* each.

5. The 15th section of the said Act enacts that the qualification of a director shall be the possession by him in his own right of shares to the aggregate nominal amount of 500*l.*

6. By the 16th section of the said Act it was enacted that Lord Poltimore, J. T. Nash, and others should be the first directors, and should continue in office until the first ordinary meeting, and at that meeting the shareholders present in person or by proxy might either continue in office the directors appointed by the Act, or any of them, or might elect directors to supply the place of such of them as were not so continued in office, the retiring director (if any) being, if qualified, re-eligible.

7. The company was promoted by, amongst others, a Mr. Riccard, a solicitor at South Molton, who afterwards became and still is the solicitor to the company, and others. Whilst the company was in a state of promotion, and on the eve of their going to Parliament for their Act, there was a great difficulty in procuring a sufficient number of directors for the proposed company, whereupon Mr. Riccard applied to the defendant to become a director.

8. Accordingly Mr. Riccard, who was one of the said promoters, and who afterwards became solicitor of the company, applied to the defendant to become a director of the company, undertaking at the same time that on the defendant so consenting, there should be transferred to him twenty fully paid-up shares in the company as his qualification for director. Relying upon this undertaking on the part of Mr. Riccard, and having expressly told him that his qualification must be given to him, and that he would not accept any but fully paid-up shares to qualify him as a director, the defendant consented to become a director, and to allow his name to be inserted in the aforesaid Act as one of the directors of the company.

9. The first meeting of the directors was held on the 4th Aug. 1864, and no other board meeting of the said directors was held until the 23rd Sept. 1864, when the defendant was present and acted as a director.

10. Previous to that meeting a circular had been issued inviting the public to apply for shares, and at that meeting, the defendant being present, it was resolved as follows, that is to say, "That shares already applied for be allotted." Except this there has not been any resolution relating to the allotment of shares.

11. A book called the "Register of Shareholders of the said Company" was kept by the secretary of said company, and the seal of the company was first affixed to it at the second ordinary meeting of the company held on the 28th Feb. 1865, at which the defendant was present as a director (the first ordinary meeting of the company having been held on the 11th Oct. 1864, at which also the defendant was present) and in such register the defendant's name had been put down as a shareholder in respect of twenty shares, without any number being appropriated to them, or to any other shares on the said register.

12. On the 11th Oct. 1864, a meeting of the board of directors was held, at which the defendant was present, and at that meeting it was resolved—"That notice of the allotment call be issued, the call to be payable within fourteen days from the date of the notice," and notices were sent to those who had applied for shares.

13. This register was made up by the secretary before the meeting, without any directions as to the persons he should place on the register, and the secretary put down the name of the defendant for the proper number of shares to qualify as a director.

14. On the 16th May 1865 a meeting of the board of directors was held, at which the defendant was present, when it resolved that a first call of 5*l.*, payable in two instalments of 2*l.* 10*s.* each, should be made, and the defendant received notice of this call, with a form of banker's receipt for the amounts attached.

15. This was the first time that the defendant had any knowledge that his name was on the register of shareholders. The defendant did not reply to this application, and did not pay the call.

16. On the 4th Aug. 1865 the defendant received from the company the sum of 52*l.* 10*s.* as director's fees for the then past year.

17. On the 4th Aug. 1865 the directors issued a report, a copy of which is annexed hereto. The defendant was never informed by the secretary, nor was the board, nor did the defendant know or suspect that the arrears claimed from him were in respect of his shares; but the secretary, in calculating the arrears, and in the 644 shares mentioned in the same report, included the twenty shares for which he had put down the defendant's name.

18. This report was approved of by the board at a board meeting, at which the defendant was present, and afterward confirmed at the general meeting of the company in the next paragraph mentioned.

19. On the 24th Aug. 1865 the next half-yearly general meeting of the shareholders was held, at which the defendant was present, and the register of shareholders was sealed; and in that register the defendant is entered as a shareholder in respect of twenty shares, numbered 521 to 540.

20. In the register the secretary had put down his own name and those of the said Mr. Riccard and Mr. Birch each for a large number of shares, for which they had not applied, and which he considered as fully paid-up, to which they were entitled for their expenses in promoting the company and obtaining the Act.

21. There was no resolution authorising this proceeding on the part of the secretary other than the following resolution:

That fully paid-up shares to the extent of 79,050*l.* be issued to the contractors or their nominees, which, with the sum of 2950*l.* in cash already advanced to them by the board on account of the expenses of the company since its incorporation, will make up the total of 82,000*l.*, the amount to which the contractors are entitled under the terms of their contract, and that the contractors pay to the promoters jointly the sum of 2950*l.* in cash and 12,000*l.* in fully paid-up shares, being portions of the above-named 82,000*l.*, and which the promoters are entitled to receive on account of the sum of 42,000*l.* granted as the total cost of obtaining the Act, and included in the said 82,000*l.* Ordered therefore, that the shares for the 67,050*l.* and 12,000*l.*, making up 79,050*l.*, be stated, but not issued to the contractors, except upon condition of their making the respective payments of 2950*l.* and 12,000*l.* to the promoters simultaneously in the respect of their shares. *

22. The secretary did not distinguish these shares in the register as fully paid-up shares.

23. On the 13th Oct. 1865 the secretary of the company sent the following circular:

Oct. 13th, 1865.

Dear Sir,—I beg to inform you that the undermentioned calls payable by you in respect of shares held in this company are still in arrear, and to request that you will pay the same to the West of England Bank, South Molton, without delay.—I am, yours faithfully,

J. M'MILLAN, Secretary.

Allotment call... 250

First call 100

J. F. Nash, Esq.

24. The defendant took no action on this letter, nor did the company.

25. The next ordinary meeting of the company was held in Feb. 1866, at which the defendant was present, and the seal of the company was affixed to the register.

26. In Nov. 1865 the secretary received notice from the company that his services were no longer required, and he ceased to be the secretary to the said company, and a letter was sent to the chairman of the board, in which it was stated by Mr. M'Millan that the defendant "had never qualified, and continued to act at the board as an unqualified director," and was handed about amongst the directors at the board, and shown by the said chairman to Mr. Riccard, who was present at the board in his character of solicitor. The defendant was also present at this board.

28. Mr. Riccard then, for the first time, informed the board of the arrangement which he had made with the defendant in reference to his becoming a director of the company as mentioned in paragraphs 7 and 8 of this case.

29. Immediately after this meeting Mr. Riccard, in pursuance of the said arrangement with the defendant, which he had just communicated to the board, went into the City in order to procure to be transferred to the defendant twenty fully paid-up shares of the company, numbered 10,457 to 10,476, and on the 14th Aug. 1866 they were transferred to the defendant.

30. In June 1866 a second call of 5*l.* per share was made, and the secretary forwarded the usual notices of this call to the persons on the register, and amongst them to the defendant.

31. The next ordinary meeting of the company was held in Aug. 1866, at which the defendant was present, and in the register sealed at that meeting the defendant's name appears for forty shares without any number; and the next ordinary meeting of the company was held in Feb. 1867, at which the defendant was present, and in the register sealed at that meeting the defendant's name appears for forty shares without any number; and the next ordinary meeting was held in Aug. 1867, at which the defendant was present, and in the register sealed at that meeting the defendant's name appears for twenty shares, numbered 521 to 540, and twenty others, numbered 10,457 to 10,476, the latter being the above mentioned fully paid-up shares so transferred to the defendant, as mentioned in paragraph 29 of this case, but the defendant never knew that his name had been put down for forty shares in the register. The register of Aug. 1866 and that of Feb. 1867 are contained in a different book to the book which contains the register of shareholders which were sealed at the other meetings at which registers were sealed.

32. Half-yearly general meetings of the company have continued to be held, and the register has remained in the same state, as far as the defendant's name and shares are concerned.

34. Save as above mentioned, the defendant never subscribed to the undertaking, and never applied for shares, and never agreed to take any but fully paid-up shares, and no letter of allotment of any shares was ever sent him.

35. The defendant has never paid any money in respect of any of the said shares, and the directors of the company have never taken any steps against him to enforce such payment; and, save as aforesaid, no application has ever been made to him in relation to them.

36. The defendant has never taken any steps to have his name taken off the register, and the first notice of an intended application to apply to the said court for a writ of scire facias was given to the defendant in Sept. 1866.

37. The defendant has acted as a director ever since the passing of the Act, believing himself qualified by the terms on which he consented to become such director.

38. It is agreed between the parties that the court shall be at liberty to draw any inferences or find any facts which in the opinion of the court a jury ought to have drawn or found, and shall make any amendments in the pleadings necessary to raise any of the points involved in this special case.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendant was and is a shareholder in the said company so as to be liable to have the execution prayed issued against him in respect of the said twenty shares numbered 521 to 540. If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative thereof, the verdict is to be entered for the plaintiffs as aforesaid with costs; but if the court should be of the contrary opinion, then a verdict to be entered for the defendant with costs.

The following is a copy of the report mentioned in the 17th paragraph of this case, so far as the same is material.

Report of the directors to be submitted to the proprietors at the half-yearly ordinary general meeting.

24th Aug. 1865.

The directors in presenting the third half-yearly report, &c., &c., &c.

The directors retiring by rotation are J. T. Nash (the defendant) and H. G. Moysey, and, being eligible, they offer themselves for re-election.

The auditors, &c.

(Signed) POLTIMORE, Chairman.

The register of the 28th Feb. 1865, contained the name of J. T. Nash as a holder of twenty shares, without any distinguishing numbers. Amount 500*l*.

In the registers of the 24th Aug. 1865, and the 27th Feb. 1866, the numbers are stated. Amount 500*l*.

The register of the 30th Aug. 1865 states that J. T. Nash is a holder of forty shares, numbered, &c., and that the "amount paid thereon is 500*l*."

The two subsequent registers merely state the name and address, J. T. Nash, name, address, the number of shares, and reference to the ledger folio.

Keane, Q.C. (Bridge with him) for the plaintiffs.—The 28th sect. of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 16) makes the register prima facie evidence against an alleged shareholder in settling the list of contributories. Mr. Nash's name appears on the register for twenty-five shares, upon which nothing has been paid. The question is, does he rebut the prima facie case against him? The company gave him notice that his name had been entered on the register for these shares; and, looking at all the circumstances, the court, judging of this question as a jury would, must come to the conclusion that he assented to this arrangement. If the court comes to this conclusion, the plaintiffs are entitled to the judgment they ask for. He cited

Sir George Honyman, Q. C. (Cohen with him), for the defendant. The plaintiffs are bound to show that at the time when the execution levied by them against the Devon and Somerset Railway Company was found to be ineffectual, the defendant was a holder of unpaid shares in the company (1 Lindley, citing Nixon v. Greene, 11 Ex. 550, and 3 H. & N. 686; Nixon v. Brownlow, 3 H. & N. 686.) The substantial question is whether the defendant was at that time a holder of such shares. Whether he was or not, depends on whether he made any contract with the company to take such shares. The only evidence of any contract between him and the company is to be found in that part of the case which relates to his dealings with Riccard. That, however, has to do only with the paid-up shares. [BRETT, J.—If the Devon and Somerset Railway Company were suing the defendant for calls, and they relied on his dealings with Riccard as evidence of his becoming a shareholder, it would then become competent for the defendant to allege the terms of that contract. But now the question is, whether he has not held himself out to the other contributories and creditors as a shareholder.] It is not sufficient that he is shown to have held himself out to the world as a shareholder; it must be shown that he held himself out to the plaintiff. (See Morris v. Bethell, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 330, and notes to Waugh v. Carver, 1 Smith, L. C., pp. 860.) The fact of his being a director does not make him liable for these shares. [BOVILL, C.J. called attention to the report of the directors, dated 24th Aug. 1865.] He thought the paid-up shares qualified him. As to the notices of calls, the defendant was not bound to answer such applications; he simply treated them as waste paper. He took no notice of them, nor did the company. He was not bound, even when he had notice that his name was on the register of the company as the holder of twenty unpaid shares, to take any steps to have it removed: (1 Lind. 144.) He never made any application for any unpaid shares, nor did he ever receive any letter allotting such shares to him. [BRETT, J. cited 1 Lind. 618, the issue of paid-up shares, otherwise than for full value received is prima facie a breach of trust on the part of the directors, and the company and its creditors are entitled to have such shares treated as not paid-up."] He cited this case, though nothing was done in answer to the application for shares, yet taking all these facts together—that Levita desired to be put on the register, that he must have known that he was liable to be put on it, that he attended and was paid for attending as a director; that he remained for a year or two without making any application to take his name off—his Lordship agreed in the conclusion to which the Vice-Chancellor came, and dismissed the appeal with costs.”

BOVILL, C. J.—The question raised in this case is whether Mr. Nash ever was a shareholder in the Devon and Somerset Railway Company, so as to be liable to them in respect of twenty shares, numbered 521 to 540; which stand in the register in his name. There is no question as to his liability in respect of the paid-up shares. All cases of this kind depend on the special circumstances. There has been a large variety of these cases in Chancery, and judgment has been given in each case on the particular facts. Nevertheless certain principles are clearly laid down. A man cannot be a shareholder without his consent. If application is made for shares and not responded to, the applicant is not a shareholder. Still one case is very little guide to another. It is for us to consider whether the defendant agreed to take shares, and then whether he actually took them. It is thus a question, aye or no, did he assent? The defendant's original agreement with Riccard was for paid-up shares; and if the case rested there, he could not be held responsible. After that agreement was made, the defendant became a director of the company, and as director was bound to have a qualification. He acted for some time as a director and was a party to the report published on the 24th Aug. 1865, in which it is stated, “The directors retiring by rotation are H. G. Moysey, Esq., and J. T. Nash, Esq., and being eligible they offer themselves for re-election.” Nothing could state more clearly that Mr. Nash was then the holder of at least twenty shares, leaving open the description. On his becoming a director he must be taken to have known that no paid-up shares were issued in the first instance. The case states nothing as to the issue of paid-up shares except in paragraph 22, and that relates to the paid-up shares allotted to the contractors for work done; and when we look at the report of 24th Aug. 1865 above mentioned, and the statement that paid-up shares were issued to the contractors, while no mention is made of any other paid-up shares, the defendant must be taken to know that the company had no power to allot paid-up shares to him. It is possible that the defendant relied on Mr. Riccard to protect him. That the defendant assented to become a shareholder there can be no doubt, but what sort of shareholder? He intended, no doubt, to hold paid-up shares; but the question arises whether, after he became aware that the company had no power to allot paid-up shares to him, he did not assent by his conduct as a director to be the holder of unpaid shares. It seems to me that the evidence is overwhelming that the defendant was aware that he was treated by the company as the holder of unpaid shares. In May 1865 there was a call of 5*l*. per share, and a notice was sent to the defendant. That was a distinct intimation that the company regarded him as the holder of unpaid shares. What would have been the conduct of a man in the position of the defendant on such an occasion, who thought that his shares were fully paid-up? If he had been a stranger, it would not have been incumbent on him to take any notice of the application; but we must remember that the defendant was a director of the company. This notice was sent in May; in August of the same year comes the report, in which the defendant is spoken of as eligible to hold the office of director. How could he have been eligible except as the holder of shares? In the meantime he attends the meetings of the directors. In the October of the same year, he receives another notice of call—not an ordinary notice, but a special and unusual one. He says that the company took no notice of his failure to attend to the first notice of call; that, however, is not so, for they sent the letter of Oct. 13th, 1865. I should like to know, what would be the conduct of a man who, believing that he only held paid-up shares, received a notice to pay the allotment money and the first call, and afterwards a second notice, he being at the same time a director, and knowing that he must have some shares as a qualification, and that the company had no power to allot paid-up shares to him? In June 1866 another call of 5*l*. was made, and another notice sent to the defendant, and again the defendant took no notice of it. All this time he was acting as a director, and was present at the meetings of the board. What are we to infer from the defendant's conduct? The Act of Parliament makes the register prima facie evidence. Here the defendant is on the register, and time after time has notice of the fact that he is on the register as the holder of unpaid shares. The defendant was present at the meetings when the register was made up and sealed. He was a director, and was in constant communication with the other directors. If no notice had been given him that he was on the register as the holder of unpaid shares, then the case might have been different; but notice was given him, and he continued to act as a shareholder. Under these circumstances, I can have no hesitation in concluding that Mr. Nash, knowing that the original arrangement with Riccard could not be carried out, was content to act as director, as the actual holder of unpaid shares, thinking it possible that, if matters took an unfortunate turn, Riccard would indemnify him. There is thus an end of the case according to all the authorities, and our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant was at the time of the return to the writ, the holder of twenty unpaid shares in the Devon and Somerset Railway Company, and is therefore liable to the plaintiffs. The court has power to draw inferences of fact. In drawing such inferences, we must conclude that the defendant well knew that he was on the register for twenty unpaid shares, and that he assented to hold them. There is not only abundant but conclusive evidence that he agreed to become a shareholder, on the terms on which his name is on the register. In his original agreement with Riccard, he undoubtedly intended to hold only paid-up shares as a qualification. His name is in the Act of Parliament as a director, and the act specifies the qualification. After the passing of the Act, the register is made up and his name is inserted as the holder of twenty ordinary unpaid shares. He was present at two meetings when the register was sealed. But he was not only an ordinary member, he was a director, and held shares for the purpose of being a director. He was a director not only in name but in fact. He was present at several meetings, and received 50 guineas for fees. On two occasions he received notices of call. This was express notice that he was on the register for shares not paid up. It is monstrous that a director, who has attended all the meetings, and who has received notices of call, should say that he did not know his name was on the register as holder of unpaid shares. I cannot believe such a statement. He must have been well aware of his liability. The present case is distinguishable from that of the Baron de Beville; re the South of France

Company, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 11; 38 L. J. 18, Ch., in which, as to a certain number of shares, the Master of the Rolls held the baron not liable, on the ground that in that case the company had authority to issue paid-up shares, so that the baron could not know that those shares were not paid up. Here it is impossible to conclude that the defendant was ignorant that the company had no power to issue paid-up shares without receiving money or money's worth. As then his name was on the register with his knowledge and assent, that amounted to an implied agreement to take the shares set against his name. This case is not like those that have been cited. Cases of this kind generally resolve themselves into questions of fact, and the decision depends on the particular circumstances. That that is so is illustrated by two cases, in Re The Richmond Hill Hotel Company, Elkington's case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 511, and Pellatt's case, L. Rep. 2 Ch. App. 527, and 16 B. T. Rep. N. S. 442. Both these cases were originally decided by Wood, V.C., and in both it was held by that learned judge, that the applicants were not liable. These decisions were appealed against. The Lords Justices held Elkington liable, but Pellatt not. In giving judgment in the former case, Cairns, L. J. said:—"I regret that I am unable to come to the same conclusion as the Vice-Chancellor, because I cannot avoid thinking that, if Messrs. Elkington had been clearly aware of the consequences of what they were doing, they would have entered into their contract with this company in a different manner. But what we have to deal with are the acts and conduct of Messrs. Elkington, and not the question whether they themselves were aware of the legal consequences of what they were doing." What we have to deal with here are the acts and conduct of the defendant. They are clearly inconsistent with his not being a shareholder, or the holder of only paid-up shares. I cannot conceive how the defendant can say, after having acted as he has, that he did not know of and assent to his name being on the register for these shares. It would be monstrous if he were to be allowed to shirk his liability, and I should be very sorry to lend my aid to such an attempt.

BRETT, J.—It has been clearly made out that no liability rests on the defendant merely by reason of his having been a director, and the defendant is not estopped as against creditors from denying his liability, because, even if he held himself out to the world as the holder of unpaid shares, there is nothing to show that the plaintiffs acted on the faith of his being such a shareholder. It is also clear that the defendant is not liable in this action unless he was a shareholder, and he was not a shareholder unless he entered into a binding contract with the company to become a shareholder and the contract was carried out by the company. And there was no such contract unless there was mutual assent. If the defendant agreed to be bound by one set of terms, and the company by another, there was no contract. Still the defendant was on the register of the company for twenty unpaid shares. Under such circumstances the Act of Parliament throws the burden on him of disproving his liability; and I am not prepared to say that the defendant has shown that he and the company did not assent to the same terms. It seems to me that the defendant at first intended to hold nothing but paid-up shares; but afterwards he found that the company could not assent to his terms, and so he acquiesced in other terms—viz., to hold unpaid shares. He finally agreed to do so, taking his chance that, as he was a director, the company would not enforce payment. Thus I think that both parties assented to the same terms, and if they did so there was a binding contract. Acting on that contract, the company put the defendant's name on the register. On these grounds I think our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Friday, Jan. 21.

PIERCEY (app.) v. MACLEAN (resp.)

Registration—Counting-house—Structural severance—Rating—2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27.

A room or rooms used as a counting-house constitute a "counting-house" within the meaning of 2 Will. 4, c. 45, s. 27, even though in point of construction they form part of a house.

This was a consolidated appeal from the decision of the revising barrister for the city of London, who had decided that the name of the respondent John Maclean and also the names of certain other persons should be on the list of voters for the city. The following was the case stated by the revising barrister.

The said John Maclean (hereinafter called the claimant) claimed to be inserted on the list of voters for the parish of St. Katherine Free Church in respect of a counting-house, situate at and within a house, No. 10, Billiter-street, in the said parish.

The counting-house in respect of which this claim was made consisted of two rooms, forming, together with the landing of the staircase, the entire first floor of the said house.

This house was originally built for a dwelling-house, and in former years had been so occupied; but, in common with many similar houses in the said city, the use of it as a dwelling-house has been abandoned, and the whole of it was let out in separate apartments for business or commercial purposes; and at no time since the 30th July 1868 had the same or any part thereof been used as a dwelling. The landlord, who has a lease of the entire house, underlets the ground floor to a person who occupies it as a grocer's shop; the rest of the house is let out in separate holdings to tenants who occupy them as counting-houses or business offices. No structural alteration has been made in any part of the said house since it was disused as a dwelling-house. The first floor is let to the claimant as tenant from year to year at a yearly rent of 65*l.* under an agreement that the landlord should thereout pay all the rates on behalf of the claimant in respect of the premises occupied by him, the rent being higher than it would have been if the claimant were personally to pay the rates to the collector. This floor consists of two rooms communicating together by an internal door, each of which rooms has a separate outer door to the landing of the staircase which gives access to this floor and the floors above. These doors are the same doors as were attached to the rooms when the house was used as a residence. On the outside of one of these outer doors is painted the name of the claimant. These rooms were occupied and used by him as a counting-house in his trade or business of wine merchant. He alone, and to the exclusion of the landlord, had the keys of the doors that opened on the landing. These rooms were used in manner aforesaid by the said claimant and his clerk during the daytime, and after the business hours the doors on the landing were locked and the keys taken away by him or his clerk. There is an outer door to the house opening on the street which is opened during the day; after business hours this door is closed and secured by a latchlock of which the claimant has a key.

The claimant was rated to all the rates in manner following. Against No. 10. Billiter-street, in the rate-book, the overseers had placed the claimant's name in the occupiers' column, followed by the words "counting-house," immediately below the name of the landlord which was followed by the word "house." The two names were bracketed together and the rateable value, which exceeds 120*l.* and the rate in the pound and the rating of the whole house, including therein the said counting-house, was carried out in the appropriate columns of the rate-book against those names jointly; but no separate value or rating of the counting-house alone was inserted in the rate. There had been no special enactments as to rating in force in this parish. Both the rates and rents had been duly paid and all other requisites not herein specifically mentioned to entitle the claimant to be placed on the list of voters in respect of his occupation of the said counting-house, were duly proved. This claim was objected to on the following grounds:—First, that the tenement in the claimant's occupation was not sufficient in kind to confer a qualification by reason of there being no such structural severance of the rooms, occupied by him as a counting-house, from the rest of the house as to constitute them a counting house within the meaning of the Act to amend the representation of the people in England and Wales, passed in the second year of the reign of His late Majesty King William the Fourth. Secondly, that the claimant was not, as such occupier as aforesaid, an occupier of premises in respect of which he was legally liable to be rated, on the alleged ground that an occupier of part of a house not structurally severed from the rest of the house is not liable to be rated, and, therefore, that the placing of his name by the overseers on the rate-book in manner aforesaid, was no rating of him in respect of the premises he occupied.

The revising barrister disallowed the objections and inserted the claimant's name on the list of voters in respect of his occupation of the said counting-house. Holding, first, that there was a conversion and occupation of the said rooms into and as a counting-house, so as to make them a counting-house within the meaning of the said Act, and that no further structural severance than appears on the facts was necessary to make them a good qualification as a counting-house. Secondly, that the overseers having placed the name of the claimant on the rate-book in manner aforesaid, they had thereby so rated him in respect of the premises he occupied, as to entitle him to be placed on the list of voters as duly rated. Thirdly, he also held, if it was necessary to give a decision on the point, that the claimant was an occupier in respect of the premises he so occupied as aforesaid, and that such joint rating of him and his landlord as aforesaid in respect of the whole house, rated him in respect of the premises he exclusively occupied being part thereof.

The question upon which the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was requested, was whether it was rightly decided that the said respondent and the other persons were entitled to have their names retained or inserted, as the case might be, in the register of voters for the city of London.

Prentice, Q. C. for the appellant. The question here is what is the meaning of the word "counting-house," in sect. 27 of 2 Will. 4, c. 45. It must be a whole house. There is in this case no structural severance as to constitute the two rooms occupied by the respondent a counting-house within the meaning of the statute. The word "house," used in the same section, means prima facie a dwelling-house. Cook v. Humber, K. & G. 418; 31 L. J.

54, C. P.; 11 C. B., N. S., 33; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838, has decided that the word "house" means a whole house, and that part of a house in no case confer the franchise unless there is a complete severance in fact between it and the rest of the house. In construing the words "warehouse" and "counting-house," regard must be had to that decision. The words mean a house used for certain commercial purposes, as distinguished from a "house" properly so called, i.e., a dwelling-house. The same structural severance that is required to constitute a "house" is required to constitute a "warehouse" or a "counting-house." Toms v. Luckett, 5 C. B. 23, and Downing v. Luckett, 5 C. B. 40, appear at first sight in favour of the respondent; but the decision in those cases really turned on the question whether the tenant was an "occupier" or not within the meaning of the section, and the sufficiency of the place occupied to confer a qualification was not in dispute. Whatever doubt may have been raised by these cases has been set at rest by the decision in Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.) If the respondent used these rooms for dwelling purposes, he would have no pretence to a vote. [BOVILL, C. J.—If a counting-house means a whole house, why should it have been mentioned by the Legislature?] To show that a house used for commercial purposes (which is not "a house" within the meaning of the 27th section, that meaning a dwelling-house) may confer a vote. A person who occupies rooms like these for purposes analogous to those for which a counting house is used (as chambers occupied by a barrister or a solicitor or an architect for the purpose of carrying on their profession) does not get a vote.

Wilson v. Roberts, 11 C. B., N. S., 50; 31 L. J. 78, C. P.; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 838.

Cuthbertson v. Butterworth, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 523; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 140; 38 L. J. 98, C. P.

According to the latest decisions, if the landlord lived in this house, he would have a vote as for a whole house (Smith v. Lancaster, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 491; 39 L. J. 38, C. P.); though in reality he would be letting the greatest part of it to sub-tenants, who would be also entitled to vote. Another question arises as to whether the respondent was rated so as to entitle him to vote. As to this question, Wright v. The Town Clerk of Stockport, 5 M. & G. 33, will be cited by the respondent. There is, however, this distinction between that case and the present, that there the claimants were rated for the whole house with their landlord; while here, the claimant purports to be rated for a counting-house, the landlord being rated for the house. He cited also Powell v. Boraston, 18 C. B., N. S., 175; 34 L. J. 73, C. P.

Meadows White for the respondent.—A counting-house need not be a separate building. The words in the Act must be taken in their ordinary and popular sense. Taking them in this way, it is clear that these rooms constitute a counting-house within the meaning of the Act. Who ever heard of a counting-house being a whole building? The present question is one of use and furniture rather than of structure. The question discussed in Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.) was whether a certain building was a house or not; but that question does not arise here. But even if structural severance were needed to constitute a counting-house, there is sufficient severance here within the meaning of the case of Cook v. Humber. [He was here stopped by the court.]

BOVILL, C. J.—As far as we are informed, ever since the year 1882 the occupation of counting-houses similar to the present one has conferred a vote. That practice shows what has been the almost universal opinion as to the meaning of the word "counting-house." If Mr. Prentice had satisfied us that the practice was wrong, it would have been our duty to declare the law and reverse the practice; but I am unable to see that he has given us any grounds for the change. The decisions have varied as to whether a whole house is required, when the claim is made under the words "house or other building," but no decision affects this question to show that a counting-house must comprise a whole house. Since the case of Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.) the words "house or other building" must be construed to mean a whole house; if we take any other view of the section, the words "or other building" might divide a house into a part of a house. It was said that the words "or other building" might include a whole house or part of one, because they came after the words "warehouse, counting-house, or shop;" but it has been rightly held that the words must not extend the meaning of the word "house," so as to make it equivalent to part of a house; because if the word "house" at the beginning of the clause signifies a whole house, then the words "other building" at the end must bear the same signification. This case, however, does not turn on the meaning of the word "house," but on the meaning of the word "counting-house." Now, in the first place, the word counting-house, as commonly understood, means a part of a house. A shop is a part of a house, and a warehouse is generally a part of a house. In this particular case the rooms in question are known as a counting-house, and are used as one. Mr. Prentice, then, has to satisfy us, that what is known and used as a counting-house is not a counting-house within the meaning of the Act. He says it must be a whole house. But a counting-house or a shop is commonly a part of a house, and not the whole. There is no direct decision as to the meaning of these words, "warehouse, counting-house, or shop," but there are many cases in which the judges have expressed their views as to their meaning. In Toms v. Luckett (ubi sup.), which was decided in 1847, Wilde, C. J. (at p. 35 in the Common Bench Reports) says:—"We all well know that the terms 'warehouse, counting-house, shop' import parts of houses devoted to particular purposes of business; and the general words that follow, 'or other building,' must have intended to embrace other separate occupations of distinct portions of a house." The question, then, was whether part of a house, used as a dwelling-house, would confer a vote. Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.) has reversed that decision, but it leaves untouched the view there taken of the meaning of the words, "warehouse, counting-house, or shop." The Chief Justice goes on to say, "The object of the Legislature in introducing these words seems to have been to prevent the discussions that might be expected to arise out of the previous words. I cannot help thinking that the apartments which this party is described as occupying should be held to fall within the words 'other building,' just as much as the words 'warehouse, counting-house, or shop,' are satisfied by the occupation of distinct portions of a house for the purposes before adverted to." There is no doubt, then, as to the opinion of Wilde, C. J. on this question. In Wright v. The Town Clerk of Stockport, 5 M. & G. 33, which was decided in 1843, the question was whether rooms, being portion of a building, could entitle the occupier to a vote. There Tindal, C. J. at page 50, says, "We are of opinion that each of these rooms, held in the manner described in the case, was such a building as to confer the right of voting on its occupier." There, too, the language used seems to show that a shop, warehouse, or counting-house was, in the opinion of Tindal, C. J. equivalent to a part of a house. In Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.), where the question of whole or part of a house was again raised, it was said that the word "house" meant a whole house in the first place, and that therefore the words "other building" at the end could not mean a part of a house. But the only question was as to the meaning of these words, and nothing was said to interfere with the views of Wilde, C. J. and Tindal, C. J. as to the meaning of the words "shop, warehouse, or counting-house." In Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.), Erle, C. J., says at p. 45 of 11 C. B., N. S., "as to the kind of tenements which qualifies, the statute has described two classes of buildings, namely, those used for residential, and those used for commercial purposes—house, for residence—warehouse, counting-house, shop, or other analogous building, for commerce. When the claim is in respect of a house, we consider that the Legislature did not intend to create a part of a house used for residence, and not for commerce, a tenement sufficient to qualify." I should expect to find that if Erle, C. J., had thought that a shop must be the whole building, he would have said something of the sort. So far, however, from his doing so, his language seems to show that this court in his time entertained the contrary opinion. At p. 46 of this same report, the case of Wright v. The Town Clerk of Stockport (ubi sup.) is referred to, and no dissatisfaction is expressed with that decision. The next case is Wilson v. Roberts (ubi sup.), decided in 1861. At p. 50 of the 11 C. B., N. S. report, the court say: "The claimant occupied the first floor, being a part of a house, which part had not become by actual severance an entire house in any sense of the word; and we consider that the qualification fails, because the tenement, the subject of occupation, was not sufficient." That is to say, it was not sufficient as a house. He continues: "It is not stated to be a shop, warehouse, or counting-house. It was not a house, because it was only a part of a house. It was not a building analogous to the others described in the statute, because it was only one part of a building, without any actual severance from the other parts." If rooms are occupied as warehouses, shops, or counting-houses, the case is different. There, however, the claimant could not be said to occupy a house, because he only occupied a part; and his rooms could not fall under the description of shop, warehouse, or counting-house, because they were not used for that purpose. I am of opinion, then, that these words "shop, warehouse, or counting-house," include parts of a house. That is the common meaning of the words. The language seems to me to have been used advisedly to designate a place like that, in respect of which the present claimant claims. As to the rating question: I do not understand Mr. Prentice to insist much upon it, so I merely observe that this case must be governed in this respect by Wright v. The Town Clerk of Stockport.

PIERCEY (app.) v. MACLEAN (resp.)

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The words "counting-house" in the absence of anything in the context to restrain them to any particular sort of counting-house, must be held to include any place that is a counting-house in the largest ordinary sense of the word. This rule has been consistently followed by this court in these cases. Now, in ordinary cases, a counting-house is a part of a house, and it is not necessary to convey the idea of a counting-house, to introduce the circumstance that the whole of the building is devoted to that purpose. There is nothing to prevent the word "counting-house" in its ordinary sense including such a tenement as this. Is there, then, anything in the context to show that the whole house is meant? I will assume that Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.) rightly decided that the word "house" means a whole house. To determine this question about the context, let us look at Cook v. Humber. Reading the section by the light of that case, it is just as though the Legislature had said that every person occupying a whole house, warehouse, counting-house, shop or other building shall have a vote. That is the most favourable way of putting it for the appellants. All that Cook v. Humber decided was that the adjective "whole" must be prefixed to the word "house" in this section. There is, then, I think nothing either in the subject matter or the context, to prevent our regarding a part of a house as a counting-house. A counting-house commonly is a part of a house. In such a case, however, I would not say but that the occupation may be in some sense qualified. I do not speak now of the question whether a "counting-house" must be an entirety in point of building, but of the nature of the occupation. It is conceivable and probable that a person might have what is called a counting-house, or a place of business, without exposure of wares to make it a shop, and that his occupation would give him no more control over or access to the place than a mere lodger would have. I could understand that it might be decided under such circumstances, that such an occupant is nothing more than a lodger. But that applies to the case of a person who has a room in a house, the general control of which is vested in the owner. That exclusion of a mere lodger would necessarily arise from our giving to the words of the Act their plain and ordinary meaning. The same doctrines as to the sufficiency of the occupation might apply to the case of a person having a counting-house, as to a person having a dwelling-house. It is unnecessary, however, to pursue this matter further, as, if there is anything to qualify the claimant's occupation here, that would affect the sort of occupation, and has nothing to do with the question of a whole or part of a house. The claimant in this case is in no sense a lodger. He has as complete control over his counting-house as he could have if it were in point of structure a separate house. The only difference between the two cases is that, in the one case he could get in at night without a latch-key, while here he must use his latch-key in order to get through the outer door. But this door is put up and kept locked, not in order to exclude him, but to exclude improper characters. His occupation, then, is sufficient, and as I think that he occupies what the Legislature must be considered to have contemplated when it used the word "counting-house," the decision of the revising barrister must be affirmed.

REG. v. ELIZA COOK.

BRETT, J.—The question here is whether Mr. Maclean is qualified to be entered on the list of voters for the City of London. The words of the 27th sect. of the Reform Act 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45) are to the effect that the occupier of a "house, warehouse, shop, counting-house, or other building" of a particular value shall be entitled to a vote. There are then two points to be here considered—first, what is the nature of the occupation? secondly, what is the thing occupied? Here the occupation is found to be of such a character as to entitle the occupier to a vote, if the thing occupied be sufficient. The place occupied is alleged to be a counting-house, and the question for us is whether it is a "counting-house" within the meaning of the statute. The facts raise the question, not whether the place is in point of structure sufficient to be a counting-house, but whether it is to be said that it is not a counting-house, because in point of structure it is part of another building. The appellant relies on the decision of this court in the case of Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.), but that case decides only that a part of a house is not sufficient to entitle the occupier to a vote, because the word "house" means a whole house. It is consistent with that decision, that part of a building, if there be sufficient structural severance, may constitute a "house." Flats and chambers are in one sense parts of another building, but, in another sense, they are so contrived as to form separate houses. When Mr. Prentice supposes Cook v. Humber (ubi sup.) to have overruled Toms v. Luckett (ubi sup.), and to have decided that a part of a building can under no circumstances form a qualification, he must think that the court, in deciding Cook v. Humber adopted the doubt expressed by V. Williams, J. in his judgment in Toms v. Luckett. All, however, that the cases decide is that, in the ordinary and popular sense of the word, a part of a house is not a house; but there is nothing to show that a part of a house may not be occupied as a counting-house, merely because it happens to be a part of and not a whole house. If a man occupies a part of a warehouse, i.e., a part let off to him, those decisions show that he would not be entitled to a vote; but they do not go to the length of deciding that if a man occupies a whole warehouse or counting-house, he is to have no vote because the warehouse or counting-house (as the case may be) forms a part of another building. If we were to allow this appeal, we should disfranchise most shopkeepers and whole columns of voters. There is nothing in the authorities to lead us to do that; on the contrary, I think that, if the same mode of decision be applied to this case as to them, the decision of the revising barrister must be upheld.

REG. v. ELIZA COOK.

Concealment of birth—Evidence of.

Although the fact of the prisoner having placed the dead body of her newly-born child in an unlocked box is not of itself sufficient evidence of concealment of birth within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, yet all the attendant circumstances of the case must be taken into consideration, in order to determine whether or not an offence under the above-mentioned section of the statute has been committed.

Indictment for concealment of birth.

The prisoner was in domestic service as a cook. On Dec. 18 she told a fellow-servant that she was suffering from toothache, and would go to bed. She did so, and remained in her room until Dec. 20, but did not lock the bedroom door. The housemaid observed that the prisoner had changed the sheets on her bed, and that those which she removed were stained.

On the morning of Dec. 20 the prisoner was discharged by her master. The housemaid helped her to complete the packing of her box, which was already half filled when the housemaid went to it, but which was not locked. Having finished packing the box, the housemaid locked it, and gave the prisoner the key. The prisoner, with her box, was then sent home to her mother. A short time after her arrival at home the police went to the mother's house, and found the box in the parlour. The prisoner was requested to empty it. She removed some of its contents, and in doing so was seen to take out a bundle and throw it into the mouth of a flour sack behind the door. This bundle contained the dead body of a child.

Motteram for the prosecution.

Young, for the prisoner, contended that there was no evidence of concealment; that merely to abstain from immediately confessing the fact of a birth was not to conceal it. In Reg. v. Sleep, 9 Cox C. C. 559, it was held that the endeavour to conceal the birth of a child by a secret disposition of the dead body within the meaning of the stat. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, must be by putting it into some place where it is not likely to be found; and that placing it in an open box in the prisoner's bedroom, and afterwards, on inquiry by the medical man, informing him that the child was in the box, where it was found, is not a secret disposition within the statute. In the present case the box was left unlocked, and the housemaid had access to it. And in the recent case of Reg. v. Jones, tried at the Gloucester Summer Assizes 1869, M. Smith, J. held that the placing of the dead body of a child in an unlocked box was not of itself sufficient evidence of concealment.

LUSH, J.—That may be so; but then all the attendant circumstances of the case must be taken into consideration.

The learned Judge left the case to the jury, who found the prisoner guilty.

Sentence, two months' imprisonment.

REG. v. FREDERICK JONES.

Manslaughter—Contributory negligence by deceased.

If a man undertakes to drive another in a vehicle, he is bound to exercise proper care in regard to the safety of the man under his charge, and if by culpably negligent driving he causes the death of the other, he will be guilty of manslaughter. But he cannot be found guilty of manslaughter if the deceased himself interfered in the management of the horse, and thereby assisted in bringing about an accident.

Even if the doctrine of contributory negligence applies to criminal cases (as to which point—quære?) yet there is no contributory negligence on the part of anyone in merely getting into a vehicle and allowing himself to be driven, although the driver be perceptibly drunk.

Indictment for manslaughter.

The prisoner drove the deceased (a friend) in a trap to some races. At the races the former became intoxicated, and when his trap was ready to take him and the deceased home, he made several ineffectual attempts to get into it before he succeeded in doing so. The deceased, noticing this, wished to take the reins, but the prisoner said he would drive his own horse, and added that he would drive him (meaning the deceased) "quicker than he was ever driven in his life."

The prisoner whipped the horse and drove off at a furious rate, standing up and flogging the animal first on one side and then on the other. The trap was upset, and the deceased, being thrown out, received the injuries from the effect of which he died.

G. Browne, for the prosecution, opened the facts above set forth.

Young, for the prisoner, submitted that upon the statement of the counsel for the prosecution there was no case. There had been contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. [LUSH, J.—That is not allowed as an excuse in a criminal case.] In Reg. v. Birchall, 4 F. & F. 1087, Willes, J. held that where the deceased has contributed to his death by his own negligence, although there may have been negligence on the part of the prisoner, the latter cannot be convicted of manslaughter, observing that until he saw a decision to the contrary, he should hold that a man was not criminally responsible for negligence for which he would not be responsible in an action. Now in the present case Mr. Wedge, the deceased, had volunteered to get into the trap, although he knew what condition Jones was in, and by so doing contributed to his death by his own negligence.

LUSH, J.—The prisoner undertook to drive the deceased. He must drive carefully, must he not? And if he neglects that duty he is responsible. The case cited is quite at variance with what I have always heard laid down. I cannot see that there is any contributory negligence on the part of any one in merely getting into a trap and allowing himself to be driven.

The witnesses for the prosecution being then called, one of them, Mrs. Cooper, in giving evidence, said that just before the accident she saw the deceased put his hand out; but in her deposition before the coroner she was represented as having said that he put his hand out and caught hold of the rein. She now stated that she did not make that statement before the coroner, and she did not know why the deceased put his hand out.

LUSH, J. (summing up to the jury).—The question for you to consider is, whether the death of Mr. Wedge was caused by the culpable neglect of the prisoner. For my own part I must say that I consider it a matter of law that a man who takes another man into a trap with the intention of driving him is bound to exercise reasonable care both in regard to the safety of the man under his charge and also in regard to the safety of persons whom he may meet in the road. A man cannot claim any indulgence on account of being drunk. If you think the carriage was overturned by the prisoner's culpably negligent driving, and that caused the death of the deceased, you will find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter; but if, on the other hand, you have reason to believe that the deceased himself interfered with the management of the horse you will acquit the prisoner.

Verdict guilty; sentence, one month's imprisonment.

liquidator to substitute the name of N. for S. in the list of contributories, it was Held (affirming the decision of Stuart, V. C.), that the company was entitled to full knowledge of the facts before accepting a transfer, and that as it had not had such knowledge prior to the winding-up, the order asked for must be made; and that, even if S. were now willing to confirm that transfer, that fact would not affect the official liquidator's right.

This was an appeal by Nusserwanjee, a person residing in Bombay, against an order of Stuart, V. C. removing from the list of contributories of the above-named company the name of one Bromley Symons, and substituting for it that of the appellant, under the following circumstances.

In Aug. 1866 the appellant presented to the company for registration a deed duly executed, and in proper form, whereby he purported to transfer into the name of Mr. Bromley Symons, forty shares in the company, which the company, in ignorance of the real fact that Symons was at that time an infant, accepted and registered. In Oct. 1866, a petition to have the company wound-up by the court was presented, and on the 3rd Nov. following the usual order was made. The official liquidator in the first instance inserted the name of Nusserwanjee in the list of contributories, relying on the fact that the transfer to Symons had never been approved by the London directors in compliance with the articles of association, and it continued there until a decision of the Lords Justices in another case that such an omission did not invalidate the transfer. The official liquidator then in Nov. 1868, took out a summons to substitute Symons's name for that of Nusserwanjee, and on the 18th Dec. his Honour varied the list accordingly. Up to this time the official liquidator had remained ignorant of the infancy of Symons at the dates of the transfer and of the commencement of the winding-up, but on discovering this fact after the order last mentioned, he again applied to the court to remove the name of Symons, and insert that of Nusserwanjee, and in the month of Dec. last his Honour made an order to that effect, from which the present appeal was preferred.

In the course of the argument it was alleged that Symons, who attained twenty-one in Jan. 1867, was ready and willing to confirm the transfer and accept the shares.

Karslake, Q. C. and Cottrell supported the appeal, and referred to Dickinson, Q. C., and Kekewich, for the official liquidator, were not called on.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—This is an appeal from an order of Stuart, V. C., directing the name of Bromley Symons to be taken off the list of contributories, and directing the name of this appellant to be put upon the list instead of it. The facts of the case are very simple, and not in dispute. Bromley Symons was an infant at the time of the winding-up; the transfer to him took place in July 1866, the winding-up order was made in Nov. 1866, on a petition presented in Oct. 1866, and Mr. Bromley Symons attained the age of twenty-one on the 12th Jan. 1867. The order was made by the Vice-Chancellor upon the application of the official liquidator; he had nothing to do, and I have nothing to do, with what the relative rights of the appellant and Mr. Bromley Symons may or may not be, nor would it make the slightest difference if I had before me now the evidence, which I have not, of Mr. Bromley Symons' confirmation of all that has been done. I take the Vice-Chancellor, with reference to the facts both of Costello's case and of this case, to have been perfectly accurate in what he said, namely, that the commencement of the winding-up is the period which fixes the status of the contributory. I have no doubt that he said that with reference to Curtis's case and the other cases of that class, and the principle is as simple as possible, that a man who executes a transfer of shares in a company remains liable, unless and until there is on the list a transferee who is legally liable to the company, and you take, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the transferor has or has not placed on the register such a transferee, the date of the winding-up.

If you try this case, the utmost that is said now is, not that the liquidator has consented to any confirmation, or is bound by any confirmation, but that Mr Bromley Symons himself either has confirmed, or will confirm, the transfer. But, stopping there for a moment, suppose you had this state of things; suppose you had this company still in existence, and the appellant, together with Bromley Symons, had sent this transfer to this company, they not knowing that Bromley Symons was an infant at the date when that transfer was sent to them; as a matter of course, when they first knew that Mr Bromley Symons was an infant, if they had sent to the transferor, and said, "We shall apply to put your name on the list, and to take Mr Bromley Symons' name off," they would have been entitled to do that, and upon a motion could have put the one name in the place of the other, for this simple reason, that it requires two things to make such a transfer valid, not only the confirmation of Mr Bromley Symons, but the acceptance of that confirmation, either implied or actual, on the part of the company. When you examine the facts here, there has been no acceptance by the official liquidator, and nothing done by the official liquidator which precludes him from saying that Mr Bromley Symons never was a proper transferee, and that the person who purports to have transferred to him ought to be on the list of contributories in his place. The only fact that is stated to the contrary of that is this order which was made on 18th Dec. 1868. That order was made at a time when the parties who were parties to the making of it knew nothing of the infancy of Bromley Symons. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that it was open to the official liquidator to say whether he would or would not accept the confirmation by Bromley Symons. Bromley Symons's confirmation of it without that acceptance is just so much waste paper, and it is clear, upon the authority of Curtis's case and others, that the appellant ought to be on the list, the official liquidator desiring it, and that Mr Bromley Symons's name ought not. The appeal therefore must be dismissed with costs.

Re THE COMMERCIAL BANK CORPORATION OF INDIA AND THE EAST;
FERNANDEZ'S CASE.

Winding-up—Creditor domiciled abroad—Death of creditor—Foreign probate—Dividends on debt—English probate.

F., domiciled at Bombay, died there, being then a creditor of the above-named bank, which was incorporated by Royal Charter for the purpose of carrying on business in London, Bombay, and other places in India and the East. The company was ordered to be wound-up, and a first dividend was paid to F. in his lifetime. His will was proved in India only, and his executors claimed a second dividend, which became payable after his death. The Master of the Rolls decided that the dividend ought to be paid to the executors without requiring them to take out an English probate; but upon appeal

This decision was reversed, and payment was ordered only upon production of an English probate.

This was an appeal by the Attorney-General against a decision of the Master of the Rolls, that a dividend payable out of the assets of the company above-named (which is now being wound-up) to the Indian executors of a creditor whose domicile had been in India, might properly be paid to him without requiring probate of the will to be taken out in England.

The hearing before the Master of the Rolls is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 575.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C. and W. W. Karlake supported the appeal.

Tyler v. Bell, 2 Myl. & Cr. 89.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q. C. and Kekewich, for the official liquidator, took no part in the argument.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice GIFFARD said:—There seems unfortunately before the Master of the Rolls to have been a mistake, it being supposed that this was an Indian company. Beyond all doubt, when the charter is looked at, it is, to all intents and purposes, an English company. The gentleman whose estate is now represented by the parties stated to be his Indian executors, was domiciled abroad; he proved here, and he obtained payment of one dividend here. After that he died, and the state of things upon which I have to give a decision is this: The official liquidator, who is, to all intents and purposes, the officer of the court, desires the direction of the court as to whether he can or not safely pay this money to those persons who have obtained no probate in this country. I take it first of all that, under these circumstances, one can only look upon this proceeding as a judicial proceeding, and I take it the officer of the court has no right to act upon any other evidence than such as the court would itself act upon; and beyond all question the court itself would only act on letters of administration in this country. But the matter goes much further than that, because the Act of Parliament (55 Geo. 3, c. 184) says distinctly that no person is to administer, under a penalty, without first proving and paying certain duties. Well, probate duty, as we all know, attaches on bona notabilia in the place where the goods happen to be situated, irrespective of the question of domicile altogether. Beyond all doubt and question, those goods are bona notabilia in London. There can be no doubt about that, and I have no hesitation in saying that this court cannot, by any means, authorise the payment to a person who really, if he did receive this money and administer it, would be going directly in the teeth of the Act of Parliament, and doing a thing for which, not the person who pays, but the person who receives and administers, if the Crown chooses to proceed against him, would unquestionably be liable to a penalty.

Upon these grounds, I must say that there must be payment only upon production of an English probate. There is no doubt, as Mr. Bagshawe said, that it is a matter of first principle that no court in this kingdom can look at anything under any circumstances, but the proper probate. The costs of all parties ought to be borne by the estate of the company.

After this he executed and registered a deed of composition with his creditors, in the schedule to which the official liquidator was included for the utmost amount that could by possibility be called up on his shares, which was very much below the debt due to him; and as soon as he was settled on the list of contributories he tendered the amount of the composition in respect of all possible calls. *Stuart, V. Greene, Q. C. (with whom was Brooksbank) said that he felt, after the recent decision of his Lordship in Mitchell and Aspinall's case, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 188, that he could not contend that the amount due for calls was not proveable under the composition-deed; and that being so, that the case Re Duckworth applied, and entitled the contributory to set-off the calls due from him against the debt due to him.

Lord Justice GIFFARD thought that Duckworth's case concluded the whole matter, and that it was of no consequence that that authority and the present case differed in this, that here there was more due from the company than from the contributory, while the case was the reverse in Re Duckworth. In the case of bankruptcy the 101st section of the Companies Act did not apply as it did where there was no bankruptcy (Grissell's case, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 528; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843), and therefore the parties were left to the mutual credit clauses of the Bankrupt Law Consolidation Act 1849. A dividend would, therefore, be paid to Mr. Strang on the balance of the debt after deducting the calls, and the balance order against Mr. Mackreth would be discharged. The official liquidator would have all his costs in the court below and here; but the appellants could only have out of the estate their costs before the Vice-Chancellor.

Practice—Costs—Petition for payment of dividends—Trustee Relief Act—Costs of trustee—Income and corpus.

On a petition by a tenant for life for payment of the dividends of a fund paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act:

Held, that the costs of the trustee must be paid out of the income, and not out of the corpus.

This was a petition by the tenant for life of a fund which had been paid into court under the Trustee Relief Act, for payment of the income of the fund. The only question which arose was whether the costs of the trustee were to be paid out of the corpus or out of the income.

Lawson, for the petitioner, stated that there were conflicting decisions on this question; it had been held by Vice-Chancellor Malins in Re Gordon's Trusts, L. Rep. 6 Eq. 335, that trustee's costs of appearing on a petition for payment of dividends were payable out of the corpus, while it had been held by Vice-Chancellor James in Re Whitton's Trusts, L. Rep. 8 Eq. 352, that they were payable out of the income.

H. S. Leeson appeared for the respondents.

Lord ROMILLY.—I have always followed the rule as laid down by Vice-Chancellor James in Re Whitton's Trusts (supra); and the trustee's costs of appearing on this petition must therefore be paid out of the income of the fund.

Company—Shares—Stock Exchange—Purchase of shares by person resident abroad—Refusal of vendor to execute transfer—Suit to enforce contract.

A broker purchased on the Stock Exchange, from J.'s broker, certain not fully paid-up shares in a joint-stock company, at a sum to be paid on the next settling day. The purchasing broker gave as his principal the name of G., a foreigner domiciled abroad; but J. refused to transfer the shares to G., on the ground that he was domiciled abroad, and had no property in this country to meet any liability which might accrue in respect of the shares.

On a bill by G. to enforce the transfer:

Held, that there was an implied contract between the brokers that the purchasing broker would furnish to the seller the name of a responsible transferee; that a foreigner domiciled abroad was not such a responsible transferee, and that, therefore, J. was not bound to execute a transfer of the shares to him.

Bill accordingly dismissed with costs.

This was a suit by one Goldschmidt, who was a foreigner, resident at Stuttgart, to compel a vendor to execute a transfer to him of certain shares which he had purchased, through his broker, on the Stock Exchange.

The shares in question were 100 shares in the Land Mortgage Bank of India (Limited), which the defendants, who were the executors of the will of Jenkin Jones deceased, sold through their brokers, Messrs. Bingham and Cullen, to Mr. A. Petre, the plaintiff's broker. They were 20½ shares, on which only 4½ had been paid. Before the settling day Bingham and Cullen informed the plaintiff's broker that the defendants objected to transfer the shares to the plaintiff, on the ground that he was resident abroad, and that he had no property in this country to meet any liability upon the shares.

The case was submitted to the committee of the Stock Exchange, who decided by a majority of thirteen to eight that the defendants were not, under the circumstances, bound to complete the contract.

The plaintiff thereupon filed the present bill to compel the defendants to execute the transfer, alleging that, by the custom of the Stock Exchange, they were not entitled to refuse to accept his name on the ground of his being resident abroad; and in support of the allegation, the evidence of the deputy chairman of the committee of the Stock Exchange was produced, who deposed that purchases of shares were often made by foreigners on the Stock Exchange, and that he had never known the objection raised in this case to be sanctioned by the committee before.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and F. Harrison, for the plaintiff.

Jessel, Q.C., and Speed, for the defendants, were not called upon.

March 8.—Lord ROMILLY.—Mr. Jessel, I shall not call upon you; but I think it desirable that I should explain what I understand to be the principle involved in these cases, because they are cases of very considerable importance. In the first place, I have always considered that when persons go and buy or sell shares on the Stock Exchange, they enter into an implied contract to buy and sell according to the practice and custom of the Stock Exchange, and that accordingly they are bound by that practice and custom. I have always so held in former cases. The practice of the Stock Exchange, as is stated here, and as has been stated on former occasions, amounts to this, that the seller's broker enters into a contract with the buyer's broker, and they do not disclose the names of the seller and buyer until the settling day, and either of the brokers is liable to complete the contract himself. Each of them enters into an implied contract with the other. The seller enters into an implied contract that he has got the shares to deliver upon a particular day, and the buyer enters into an implied contract that he has a proper and responsible name to give to the other at that time as the buyer of the shares. That I take to be the meaning of it. It is quite clear that that is necessarily implied. The only question is, what is to be considered a proper and responsible and bonâ fide name. It is quite clear that if the broker of the buyer gave in the name of the chief of an Indian tribe, the broker of the seller would not be bound to accept that; or if he gave him the name of a lunatic in a lunatic asylum, he would not be bound to accept that, or if he gave him the name of an infant in arms he would not be bound to accept that. The only question is, whether he is bound to accept the name of a gentleman residing abroad, having no property in this country; is he bound to accept the name of a foreigner domiciled abroad? For that purpose the nature and quality of the thing sold must be taken into consideration. If it were Consols, I take it he would be bound to accept such a name. For the person who sells the Consols incurs no species of liability or risk by transferring 1000*l.* consols, which he sells, into the name of the person who buys it. But the moment the shares dealt with are those of a joint-stock company with a liability the matter becomes very different. Take this particular case: the seller's broker sells 100 shares, of which the amount is 20*l.* upon each share; 4*l.* per share has been paid up, and therefore he is liable to 16*l.* per share, or 1600*l.* on the whole 100 shares, which he sells for 10*s.* a share. To be sure, this court, as all the Courts of Chancery usually do, in the cases which come before it, decides only upon the facts; but it is not a strange thing to urge in the Court of Chancery, that it is not unlikely that a shareholder may be called upon to contribute the full amount of his shares, particularly when the shares sell for something like 10*s.* a share. In the present case the sellers are executors. They are entitled to say, "We must be saved perfectly harmless, for what is our security?" Suppose that the company is wound-up and the old shareholders are called upon to pay, which they may be if the present shareholders are unable to pay the debts, what security is there to them? I should have thought that the security would have been very inadequate, and that the seller would have been entitled to call upon the purchaser to give him some better security than the mere transfer of the shares into his name. I hold this also, that the practice of the Stock Exchange is regulated, unquestionably, by their own rules, with this limitation, that, like every other custom and every other practice, they must be reasonable and such as would bear the examination of a court of common law. The committee of the Stock Exchange examined and considered this case, and they came to the conclusion confirmed by a subsequent meeting by a very considerable majority (13 to 8) that in this case the defendant, or rather the defendant's brokers, were not bound to accept the plaintiff as the name given by the plaintiff's brokers. I think that is a reasonable conclusion to come to. I do not go into the question which appears to me to be an unreasonable one, as far as it was stated to me, whether a man who wants to get security that he will not be called upon hereafter in respect of the shares which he sells, must enter into a special contract for some particular species of guarantee, the effect of which would be to diminish the price paid for the shares in the market. Unquestionably the executors are bound to sell for the highest price they can get. They have no personal interest in the matter. I am of opinion that the person who buys shares from a broker enters into what, I repeat again, is an implied contract that there shall be a complete sale, which shall completely exonerate the vendor by giving him a name which will afford him that security. I do not think that in the case the purchaser's broker has done so, and therefore I cannot make any decree upon this bill. In one or two of the letters Mr. Petre is mentioned as the person who is liable. If I am right in my view of the case Mr. Petre is not at all liable, but he was bound to procure a name which should be a complete and undoubted security to the defendants. That he has not done. I regret also that this bill should have been filed, because I should have thought, as I mentioned to Mr. Harrison at the beginning of his argument, that the matter might have been simply cured by the plaintiff getting some responsible person in this country to join in a covenant with him to secure the vendors against any liability in respect of these shares. But as the matter stands, I am simply unable to make any decree, and therefore I must dismiss the bill with costs.

Legacy duty—Legacy free of duty—"Clear income or sum."

*A testator gave his residuary personal estate to his executors upon trust out of a certain part thereof to set apart and appropriate so much as would produce the clear income or sum of 100*l.* a year, and pay such income or yearly sum to a named charity:*

Held, that the legacy was given free of legacy duty.

Banks v. Braithwaite, 32 L. J. 45, Ch., considered.

This was a petition under the Trustee Relief Act.

The Rev. Thomas Cole had by his will given his residuary personal estate to his executors upon trust out of part thereof to set apart and appropriate so much as would produce the clear income or sum of 100*l.* a year, and pay such income or yearly sum to the Widows and Orphans Society at Lincoln.

There was a dispute between two institutions as to who were entitled to this bequest, and there was a further question as to whether the legacy was given free of legacy duty.

Pearson, Q. C. and Everitt, for the petitioners, who were one of the claimant institutions, maintained that a gift of a "clear annuity" by will was the gift of an annuity free from legacy duty. They cited from duty, and in this case the testator has in effect given a clear yearly sum of 100*l.* to this charity. In Banks v. Braithwaite (sup.) there was a direction to retain so much stock as should be sufficient to realise the clear yearly income of 150*l.*, and to pay, not an annuity, but the dividends of the stock. Here the direction is to pay such income or yearly sum, that is to say, the clear income or yearly sum of 100*l.* Whether Banks v. Braithwaite is consistent with Haynes v. Haynes (sup.), it is unnecessary for me to consider; I am bound to follow the latter, which is the decision of the Court of Appeal, and in the good sense of which, moreover, I entirely concur. I think that decision governs the present case, and I am therefore of opinion that this legacy was given free of duty.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL v. THE MERCERS COMPANY.

Charity—Saint Paul's School—Endowment of—Claim of trustees to be beneficial owners subject to endowment—Costs.

Where a charity had been in the undisputed enjoyment of property as beneficiaries for a long period of time, and during that time the persons in whom the legal estate was vested, by various acts and declarations, acknowledged the title of the charity as beneficial owners thereof:

Held, that the parties in whom the legal estate was vested were estopped from setting up a title in themselves as beneficial owners of the estates adverse to the charity.

In a suit against trustees to compel an exchange of charity lands, which they defended, not as trustees, but as beneficial owners thereof:

Held, that as they defended the suit as beneficial owners of the estates, they were not entitled to throw the costs of such suit on the charity estates, but that they (the trustees) were liable for the amount of the costs thereby incurred.

This suit was on the information of the Attorney-General, and was for the purpose of determining whether certain property held by the Mercers Company, and derived from Dean Colet, was held by them as trustees for St. Paul's school, or whether they were the owners of the estates subject to the charge of maintaining the school. The original instruments of the endowment of this charity were supposed to have perished in the great fire of London in the year 1665, but evidence of their contents was afforded by an ancient book in the defendant's possession, entitled "Evidences of Dean Colet's Lands," and having a preface, purporting to be written by Dean Colet, authenticating its contents. In this book was set forth the supplication of Dean Colet to King Henry VIII., praying him to grant a licence to some corporate body to hold lands for the endowment of St. Paul's school founded by him. The supplication, after stating the objects of the charity, proceeds to state that he (Dean Colet) "intendeth to geve and mortyse landies and tene-mentis of the clere yerely value of fifty and three poundis in the countie of Buk to som body corporat." Letters patent were granted to the Mercers Company to hold lands to the value of 53*l.* per annum to them and their successors.

Dean Colet, in pursuance of these letters patent conveyed certain lands to the Mercers' Company, for the endowment of St. Paul's School. The first of these conveyances was dated 12th July 1511, whereby John Colet, D.D., and Dean of St. Paul's, granted and confirmed to the wardens and commonalty of the mystery of mercery of the city of London certain estates in the county of Bucks, amounting in the whole to 1995 acres of land, to hold to the said company and their successors for ever for the continuation of a certain school in the churchyard of the church of St. Paul, for the instructing of boys in the said school in good manners and literature, and for the sustentation of one master and one usher or two ushers of the same, and for other necessary things to be done therein, according to the ordinance by him the said John Colet, his heirs, or executors thereafter to be made.

It appeared from various records of the company that Dean Colet delivered possession to the company of the Buckinghamshire property comprised in the grant of the 12th July 1511, thereby constituting the company (as alleged) trustees for the school of that property; and from that time until the death of Dean Colet in 1519, he and the company jointly superintended the school and its accounts and property including certain property conveyed by Dean Colet to the company, subsequently to the above-mentioned grant.

The before-mentioned book sets forth a deed made between the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's and the Mercers' Company, dated 6th Sept. 3rd Henry VIII., whereby the Dean and Chapter granted to the company a piece of vacant land at the east end of the chapel of St. Dunstan of the church of St. Paul, containing in length 21ft. of assize, and in breadth 9ft. of assize, to hold for ninety-nine years, at the rent of a red rose, renewable at the end of every ninety-nine years for ever. The defendants alleged that they did not know what had become of this property, but the information charged that the same was part of the school endowment, and that the company were bound to show what property now represented this piece of land, and that such property was now in their possession as trustees for the school, or else that they must account to the school for the value of it.

The next important conveyance made by Dean Colet to the company was of land, with certain buildings thereon, near the church of Stebunhith or Stepney, and certain other lands in the manor of Stepney, amounting altogether to seventy-five acres of land. These lands were surrendered to the lord of the manor of Stebunhith to the use of the Company of Mercers, for the endowment of St. Paul's School. This property was afterwards enfranchised by Lord Wentworth, the then lord of the manor of Stebunhith, and the land was conveyed to the company in fee-simple.

In the 8th year of Henry VIII., Dean Colet conveyed certain other estates in Cambridgeshire and Essex to the Mercers' Company for the benefit of the school.

Dean Colet, by his will dated 10th June 1514 devised to the Mercers' Company certain property in the city of London, "and also his grammar school and the chapel founded with the same, together with the house for the master and other offices of the same school lately built by him, lying near the wall of the churchyard of Saint Paul's, London, at the east part thereof, and all that his grammar house or messuage lately called Paul's school, and four shops under the same house, . . . to hold to the said company and their successors for ever for the continuation of the aforesaid grammar school in the churchyard of the said cathedral church of Saint Paul, constructed for boys, in the same school to be taught good manners and literature, and for the sustentation of one master and one usher or two ushers of the said school, and for the other works, uses, and intentions contained and specified, or to be contained and specified, in certain indentures between the aforesaid wardens and commonalty of the one part, and him the aforesaid John Colet of the other part."

Dean Colet made certain ordinances containing directions as to the management of the school, the duties of the masters, and the instruction of the children. Under the title of "The Mercers' Charge," the ordinances provided that the Mercers' Company should have the care, charge, and governance of the school, and should choose out of their company two surveyors to take charge of the school for the year, and oversee and receive all the lands of the school, and see them repaired from time to time by their officers. After various other directions the ordinances proceed as follows:

And albe my mynde is that they shall have this surplussage for thentent abouesaide, yet neuthelasse I will the saide surplussage as much as shall be sparid of it above repacions and casuelties at any acompt be brought and put in a cofer of iren, geuyn of me to the Mercery, standing in theyr hall, and ther frome yere to yere remayne aparte by itself, that it may appere how the scole by ye owne self manteyneth itself and at length ou and above the owne lyvelod yf the saide scole shall grow to eny ferther charge to the Mercery that than also that may appere to the laude, and prayse, and merite of the said fellowship.

From the death of Dean Colet in 1519, down to the present time, the accounts of the school estates, and the records of all proceedings of the company relating thereto showed that the estates had always been dealt with as belonging exclusively to the charitable purpose declared by the founder, and that the company had never claimed (until 1860) any beneficial interest therein. The surplus on the whole account in each year was directed, by resolutions of the company, to be placed in the iron coffer or treasury of the school standing in the hall, "there to remain according to the ordinance of the founder."

Money was occasionally taken out of the school coffer by the company, but they always professed to restore it to the school.

In 1570 the copyhold lands in Stepney and Whitechapel, belonging to the charity were seized by Lord Wentworth, the lord of the manor, on the ground that a forfeiture had been incurred; afterwards Lord Wentworth agreed, in consideration of 200*l.*, to convey and enfranchise all the estates in question to the use of the school. Accordingly, by a deed of bargain and sale dated the 28th Nov. in the thirteenth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, Lord Wentworth bargained and sold to Sir Thomas Graham and other members of the Mercers' Company, the above mentioned property in Stepney and Whitechapel, to hold the same to the intent, nevertheless that they should convey and assure the same to the wardens and commonalty of the Mystery of Mercers of the city of London, and their successors, for ever towards or for the maintenance and continuance of the said school for ever.

The conveyance to the company of the above-mentioned lands was executed on the 20th Dec. 1576, and the lands are still held by the company.

In 1580 informations were exhibited against the company for having in their possession lands supposed to have been forfeited to the Crown, under the Act for the dissolution of monasteries, but on payment of a sum of money the company obtained a re-grant of the lands from Queen Elizabeth, to hold the same unto the company in as full and ample manner and form as the same had been held by the company prior to the passing of the said Act.

In 1592 John Harrison, who was then the master of the school, and others, exhibited articles before the Archbishop of Canterbury, complaining of various abuses—among others, that whilst the rents of the estates had greatly increased, the salaries of the masters had not been increased, and that the company claimed the surplus for their own. The company, by their answer, admitted that "such overplus as falleth out from time to time is kept in their hall in good safety, in which place the founder appointed it to be kept; and the same belongeth to the company by the special gift and appointment of the said founder." In 1598 a bill was filed in Chancery by John Harrison, high master, and Richard Smith and Francis Herring, submasters of St. Paul's School, "as well for and in the behalf of themselves as for the maintenance and benefit of the same school," against the warden and seven other members of the company. Amongst other charges they expressly charge that the company were trustees of the entire revenues, and of all surpluses accruing therefrom for the benefit of the school. The company, by their answer, admitted that they were trustees of the entire revenues of the school, and asserted that they had never derived any individual or private benefit therefrom; they also admitted that there was a very considerable surplus or "rest," which had accumulated out of the revenues of the school, and protested that whatever its amount it was kept safe, and was and should be always ready to be employed for the benefit of the school as occasion should require. An account was taken by the order of the court of the rents and profits which had come to the hands of the company and the surveyor of the school; and ultimately the bill was dismissed for want of prosecution.

On the 5th Feb. 1604 the surveyors and wardens and certain other members of the company, were appointed a committee, "forthwith to call to account the true estate of St. Paul's School, and with the 'rest' (or surplus), thereupon remaining, to found fellowships and scholarships, or employ the same, or the greatest part thereof, in exhibitions, to the poor scholars of the school, according to the true intent and meaning of the founders' statutes."

In 1631 a part of the accumulated surplus of the school property, was laid out in the purchase of an estate at Lurgershall, in the county of Bucks, which was conveyed to the company in trust for the school.

The school and the buildings connected with it were destroyed in the great fire of London, and were rebuilt by the company with moneys, which were repaid to them by and out of moneys and funds held in trust for the school.

The company purchased other lands with the surplus rents and profits of the charity estates, and these lands were conveyed to the company, or to persons nominated by them as trustees for the charity.

In the year 1745 there was a debt owing from the company to the school estate, of 34,637*l.* 15*s.*, incurred by the application of the surplus income of the trust estates, to the discharge of debts and annuities to which the company had become liable. With this debt the company charged themselves. In the year 1808 a sum of 5000*l.* was invested in the 3*l.* per cent. reduced annuities in part payment of this debt, and in Feb. 1804 it was resolved that on the 1st March and 21st Sept. in every year 1000*l.* should be invested in the funds, for the use of the school, till the whole debt should be liquidated.

In 1818 an Act of Parliament (58 Geo. 3, c. 22.) was passed intituled "An Act to enable the trustees of Saint Paul's School, in the city of London, to purchase buildings and land adjoining, or near to the said school, for the better accommodation of the scholars; and for other purposes."

By the report of the Charity Commissioners made in the year 1820, under the authority of Parliament, relating to St. Paul's School, the real and personal estate, of which the company was then seised and possessed in trust for the school, was described and set forth, and the company were described and returned as trustees of the estates for the school. The officers of the company were examined, and gave evidence under the commission, and the company did not on that occasion dispute that they were trustees of the estates and of the whole income thereof for the benefit of the school.

The report also stated that the school enjoyed a valuable benefaction for the establishment of exhibitions at the University of Cambridge, under the will of Viscount Campden. It also contained an account of the application of the income of the management of the estates and of the school, the number of the children to be taught, and the regulations respecting them.

In 1859 and 1860 negotiations took place between the company and Baron Rothschild with reference to a proposed exchange of some of the lands belonging to the charity in Buckinghamshire, being part of the original endowment of the school. Some correspondence took place with the Charity Commissioners in reference to the proposed exchange, and the company at first treated themselves as trustees of the estates for the school, but afterwards set up a claim to be entitled to the estates forming the charity property, not as trustees, but for the proper benefit of the company, subject to a yearly charge of 80*l.* 5*s.* only for the school.

On the 19th May, 1860, an information and bill was filed in the name of the Attorney-General at the relation of Baron Rothschild as plaintiff against the company and certain officers thereof for the purpose of having the proposed exchange carried out; and in the answer of the company they claimed to be absolutely entitled in their own right, and not as trustees, to all the income of the hereditaments conveyed to them by Dean Colet that was not required for the charges to be paid thereout, amounting to the yearly sum of 80*l.* 5*s.* This information and bill was dismissed without costs on the ground that the relator and plaintiff had been largely misled by the company in the matter of the contract for the proposed exchange, and particularly by the claim they set up by their answer as above-mentioned. The company claimed to charge the estates of the school with the whole of their costs of that suit, amounting to 4000*l.*; but the informant submitted that the charity would not properly be charged with the costs so incurred by the company.

The company have from time to time since 1804, down to the present time, under the provisions of several Acts of Parliament, and particularly under the Acts of 45 Geo. 3, c. 49, and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 75, obtained a return or allowance of income or property tax on the full amount of the rents and profits of the charity estates, on the ground that they were vested in the company as trustees of the school only.

The company, from the foundation of the charity down to the year 1860 (with the exception of a short interval), had always kept the accounts of the revenues of the charity estates separate and distinct from those of their general estates, and had regularly made returns to the Charity Commissioners of the whole rents and profits and revenues of the estates held in trust for the school, and they never refused or omitted to make such returns until 1860, when, in consequence of their having made the above-mentioned claim, they refused, and alleged that they were not liable to render any accounts to the Charity Commissioners.

The bill then prayed that the company might be declared to be merely trustees of the lands conveyed to them by Dean Colet and others, for the use and benefit of St. Paul's School. That an account should be taken of the property and revenues of the charity. That the charity should not be chargeable with the costs of the suit with Baron Rothschild, and that a scheme should be directed for the future regulation of the school.

G. Jessel, Q. C., J. Wickens, and F. V. Hawkins appeared in support of the information.

R. Palmer appeared for G. Palmer, one of the defendants.

E. E. Kay, Q. C., A. S. Eddis, Q. C., and G. N. Colt appeared for the Mercers' Company, and contended that the company were the owners of the estates, subject only to a charge for the maintenance of the school. The company never admitted that they were trustees, and even if they had it was done through mistake as to their own real title, which could not now prejudice their rights as beneficial owners, subject to the before-mentioned charge. This was evident from certain negotiations which took place between Dean Colet and the company before he conveyed and demised the estates to them. There was also an arrangement between the company and the Dean in the following terms:—"Moreover, the said Master Dean showed unto the said company that for such labour and business as they and their successors should have in ordering of the said school, that they should have in this city of London, upon the payment of 44 marks by yere in rents." No trace of any conveyance of these lands could be found, therefore the assumption must be that the company were to have the surplus, arising from the rents and profits of the lands actually conveyed for their own use. The company did, not for the first time, in 1860, claim to be the beneficial owners and not merely the trustees of the estates. They claimed to be so entitled in 1519. The whole course of their dealings with the property was quite consistent with their being the beneficial owners of it.

Attorney-General v. Grocers' Company, 6 Beav. 526;

Attorney-General v. Mayor of Bristol, 2 J. & W. 294.

Jessel, Q. C., was not heard in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said: This case has come before the court under circumstances which, so far as I know, are altogether unprecedented. This is not a case in which after a long course of dealing with trust property as if it were his own, a trustee has been called upon to account, and to have the trust enforced against him. On the contrary, the school of St. Paul has been in the undisputed enjoyment as beneficiaries of the property given by Dean Colet from 1520 until the present time, when the persons in whom the legal estate was vested came forward and said that they were entitled to the property, not as trustees, but as beneficial owners, subject to a charge in favour of the school. It would, indeed, be extraordinary if the lapse of nearly 350 years was not conclusive against the assertion of any such claim, and this court would be bound to assume that the long enjoyment by the school as beneficiaries was entirely opposed to it. In this case there has not only been enjoyment by the school for 350 years, but the company has during that time acknowledged the title of the school as beneficial owners of the property in a variety of ways. They did so in an application for an Act of Parliament. They did so in certain proceedings in Chancery in Queen Elizabeth's time; they did so in 1804, when being called upon to replace 84,000*l.* which had been taken by them in 1741, out of the revenues of the school property, they acknowledged that the money was money of the school, and entered into an arrangement by which they were allowed to replace this sum by instalments. This was a most important fact in the case. Assuming that it was property of the school that had been taken, the school was entitled to recover it with interest from the trustees, and upon this footing of the property being the property of the school, the trustees did replace it with interest. After this it would be very difficult for them to say that all this was done in mistake, and that the property is their own and does not belong to the school. In addition to this, during the late war a remission was obtained from the income-tax commissioners on the grounds that the property on which the tax had been paid was all charity property. Again all accounts were made out on the footing of the property being property belonging to the school. Then there are the proceedings taken by Harrison the master first of all before the Archbishop of Canterbury, complaining of the insufficiency of the salaries of the masters and also of divers abuses in the administration of the revenues of the school. In what capacity the archbishop was invoked does not clearly appear, but probably as in some way exercising a visitatorial jurisdiction. However this may have been the archbishop entertained the articles, and called upon the company to answer them. In their answer to the articles the company claimed the property as their own. The proceedings before the archbishop came to nothing, and then Harrison was minded to come to this court some two or three years later. By their answer to Harrison's suit the company having, as it seems, inadvertently claimed this property as their own in the proceedings before the archbishop, withdrew all claim to it in this court. In 1860 the question arose in a very singular way between the company and Baron Rothschild in the proceedings which resulted from an attempted exchange of lands between them. In the course of those proceedings the company claimed to be entitled to the Colet estates, not as trustees, but for their own benefit, subject to the charge of continuing and maintaining St. Paul's School. It has been argued on behalf of the company that reading the ordinances of Dean Colet by the light of some very modern cases, they were entitled to the surplus for their own benefit. Upon the face of the deeds, as contained in the ancient Book of Evidences, there was nothing indicating any intention to give a bounty to the company. The object for which the property was given was simply and solely "the continuation of a school in the churchyard of St. Paul's for the instructing of boys in the school in good manners and literature, and the sustentation of one master and one usher, or two ushers of the same, and for other necessary things to be done therein, according to the ordinance by him, the said John Colet thereafter to be made." It has been pressed upon me on the one hand, that the deeds are to be interpreted by the ordinances, and on the other that the ordinances do not and cannot affect the trusts of the deeds. Assuming, in favour of the defendants, that the ordinances are to be read as part of the original grant, one comes to these words: "The overplus of money, all charges doon, . . . I trooly geve to the fellowship of the mercery, to the mayntayning and supporting and repaying of all that longith to the scole from tyme to tyme." If the ordinance had stopped here, there would, no doubt, have been great ground for saying that the surplus was theirs. But then the ordinance went on to direct that, "albeit it was his mind that the company should have this surplus, as much as should be spared of it, above reparations and casualties, should be put into an iron coffer, and from year to year remain apart by itself." The terms of this direction entirely exclude any notion of the Mercers' Company being able to put any part of that surplus into their own pockets. It was always to remain in the coffer for the purposes of the school. Upon the words of the ordinance, therefore, which must be the governing document in this case, I am satisfied that there is nothing that gives the surplus to the Mercers' Company. Looking at the evidence of contemporaneous acts which I have held to be admissible for the purpose of showing what was the intention of the founder, I have come to the conclusion that it is conclusive against the company. It was said, having regard to the record of the proceedings of the 23rd Sept. 1510, that Dean Colet had expressed his intention to give the company so much land "for such labours and business as they and their successors should have in ordering the said school." No such land was ever given to the company, and, therefore, according to the argument on behalf of the company the court is to assume that a new and distinct arrangement was substituted for it by which the surplus rents of the lands actually conveyed to them were intended to belong to the company for their own use and benefit. Of such an arrangement there is no evidence whatever, and it is too much for the court to assume (as it was asked to do by the company) the existence of an agreement of which there was no evidence, for the purpose of getting rid of the usage of 350 years. Upon the whole case, therefore, the Attorney-General has succeeded, and there must be a declaration as asked by the prayer of the information, with an inquiry as to what the trust property consists of. With respect to the 4000*l.* representing the costs of the suit between the company and Baron Rothschild, the company did not defend that suit in the character of trustees of the charity estates, but as owners subject to a charge. They were not representing the charity for any purposes of the suit, but were defending the information for the purpose of escaping the control and supervision of the Charity Commissioners, under which it was sought to bring them. They could not, therefore, be allowed to throw those costs on the estate, of which they are now declared to be trustees, and they must restore the 4000*l.* For the interests of the charity an inquiry must be directed as to whether it would be fit and proper that any application should be made to the Committee of the Council of Education, to the commissioners under the Endowed Schools Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 86), or to Parliament, as this court has no power to direct a scheme with regard to St. Paul's School.

CALDWELL v. FELLOWES.

Joint tenancy—Covenant to settle after acquired property—Severance.

Where a lady at the date of her marriage settlement was entitled as joint tenant in tail expectant on the life estate of her brother in real estate, and the settlement after reciting a will and a settlement under which she was entitled to other property, further recited that she might also under some other will or wills, settlement or settlements, or by descent, representation, or by other means, become entitled to some other property, and the settlement contained a covenant on the part of the husband "that all the estates and effects whatsoever, both real and personal, of which the said R. Held, that the settlement was a severance in equity of the joint estate.

This was a special case for the purpose of ascertaining the opinion of the court as to whether a certain joint tenancy was severed by the settlements on the respective marriages of the joint tenants.

The following are the facts:—Ann Hector Cole, by her will dated 21st Dec. 1805, devised and bequeathed certain lands and tenements at Garboldsham, to her nephew Sir William Abdy, of Chobham, and his assigns for the term of his life without impeachment of waste. "And after the decease of the said Sir William Abdy, the testatrix gave, devised, and bequeathed the said messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments with their appurtenances, to the heirs of the body of the said Sir William Abdy, and for default of such issue, the testatrix gave, devised, and bequeathed the said messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments unto her three nieces, Katherine Abdy, Charlotte Abdy, and Harriet Abdy, the sisters of the said Sir William Abdy and their heirs as joint tenants."

The testatrix died in Dec. 1805, leaving Sir William Abdy and his three sisters her surviving. Sir William Abdy survived his three sisters, and died on the 15th April 1868, without having barred the estate tail limited to him by the above will, and without issue.

On the 9th Nov. 1813, Katherine Abdy was married to Captain Thomas Fellowes, and by a settlement executed on the day previous, after reciting that there were various sums of money to which Katherine Abdy was entitled or might become entitled proceeded thus:—

And she may also, under some other will or wills settlement, or settlements, or by descent, representation, or by other means become entitled to some other property as well real as personal. And whereas upon treaty for the intended marriage it was further agreed that the said sum or sums of money or other property, as well real as personal to which the said Katherine Mary Abdy is entitled and may be entitled by any means last aforesaid, should be settled for her sole and separate use during her life and afterwards for the benefit of the child or children of the said Katherine Mary Abdy by her said intended husband, and in default of such children to be at her absolute disposal. It was further agreed that the said Thomas Fellowes should enter into a covenant for settling the last mentioned real and personal property for the purposes last aforesaid."

And this indenture also witnesseth that in pursuance of the said recited agreement in this behalf and in consideration of the said intended marriage, and also in consideration of the settlement hereinbefore made of the said sum of 60000*l.* navy 5 per cent. bank annuities and 8000*l.* 4 per cent. annuities, the said Thomas Fellowes, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, hereby covenants and agrees with the said Sir William Abdy, Lindsey Merick, Peter Burrell, and John Fallowfield (Scott, their executors, administrators, and assigns, that all the estate and effects whatsoever, both real and personal of which the said Katherine Mary Abdy is now seised or possessed, or of which she shall hereafter become seised or possessed either under the said settlement made on the marriage of her said father and mother, or under the will of the said James Gordon, her grandfather, including the residue of her said portion of the sum of 30,000*l.* 5*l.* per cent. annuities, or by any other will or settlement, or by descent, representation, or by any other means whatsoever, shall be assured and settled, and that the said Thomas Fellowes will do and execute, or concur in doing and executing all such acts and deeds whatsoever as the said Sir William Abdy, Lindsey Merick, Peter Burrell, and John Fallowfield Scott, or the survivors or survivor of them, his heirs, executors, or administrators, or their or any of their counsel shall reasonably advise and require for assuring and settling the same and every part thereof upon the trusts and for the interests and purposes, and under and subject to the provisoes and agreements hereafter expressed and contained concerning the same.

The trusts thereafter expressed were in substance for the said Katherine Mary Fellowes, for her sole and separate use independently of any husband, and after her death for the benefit of all or any one of her children, grandchildren, or other issue to be born in the lifetime of her and her husband, or of one of them as she and her husband, and the survivor of them, should appoint, and in default of appointment among the children equally.

Thomas Fellowes did not make any settlement in pursuance of the covenant contained in the settlement of the 8th Nov. 1813.

Katherine Mary Fellowes died on the 18th Oct. 1817, without executing any deed of appointment, and Thomas Fellowes died on the 12th April 1853.

On the respective marriages of Charlotte Ann Fellowes and Harriett Fellowes, settlements were made to all intents similar to that made on the marriage of Katherine Mary Fellowes.

The three joint tenants died in the lifetime of the tenant for life of the estates.

The question submitted for the opinion of the court was whether the joint tenancy in the estates in Norfolk devised by Anne Hester Cole to her three nieces, Katherine Mary Fellowes, Charlotte Ann Caldwell, and Harriot Caldwell, and their heirs as joint tenants, was severed by the settlements made upon their respective marriages, or any of such settlements.

Joshua Williams, Q.C., and E. Macnaghten, for the plaintiff, submitted that this property not being included in the recitals, and the covenant which followed being only on the part of the husband, the joint tenancy was not severed.

Patriche v. Powlet, 2 Atk. 54;

Hammond v. Hammond, 19 Beav. 29 ;

Young v. Smith, 35 Beav. 87.

J. Wickens, C. Hall, and E. R. Cook appeared for the defendants, and contended that the property, although not specified, was included in the settlement, which was apparent from the whole construction of the settlement.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR was of opinion that the whole construction of the settlement was opposed to the view taken of it by the counsel for the plaintiff. After reading the recitals the Vice-Chancellor observed that at the time of making the settlement the lady was beyond all doubt entitled to the property in remainder, and therefore she was within the literal meaning of the words of the settlement. That recital was followed by a covenant on the part of the husband, which sufficiently indicated the intention of all the parties; he was therefore of opinion that the joint tenancy was severed, and there was a declaration to that effect.

Re THE OXFORD AND CANTERBURY HALLS COMPANY (LIMITED).

After a company had gone into liquidation, mortgagees for 11,000*l.* of the company's real estate, consisting of two music halls, contracted to sell one of them to a purchaser for 8500*l.*; and a deposit of 1000*l.* was paid. The mortgagees then sent in a claim under the winding-up for their full debt and costs. The residue of the purchase-money not being forthcoming, in June 1869 a new contract was entered into for the sale of the same music hall to a substituted purchaser for 9300*l.*, of which the 1000*l.* already paid was to be considered part payment, and the residue was to be paid on the 1st April 1870, with interest in the mean time. It was highly improbable that the purchase-money would be forthcoming on the 1st April 1870 :

price (9300l.) mentioned in the contract; but without prejudice to the right of either party to increase or diminish the proof, if the property should ultimately realise less or more than the contract price; and without prejudice to the right of the mortgagees to add to their proof in respect of costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred.

By an indenture of mortgage dated the 3rd July 1867, and made between the Oxford and Canterbury Hall Company (Limited) of the one part, and the trustees of the London and County Joint-Stock Banking Company (Limited), of the other part, the property of the company, consisting of the Oxford Music Hall and premises in Oxford-street, and the Canterbury Hall and premises in Lambeth, which were comprised in three leases for fifty years each from Lady-day 1860, were mortgaged to the trustees of the bank to secure 11,000l. and interest.

On the 7th May 1868 the Hall Company was ordered to be wound-up. On the 23rd June following the official liquidator was appointed, and on the 30th the advertisement was issued requiring creditors to send in their claims on or before the 17th of July 1868.

On the 9th Jan. 1869 Morris Roberts Syers signed an agreement, whereby he declared himself the purchaser from the mortgagees of the company's property at the price of 8500l. He paid 1000l. deposit, and it was agreed that the purchase was to be completed on or before the 4th March following.

On the 12th Jan. 1869 the solicitors of the bank wrote to the official liquidator informing him of the fact that the above contract had been entered into.

Upon the 4th March the purchase-money was not forthcoming, and the contract was not completed.

On the 24th March 1869, for the first time, a claim was sent in by the solicitors of the bank to the official liquidator informing him that the company was indebted to them at the date of the winding-up order in the sum of 11,652l. 8s., for which sum they claimed to be admitted as creditors. The liquidator replied that he could not at present admit the claim, but if the solicitors would send the details, he would have it looked into, and, if necessary, give them notice to prove in the ordinary way.

On the 30th March the solicitors wrote to say the claim of the bank consisted of 11,000l. for principal and 652l. 8s. for interest. Notice to prove the claim was subsequently given, and an affidavit in support was filed on the 26th April.

By an agreement dated the 29th June 1869, and made between the trustees of the bank as vendors of the first part, George Augustus Frederic Syers (who, though not so stated in the deed, was the son of Morris R. Syers), and Edwin Taylor as purchasers of the second part, after reciting the former contract of the 9th Jan. 1869, and that it had been agreed between the vendors and purchasers with the consent and approbation of Morris Syers, that the said agreement should be considered cancelled, and that in lieu thereof the vendors and purchasers should enter into the present agreement, it was agreed that the vendors should sell and the purchasers should purchase the property at the price of 9025l.; that the 1000l. paid by Morris Syers should with his consent be retained as part payment of the purchase money; that the purchasers on being let into possession should pay to the vendors certain sums paid or to be paid by them for insurance and rent, and within six months lay out 1500l. in repairs, and pay 8025l., being the remainder of the purchase-money, on the 1st April 1870, with interest at six per cent. on such sum from the 4th March, by four instalments: the first, on being let into possession; the second, on the 29th Sept. 1869; the third, on the 24th Dec. 1869; and the fourth, on the 1st April 1870.

The mortgagees were let into possession in July 1869.

On the 31st July last, the claim of the bank was adjourned out of chambers into court, and after argument,—

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—I am of opinion that this case is not governed by that of Barned's Bank, L. Rep. 3 Ch. 769. The principle is quite clear, and capable of being applied rightly to this case, that the proper time to ascertain the amount for which proof is to be made is the time when the claim is sent in. The question then is, what is the debt which at law legally and equitably was due at the time the claim was sent in? I am of opinion that if a mortgagee had sold part of the property, or contracted to sell it (which comes to the same thing), before his claim was sent in, his debt was equitably discharged and satisfied to the extent of the property of the mortgagor, which he had taken himself in part satisfaction of his debt. The case then stands for all purposes exactly in the same manner as if on the day when he had contracted to sell that property to the purchaser, the mortgagor had for the first time handed him over the property on a contract that he should take it at a valuation in part satisfaction of his debt. It is utterly impossible that a man under a contract such as that, or under the original contract, who had had goods and chattels in part satisfaction of the debt, could say the whole debt was due, and that this court would allow him to sue for the whole amount of that debt, he having taken goods and chattels, not as a pledge, but absolutely for the purpose of satisfying that debt. He did by the contract convert those goods of the mortgagor as he lawfully might. He, under the authority of the mortgagor, took possession of the goods, converted them from a pledge into an absolute property of his, and, having done that, I say the debt was to that extent satisfied in the contemplation of this court; and it is no answer to that to say that at that time the money was not actually received, because that was his own choice, just the same as if he had taken payment in bills of exchange or promissory notes. It was like a man saying "I take the goods in payment, and I take the payment in a promissory note," and then saying "I will sue for the whole amount, and get payment of the whole bill." There is no doubt the court would not permit that. He probably might be remitted in some way or other to his original rights, but as long as that contract was in force, and as long as he had taken and exercised his powers of sale, he could not consider himself as being the creditor for the whole amount. And I say that what took place with regard to the change of the contract has in no way altered the position of things. He had exercised his power of sale—he could not, as between himself and the mortgagor for whom he was a trustee, rescind that contract for sale capriciously, or at his own will and pleasure. What was really done was this: it was he and the person entitled under the other contract who, in performance of that contract, and giving effect to the rights of that contract, agreed to transfer it to somebody else, and to substitute somebody else as a purchaser. That was in continuation of the right given under the original contract. I am of opinion therefore that that was a mere form which took place on the transfer of that contract as between him and the mortgagor, and that, therefore, the proof must stand for the amount of the original debt, minus that which was produced by the property which the mortgagee elected to take in payment of his debt. It will be the net proceeds only. All parties will have their costs out of the estate. Upon that the bank, in chambers, claimed to deduct only 1000*l.*, and to be allowed to prove for the rest. The official liquidator, on the other hand, claimed to be entitled to deduct 9025*l.* (less 500*l.* for estimated costs, charges, and expenses), and another sum, leaving the bank's claim to be proved for only 1877*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.*

A summons was then taken out by the official liquidator that the bank trustees might be directed, within four days, to bring in an account of their costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred as mortgagees, mentioned in the order of the 31st July 1869, and in default, that their claim might be allowed for 1877*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.* only, and a certificate taken for that amount.

Eddis, Q. C., and Higgins, for the official liquidator.—One difficulty is, that until this claim is certified, the assets cannot be distributed. The mortgagees have elected to exercise their remedy by sale.

Kay, Q. C., and Waller, for the bank.—If this proof be certified, the official liquidator will be in a position to tender us the 1877*l.* 19*s.* 11*d.*, and then to redeem the Canterbury Hall, which is a very valuable security. Meanwhile, we may never get our 9300*l.*; indeed we have every reason to believe default will be made on the 1st April next. We may then have to rescind and resell, and we cannot say what our costs, charges, and expenses may be.

Eddis, Q. C., in reply, referred to Lockhart v. Hardy, 9 Beav. 349.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that there is great difficulty in doing what is right in this case; but I think it would be right that the proof should now be entered, and that the chief clerk should find the proof on the footing that the sum is to be deducted under the last contract; that the proof be for that amount without prejudice to the right on either side either to alter or diminish the proof, if the property should ultimately produce more or less than the amount of that contract, and without prejudice to the mortgagee's right of further proving in respect of the costs and expenses he may be put to. I do not mean to prejudice that question at all, and I certainly do not mean, upon this occasion, to determine on a contract of this kind that mortgagees are bound to guarantee that it will produce so much money.

Eddis, Q. C., asked the court to put a valuation on the security.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said he had no jurisdiction to do so. The official liquidator might file his bill to redeem. But at present he was dealing only with the question of what the proof was to be; and the proof must be for the amount less the price mentioned in the last contract, without prejudice to either party's right to increase or diminish it, if the property should ultimately realise more or less, and without prejudice to the mortgagees adding to their proof in respect of costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred.

DU BOULAY v. DU BOULAY.

St. Lucia—Suit for usurpation of name—Old French law—Ordinance of 1555—Decree of 1803—Colony, on conquest, how far governed by the law of the mother country—Laches.

A female slave, manumitted in St. Lucia, went to Martinique, and there assumed the name of Du Boulay, that of her former master. An illegitimate son (the respondent) was afterwards born to her, in whose acte de naissance, both mother and son were mentioned by their Christian names only. The son assumed the name Du Boulay when he was about sixteen, was entered under that name in the public registers of Martinique, and subsequently, having removed to St. Lucia, carried on business there under the above name for ten years, without objection from the Du Boulay family (the appellants) who had been long settled in the island.

The appellants instituted a suit in the Royal Court of St. Lucia asking a decree that the name Du Boulay belonged to the appellants, with a prohibition to the respondent to bear or sign that name in future, and an order for the erasure of the name in deeds, registers, &c., wherein the respondent was so mentioned:

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands, and reversing that of the Royal Court of St. Lucia): First, That an unregistered ordinance of 1555, by which the change of name and arms was forbidden under a penalty unless by royal permission, though probably law in France, was not shown to have become law in St. Lucia.

Secondly. That a law promulgated in France on April 10 1803, by which change of name was to be made under the authority of government in a prescribed mode, was probably not law in St. Lucia, since it was passed so shortly before St. Lucia passed under British dominion, and considering the character of the law, and the then critical position of the French West India Colonies, it was not likely that care was taken to transmit the law from France to St. Lucia before the conquest of the latter.

Thirdly. That it was extremely doubtful whether, by the old French law, independent of the ordinance of 1555 and the decree of 1803, the assumption of a name by a person who had originally no right to call himself by it, was the subject of any proceeding, penal or civil; and, Fourthly. That, therefore, the appellants had failed to prove that the existing law of St. Lucia entitled them to maintain this action.

Supposing such an action to be maintainable, there must be some reasonable limit within which a family ought to be bound to proceed, and the appellants having for ten years been aware that the respondent was carrying on business under the name of Du Boulay, that he was recognised by that name in public acts, and that he had acquired the name by reputation, were barred from action by their long acquiescence.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for the Windward Islands, delivered Aug. 27, 1866, whereby a decree of the Royal Court of St. Lucia was reversed.

The point at issue was the right of the respondent to take and use the name of Du Boulay. (The name assumed by herself and son appears to have been written "Duboulay," but this point does not seem to have been raised.)

PRIV. CO.]

DU BOULAY v. DU BOULAY.

[PRIV. CO.]

The facts were these:—

The appellants were a father and brothers, members of the family Du Boulay, for a long time past settled and of repute in the Island of St. Lucia. The mother of the respondent, a mulatto woman named Rose, had been a slave belonging to the Du Boulay family, but was manumitted in 1831. On obtaining her freedom she went to Martinique, of which she was a native, and began business as a dealer, but in 1850 she returned to St. Lucia and died there in 1854. From her manumission till her death, she was publicly known and called by the name of "Rose Du Boulay."

The respondent, the illegitimate son of Rose Du Boulay, was born at Martinique in 1835. The acte de naissance, dated March 26, 1835, and entered in the public registers, mentioned the mother as "Demoiselle Rose," and the son as "Jules René Herménégilde," no surname being given in either case. The respondent went to school in Martinique, every year paying short visits to his mother in St. Lucia. On one of these occasions in 1844, being then nine years old, he stood godfather to a child, and his name was entered in the registers of baptism as "Jules René" only, though the other sponsor's christian and surname were both given. A short time after, however, he assumed the name of Du Boulay, by which he was known and called at school. When he attained the age of sixteen he became liable, according to the laws of Martinique, to pay a personal capitation tax, and on paying it he was supplied by the municipal authorities of St. Pierre (the place where his birth had been recorded) with a passport for the interior, wherein he was named as "Mr. Du Boulay, Jules René Herménégilde," and in that name he was entered in the census books, and subscribed the receipts given to him. In 1855, after his mother's death, the respondent left Martinique and came to St. Lucia, announcing in the newspapers of the island that the house of Rose Du Boulay would continue to do business under the name of Du Boulay, Brothers, and Co. In 1856 the firm was dissolved by consent, and the respondent advertised in the newspapers his intention to carry on business in his own name. On the death of his brother in 1856, the respondent was appointed by the court to assume the charge, and direct the settlement of the affairs of the succession, and such appointment was advertised by three insertions in the official Gazette of St. Lucia in the following words:—"Notice is hereby given, that on application to the Royal Court, Mr. Jules René Herménégilde Duboulay, alias Hermann Du Boulay, has been named and appointed administrator of the succession of Mr. Jules Lovinsky Du Boulay." The respondent continued to bear the name Du Boulay, and without objection on the part of the appellants, till 1864. On July 16 in that year, however, an advertisement appeared in the St. Lucian newspaper to the effect that the house of Bourgeois Brothers was dissolved, and would be superseded by the firm of Belmar, Du Boulay, and Claustre, and on July 20 the respondent received a letter, written by the appellants' authority, informing him that the appellants could not allow him to bear their name, especially as a business was about to be established in the island by one of their family, and legal proceedings were threatened in case respondent should refuse to relinquish the name of Du Boulay. In reply, the respondent said he claimed no relationship with the appellants' family, and refused to abandon a name he had publicly borne so long.

The appellants then filed a bill of complaint in the Royal Court of St. Lucia, praying the court to "order and decide that the name of Du Boulay belongs to the plaintiffs and family with defence and prohibition to him the said Jules René Herménégilde, alias Hermann Du Boulay, to take, bear, and sign in future the said name of Du Boulay under all the pains and penalties of the law; and to order and direct that the said name of Du Boulay shall be erased from all deeds, registers, and other documents, both public and private, signed by the said defendant, or wherein he figures as Du Boulay, such erasure to be made by the parties under whose care and custody the said deeds, registers, and documents are placed and kept, on pain of being adjudged and condemned for contempt; and to authorise the plaintiffs to cause the decree of the court to be published in the official Gazette and newspapers of the island at the expense of the defendant, and to order the defendant to pay the costs of the action."

The Chief Justice of St. Lucia gave judgment for the plaintiffs (the present appellants) on July 20th, 1865, and an order was made thereon, following the prayer of the petition.

Against this decision there was an appeal by the present respondents to the Court of Appeal of the Windward Islands, and a majority of that court (the Chief Justices of Tobago and Grenada, the Chief Justice of St. Lucia dissenting) gave judgment on Aug. 27, 1866, reversing the decree of the court below. The grounds of the judgment were:—(1) That the ordinance of April 11th, 1803, by which the power to change names without any solemnity was in France restricted, is not in force in St. Lucia; for, "no ordinance in France was supposed to be in force in her colonies unless registered there, or extended to the colonies by the order of the parent state. The Coutume de Paris was the law of the French colonies, because the 33rd arrêt of the Conseil d'Etat du Roi of May 1664, establishing the West India Company, expressly declares its obligatory effect in the West Indian colonies, as it had been established in the French colonies in the East. . . . It does not appear that the ordinance of April 1803 was extended by its terms or by any other edict of the French Government, to its colonies, and it has not been registered in St. Lucia. The history of St. Lucia throws some further light on this subject. About two months after the passing of the ordinance of April 1803, that is to say, on June 23, 1803, St. Lucia capitulated—(but see the proclamation of that date, Laws of St. Lucia, p. 25, given below)—to the British arms, under General Grinfield, and it has remained a British colony ever since. Now, regard being had to the unsettled condition of France, in its state of transition at the time of the passing of this ordinance; to the existence of war, by which the irregularity in the communication then existing between Europe and the Antilles was necessarily increased; to the length of time consumed in a voyage across the Atlantic in those days; and to the slowness that attends all government action, it is not too much to presume, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, that this edict was unheard of in St. Lucia at the time of its conquest in 1803." (2) That to treat a name as property that may wrongfully be taken from another would lead to the paradox, that one might take from another his surname, the latter yet remaining in the possession and enjoyment of it.

The grounds on which the Chief Justice of St. Lucia dissented were: (1) That Duboulay was the family or patronymic name of the present appellants; (2) that a family or patronymic name is the subject of property, and hereditary, for "the name of a family is a real right constituted for the benefit and advantage of that family, and having for its conclusive end to prevent confusion between strangers and that family;" (3) that the family name of another can never be taken by persons who have no right to it either by descent or inheritance, "a general rule which is still adopted and followed by both the ancient and modern legislations of France, and which must ex necessitate be applied by the Court of St. Lucia, which is governed by the ancient laws of France in all matters of property and inheritance;" (4) that the ordinance of April 11, 1803, is in force in St. Lucia; (5) that the son of a slave cannot add to his name that of the late master of his mother (see Merlin, word "Esclavage"), and therefore the respondent's mother, being incapacitated to take the name of her master, could not, à fortiori, have passed it to her descendants; (6) that the respondent's long possession of the name could not operate as a bar to the appellants' claiming their name by way of revendication; (7) that the respondent, having been christened under the name of Jules René Herménégilde, and having had for a period of sixteen years a status in conformity with his acte de naissance, could not by law change his name without authority of government; (8) that the delay of the appellants in proceeding against the respondent was explained by the fact that for many years previously to 1864 the head of the appellants' family was afflicted with a chronic disease, and the other members of the family were then absent in Europe.

From the above judgment the present appeal was brought.

(It will be convenient here to note that it was assumed in the judgment of the committee that the present case depended on the French law as it prevailed in the then French colony of St. Lucia, prior to June 23, 1803, and the precise date was material as bearing on the question whether the ordinance of April 1803 ever prevailed as law in the island. The above date, June 23, 1803, is that of a proclamation issued by General Grinfield and Commodore Hood, who had taken St. Lucia by assault on the previous day (see Annual Register, vol. 45, p. 533). Now the terms of the proclamation are incorrectly stated in the judgment of the committee, following the wording in the judgment of the Chief Justice of St. Lucia, to have "assured and guaranteed to the inhabitants the full enjoyment of their property under the laws which existed in the island at the time immediately prior to the last session." The proclamation runs as follows:—"Quoique ladite île ait été prise d'assaut et sans aucune capitulation ou stipulation quelconques, néanmoins, pour tranquilliser les habitants et les propriétaires sur leur état actuel jusqu'à ce que la détermination de sa Majesté soit définitivement prononcée, leurs excellences leur assurent pleine et entière jouissance de toutes leurs propriétés, sous les lois qui existaient dans la colonie à l'époque immédiatement antérieure à la dernière cession." Laws of St. Lucia, p. 25. "Cession" must mean either the last cession of the island made to France by England under the Treaty of Amiens, March 25, 1802, or the former cession by France to England on May 25, 1796. (Annual Register, vol. 38, p. 74). Clark (Colonial Law, 300, 304) is an authority for the former date, and the latter seems favoured on a consideration of the history of the island; but, whichever be accepted, the ordinance of April 1803 would have to be excluded, as a law not existing in the island at the time specified by the proclamation.

Whether the proper date should not be that of the actual conquest rather than that fixed for the proclamation is another question.)

Field, Q. C. (Angelo J. Lewis with him) argued ex parte for the appellants. The law governing the present case is the old French law as it existed and prevailed in St. Lucia on 22nd June 1803, on which day the island was taken by the English. This law chiefly consisted of the Coutume de Paris, of ordinances of the French kings, and of local regulations made by colonial authorities. The authorities show that according to the old French law the name of Du Boulay, is, as between the appellants and the respondent, the property of the former, and ought to be protected from usurpation. The law on this matter is to be found in Merlin's "Répertoire de Jurisprudence," titles "Nom," and "Promesse de changer de nom," and in Dalloz's Jurisprudence Générale, title "Nom, Prénom." These authorities show that a property in a family name long-borne was recognised, that there was a remedy both civil and penal against one who assumed a name to which he had no right, and that no change in a name could be made without the authority of the Government. (See, too, Dictionnaire du Notariat, s. 3, title "De la propriété des noms," quoted in the judgment of the Judicial Committee below.) And the right to prevent the usurpation of one's name has been recognised by the courts. Thus, a case reported by M. Bourdet, avocat, in the Bulletin Judiciaire de Paris, 1859, is as follows:—"De Lacarelle v. Jean-Marie Durieu de Lacarelle. Usurpation de nom. M. Durieu, assigné devant le tribunal de Villafranche, par le vrai De Lacarelle, prétend que son adversaire n'a aucun intérêt à ce qu'au lieu d'un seul Lacarelle, il y en ait deux; à quoi le tribunal a répondu péremptoirement d'une manière concise et vraie: 'On a toujours intérêt à empêcher l'usurpation de son nom, soit à cause des souvenirs d'affection, d'honneur, ou autres qui s'y rattachent, soit pour prévenir des méprises qui peuvent entraîner la violation du secret des lettres, ou avoir autres conséquences non moins fâcheuses; soit en effet et n'y aurait il que ce seul motif, qu'un nom étant une véritable propriété, celui qui a le droit de le porter a incontestablement celui d'empêcher qu'un autre ne l'usurpe, sans être obligé de rendre compte à qui se soit des motifs qui le font agir.'" And the Moniteur de la Martinique for 1860 contains a report of the case of Lawless v. Pierre, falsely called Lawless. This was a suit before the Tribunal of First Instance in Martinique, by Mr. William Lawless, the British consul in that island, against the defendant, for having usurped his name. The defendant, who had been a slave, pleaded, among other things, that the name of Lawless was granted to him in his act of manumission by the governor of Martinique; that the said name belonged to him, for, having been in possession of it since the day of his birth, he had acquired it by prescription, and consequently by taking and signing it he had committed no act of usurpation. The court gave judgment on Feb. 14, 1860, deciding that the defendant had no right to bear the name of Lawless, forbidding him to take or use it for the future, and ordering that the name should be erased in all deeds and registers where the defendant's name appeared, and the plaintiff was authorised to publish the judgment in the journals of the colony at the expense of the defendant, and the defendant was condemned in costs. This judgment was appealed from to the Imperial Court of Martinique, which on June 19, 1860, affirmed the judgment of the court below.

And according to the old law of France, no person could change or add to his name without an express authority from Government to do so. An ordinance of Henry II. made in 1555 forbade under a penalty the change of names or arms, unless letters of permission were first obtained from the king (cited in the judgment of the committee below; Merlin's Répertoire de Jurisprudence, title "Nom.") And though that ordinance not having been registered was little executed, Merlin is probably wrong in the opinion that for want of registration by Parliament, the ordinance was not recognised as law: (Rép. Juris. title "Promesse de changer de nom," vol. xiii., p. 456, edit. 1828.) Dalloz thinks that the ordinance became law, and says that it was considered

“comme consacrant un principe qui n’a pas été aboli par la loi du 6 Fruct. an. 2.” (Jurisp. Gén., title “Nom, Prénom,” vol. xxxii. pp. 506, 519, edit. 1855.) In the time of the Revolution, a decree of the National Convention, 6 Fruct. an. 2 (Aug. 23, 1794) forbade citizens to bear any name other than those given in their actes de naissance. And under the consular government a law was promulgated, on 21 Germ. an. 11 (10th April, 1803), with respect to changes of name. as follows: “Tit. 2. Des changements de noms. (4.) Toute personne qui aura quelque raison de changer de nom, en adressera la demande motivée au gouvernement. (5.) Le gouvernement prononcera dans la forme prescrite pour les règlements d’administration publique. (6.) S’il admet la demande, il autorisera le changement de nom, par un arrêté rendu dans la même forme, mais qui n’aura son exécution qu’après la révolution d’une année, à compter du jour de son insertion au Bulletin des lois. (7.) Pendant le cours de cette année, toute personne y ayant droit sera admise à présenter requête au gouvernement pour obtenir la révocation de l’arrêté autorisant le changement de nom; et cette révocation sera prononcée par le gouvernement, s’il juge l’opposition fondée. (8.) S’il n’y a pas eu d’oppositions, ou si celles qui ont été faites n’ont point été admises, l’arrêté autorisant le changement de nom aura son plein et entier effet à l’expiration de l’année. (9.) Il n’est rien innové par la présente loi aux dispositions des lois existantes relatives aux questions d’état entraînant changements de noms, qui continueront à se poursuivre devant les tribunaux dans les formes ordinaires.” The Chief Justice was right in the opinion that the above became law in St. Lucia. Further, according to the law of France prior to the date aforesaid, coloured persons, free or manumitted, were forbidden to take the surnames either of their reputed fathers or their masters of white complexion, or of any white man inhabiting the French islands. See Le Code Noir, art. 6; Merlin’s Rép. Jurisp. title “Eslavage,” sect. 2. The delay by the appellants in resisting the usurpation of their name is explained by the illness of the head of the family and the absence in Europe of the other appellants; nor could this delay, whatever its duration, act as a bar to the right to claim their name by way of revendication. See Troplong’s Commentaire de la Prescription, vol. 1, p. 401, sect. 248, where it is observed that “Quoiqu’on ait porté pendant un temps indéfini un nom autre que celui qu’on a dans son acte de naissance, la possession en est inutile, parceque les lois défendent de changer de nom sans l’autorisation du gouvernement.” See too Dictionnaire du Notariat, sect. 2, “De la Propriété des Noms.”

Cur. adv. vult.

March 15.—Judgment was delivered by Lord CHELMSFORD:—This is an appeal from a decree of the Court of Appeal from the Windward Islands, reversing a decree of the Royal Court of St. Lucia in favour of the appellant. The suit was instituted in the Royal Court of St. Lucia, for the purpose of having it ordered and decided that the name of Du Boulay belongs to the appellants and their family, with defence and prohibition to the respondent to take, bear, and sign in future the said name of Du Boulay. The question to be determined upon this appeal is whether an action of this description is maintainable under the French law, which at the present time is the governing law in the Island of St. Lucia. When a judge is called upon to decide a question depending upon foreign law, there is always some danger of his being influenced by notions derived from that law which he is in the daily habit of administering. In this country we do not recognise the absolute right of a person to a particular name to the extent of entitling him to prevent the assumption of that name by a stranger. The right to the exclusive use of a name in connection with a trade or business is familiar to our law; and any person using that name, after a relative right of this description has been acquired by another, is considered to have been guilty of a fraud, or at least of an invasion of another’s right, and renders himself liable to an action, or he may be restrained from the use of the name by injunction. But the mere assumption of a name, which is the patronymic of a family, by a stranger who had never before been called by that name, whatever cause for annoyance it may be to the family, is a grievance of which our law affords no redress. The appellants, however, say that by the French law, which is in force in St. Lucia, they have a right to maintain a civil action against the respondent for assuming their family name of Du Boulay. The following are the facts admitted in the case: The name of Du Boulay had been the family name of the appellants for a very long period. The respondent is the illegitimate son of an emancipated female slave, named Rose, and was born at Martinique on the 17th Feb. 1835. Before his birth, his mother had assumed the name of Du Boulay, and was so called in a judicial proceeding of the Tribunal of First Instance of St. Pierre, Martinique, on the 20th Aug. 1831. In 1840 she left Martinique and took up her abode in St. Lucia, where she was publicly called and known by the name of Rose Du Boulay down to the time of her death in 1854. The respondent continued in Martinique till after the death of his mother, when he removed to St. Lucia, being at that time about the age of nineteen. It does not appear when he first took the name of Du Boulay. He certainly had not done so in the early part of the year 1844, for on the 22nd Feb. in that year (though only nine years old), he stood godfather to a child, and signed the register by the name of Jules René. In the year 1852, he had a passport granted to him and registered in the registry of passports for the interior of the Island of Martinique, in which he is described as “Mr. Du Boulay. Jules René Herménegilde, seventeen years old.” In the year 1855, having then fixed his residence in St. Lucia, he advertised in an island newspaper his intention to commence business under the firm of Du Boulay Brothers and Co., and in the following year he advertised the dissolution of this firm, and his intention to continue the business in his own name. In 1856 the respondent’s brother died, and he was nominated administrator of his brother’s succession. Public notice of this nomination was given by the Royal Court by advertisement in the official gazette, in which the respondent was called Jules René Herménegilde Du Boulay alias Hermann Du Boulay. From the time of his use of the name of Du Boulay, in St. Lucia, down to the time of the institution of the suit by the appellants on the 21st April 1865, his right to use it was never questioned. During this period he carried on business publicly and notoriously under the name of Du Boulay, and the fact must have been well known to all the Du Boulay family resident in St. Lucia. The appellants describe themselves in their plaint as dwelling in the Quarter of Souffrière, in the Second District of the island. The reason given by their advocate for their not having proceeded against the respondent sooner, as stated by him upon their authority, is, “that during the period mentioned by the respondent, those of the members of the Du Boulay family who could have protected their family name were in Europe for their education, or for other purposes.” And “the head of the family, Mr. Belisle Du Boulay, was then affected with a chronic disease which deterred him from attending to any kind of business." It was necessary for the appellants in order to establish their case against the respondent to show—first, that the existing law of St. Lucia entitled them to maintain their action; and, secondly, that delay in asserting their right, or acquiescence in the use of the name of Du Boulay, by the respondent, did not prevent their proceeding against him. Upon the first question, the learned counsel for the appellant undertook to prove that by the old French law which prevails in St. Lucia, a family had a property in their patronymic, and might prevent any person calling himself by their name who had no right or title to do so. For this purpose he quoted a modern work, Dictionnaire du Notariat, s. 3, title, "De la Propriété des Noms," where it is said, "Le nom que chaque individu porte est pour lui une propriété. Il a le droit de s'opposer à ce qu'il soit pris par un autre. L'usurpation d'un nom donne lieu à une action devant les tribunaux. Cette action est purement civile." The learned counsel, upon being pressed for some instance of an action of this description having been brought under the old French law, confessed that he had no early precedent to produce. The only cases which he mentioned were two, which are to be found in the record of the proceedings. One of them is the case of De Lacarelle v. Durieu de Lacarelle before the Tribunal of Villefranche, in the year 1859, respecting which nothing is stated except the opinion of the Tribunal, that a person who has the right to bear a name is entitled to prevent another from usurping it, without being compelled to account for the motive of his proceeding; and the other, Lawless v. Pierre, falsely called Lawless, before the tribunals of Martinique, in the year 1860, which, like the present, was the case of the assumption of a name after emancipation from slavery. It is extremely doubtful whether, prior to the ordinance of 1555 (to be presently mentioned), the assumption of a name by a person who had originally no right to call himself by it, was the subject of any proceeding, penal or civil. Merlin, in his Répertoire de Jurisprudence, title "Nom," s. 3, after stating that by the Roman law changes of names were absolutely free, says, "Il fut un temps en France où conformément à cette loi on changeait de nom sans aucune solennité." He then gives a variety of instances prior to 1555, in which changes of name had been made without authority, and without any solemnity. He then proceeds, "Mais comme cette licence de changer ainsi de nom et d'armes produisait les plus grands abus, le Roi Henry II y remédia par une ordonnance donnée à Amboise le 26 mars, avant Pâques, 1555, art. 9." The right, therefore, to bring a civil action in St. Lucia, for the usurpation of a family name must be founded either upon this ordinance of 1555, or upon some law subsequently passed and introduced into the island. The ordinance of 1555 gives no right of civil action for an unauthorised change of name; and according to Merlin, in the passages just cited, such an action could hardly have been previously maintained. The ordinance subjects the person changing his name without authority to penal consequences only. It says, "Pour éviter la supposition des noms et des armes, défenses sont faites à toutes personnes de changer leurs noms, et leurs armes, sans avoir obtenu des lettres de dispense et permission, à peine de 1000 livres d'amende, d'être punis comme faussaires et d'être exautorés et privés de tout degré et privilège de noblesse." There seems to be great doubt whether this ordinance of 1555 ever had any practical operation, even in France. Merlin, in his Répertoire, title "Promesse de changer de Nom," says, the ordinance not having been registered, never became law in France. But Dalloz, in his Dictionnaire, title "Nom et Prénom," after mentioning this opinion of Merlin, says,

"Mais la jurisprudence est contraire à cette opinion." At all events, it is not shown that this unregistered ordinance ever formed part of the law of St. Lucia. It is to be observed that the Chief Justice of St. Lucia founds his judgment in favour of the appellants upon a different ordinance, never referring to the ordinance of 1555 as having any existence, or at least, as having any bearing upon his decision. He says, "In France, under the law De Mutatione Nominis, names were changed according to the whim or caprice of individuals without any solemnity or formality, but such an unrestrained license brought forth great confusion; names of living families were arbitrarily taken, and towards the commencement of the nineteenth century, to wit on the 10th April 1803, a law was made to check that dangerous system." And he adds, "It is not amiss to observe that that law is not only still in force in this colony, but has been retained entire by the modern legislators of France, and now forms part of the existing laws of that country." Notwithstanding the opinion of the Chief Justice that the ordinance of 1803 (which will be found in the argument above) is in force in St. Lucia, it may fairly be questioned whether it ever became part of the law of the island before it was taken by this country, on the 23rd June, 1803. On that day a proclamation was issued which "assured and guaranteed to the inhabitants the full enjoyment of their property under the laws which existed in the island at the time immediately prior to the last session." (These are the words of the judgment of the Chief Justice of St. Lucia and not of the proclamation. The latter reads "cession;" and see note above, preceding the argument.) It is not very probable that the ordinance of 1803 was one of these laws. It was passed in France a little more than two months before St. Lucia was brought under British dominion, and not being of any peculiar local importance, it was not likely in the critical position of the French West Indian colonies at this juncture that any care would be taken to transmit it, in order that it might form part of the law of the island. If the Chief Justice is right in saying that this law was made to prevent persons arbitrarily taking the names of living families, it would seem to show that before 1803 no civil action could be brought, or at all events, that none was ever brought to protect a family name from usurpation. If the law of 1803 is out of the question, it is difficult to see upon what other foundation the appellants can rest their right to maintain the action. The old French law on which their learned counsel mainly relied has already been considered. The ordinance of 1555, or one of a similar description made in 1629, was the only law upon the subject of changes of name at the time of the French Revolution. That ordinance fell with the kingly authority. In 1794, during the Revolutionary Government, an ordinance was passed which absolutely prohibited any change of name, but the learned counsel was unable to show that this ordinance, any more than that of 1803, ever had the force of law in St. Lucia. He failed altogether in his endeavour to prove that the existing law of the island entitled the appellants to maintain their action, whether he relied upon the old French law independently of the ordinances, or upon proof that the ordinances ever formed part of the law of St. Lucia, or even if they did, that they gave a family a right to proceed by civil action against a person calling himself by the family name without authority, and to compel him to discontinue to use it. Their Lordships are unwilling to dispose of the case without adverting to the question arising from the delay of the appellants in instituting their suit. Supposing an action of this kind to be maintainable, there must be some reasonable limit within which a family ought to be bound to proceed. In the present case the family of Du Boulay, resident in St. Lucia, could not have been ignorant that for ten years the respondent had been carrying on business openly under the name of Du Boulay, that he had been recognised by that name in public acts, and that he had undoubtedly acquired the name by reputation. At what time some of the appellants were absent from St. Lucia, and when they returned, is left in uncertainty; but the head of the family appears to have been continually resident in the island, and no sufficient reason is assigned for his not taking earlier steps to protect the family name from the respondent's alleged unauthorised assumption of it. Under these circumstances, whether any other member of the family might have questioned the title of the respondent to call himself by the family name, is unnecessary to be considered, but all the appellants have placed themselves under a personal exception by standing by (as it is called) and permitting the respondent to become known to the world by the name of Du Boulay. After their long acquiescence, it would be unreasonable and unjust to sanction the attempt of the appellants to deprive the respondent of his right to use a name which he had acquired by reputation, and by which alone he had been known in the island during the whole period of his residence there. Their Lordships will recommend to Her Majesty that the decree appealed from be affirmed.

GRANT v. GRANT.

Construction of will—Nephew—Wife's nephew.

A testator devised real estate to "my nephew, Joseph Grant;" a son of his brother, and a son of his wife's brother, the latter of whom the testator frequently spoke of as his nephew, each bore this name, and claimed to be the devisee:

Held, that the word "nephew" has no definite legal signification limiting its application to the son of a brother or sister; and that, therefore, extrinsic evidence was admissible to show to which claimant the testator intended to devise his estate.

Held also, that the testator's intention being clear, the wife's nephew was the devisee.

This was an action of ejectment commenced on the 6th May 1868, by a writ addressed to the defendant, and all persons entitled to defend the possession of one messuage, one dwelling-house, five warehouses, ten outbuildings, three hovels, three barns, three stables, two brewhouses, one yard, ten outhouses, four cottages, ten pigsties, ten animal sties, with the appurtenances, situate and being in the parish of Rugby, in the county of Warwick.

The following case was stated for the opinion of the court by consent and by order.

John Grant, the testator in the will and testament and the codicil thereto hereinafter mentioned, before and at the time of the making thereof, and up to and at the time of his decease, was seised in fee simple of a messuage, dwelling-house, outbuildings, and premises situate and being in the parish of Rugby, in the county of Warwick (being the premises in the said writ mentioned), wherein before and at the time of his making of the said will and testament and codicil, he resided and continued to reside up to and at the time of his death, and which by the said will are expressed to be devised under the words, "I devise to my said nephew, Joseph Grant, his heirs and assigns, the said house and premises where I now live."

The said John Grant, the testator, on the 18th Feb. 1868, duly made and published his last will and testament, and on the 21st Feb. 1868 duly made and published a certain codicil thereto, which said will and testament and the said codicil were respectively duly executed and attested according to law, and were respectively in the words and figures following, that is to say,

This is the last will and testament of me, John Grant, of Rugby, in the county of Warwick, dealer in marine stores, as follows: I direct the payment of my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses; I bequeath to my niece, Ann Liggins, the sum of 300*l.* free of legacy duty, and I devise to my said niece, Ann Liggins, her heirs and assigns, my house in Pennington-street, in Rugby aforesaid, in the occupation of — Hudson; and my house in Riley's-court, and my three houses in Gas-street, Rugby, I devise to my niece Mary Pettifer, her heirs and assigns; my five houses in New Bilton I devise to my niece Emma Bench, her heirs and assigns; I bequeath to my nephew Joseph Grant the sum of 500*l.* and all the stock and household effects in the house where I now live; and I devise to my said nephew Joseph Grant, his heirs and assigns, the said house and premises where I now live; I devise to my nephew James Grant, his heirs and assigns, the house and premises in the Lawford-road, in the occupation of Lessimer, the miller; I devise all other my real estate, if any, unto my said nephew Joseph Grant, his heirs and assigns; I bequeath all the residue of my personal estate unto my said nephew Joseph Grant absolutely. I appoint my said nephew, Joseph Grant, executor of this my will.

This is a codicil to the last will and testament of me, John Grant, of Rugby, in the county of Warwick, dealer in marine stores, dated the 18th Feb. 1868. I appoint my nephew, James Grant, an executor of my said will in conjunction with my nephew Joseph Grant. And I devise all estates in me as trustee or mortgagee unto the said Joseph Grant and James Grant, their heirs and assigns, subject to the equities affecting the same.

The said testator died on the 22nd Feb. 1868, without having revoked or altered the said will and testament or codicil respectively, save so far as relates to the said will and testament by the said codicil.

The said testator's eldest brother, William Grant, survived the testator, and was and is his heir-at-law.

The claimant, Joseph Grant, the plaintiff in this action, is a son of the said testator's said brother William Grant, and before and at the time of the making of the said will and testament and codicil, and at the time of the said testator's death the plaintiff was and is a lawful nephew of the said testator.

The said Ann Liggins, Mary Pettifer, and Emma Bench, by the said testator respectively described as nieces in and by the said will, are the daughters of the said testator's brother, Thomas Grant, and are respectively married.

The said James Grant, in the said will and testament and codicil respectively described by the said testator as his nephew, is a son of the said testator's brother, Thomas Grant, and brother of the said Ann Liggins, Mary Pettifer, and Emma Bench.

No brother or sister of the said testator (except the said brother, William Grant) had a child named Joseph Grant.

The said testator at the time of the making of the said will and testament and codicil, and up to and at the time of his death had neither child, grandchildren, nor other lineal descendants.

[The said testator, in or about the year 1838, married Jane Scott, widow, formerly Jane Grant, spinster, who was his first cousin, and the defendant, Joseph Grant, is the son of Joseph Grant, a brother of the testator's said wife.

The last mentioned Joseph Grant, the father of the defendant, died about twenty-two years ago, leaving a widow and his said son, the defendant, then a boy of three years old. The widow died about fifteen years ago, whereupon the testator took the defendant into his own house and brought him up, and he lived as an inmate of the testator's house till the death of the testator, and assisted him in the management of his business of a marine store dealer.

The testator's said brother William the father of the plaintiff has a large family, of which the plaintiff is one of the younger children, and the testator had not been on good terms with or visited his said brother, who lived about twelve miles from testator, for many years before his death; he did not know how many children his said brother had, and at the time he made his will did not know of the plaintiff's name or existence.

The testator was in the habit of calling the defendant his nephew, both to the other members of the family and to persons not related to him, and the testator on several occasions expressed his intention of leaving his house and business to the defendant, and also on several occasions expressed his intention that neither his brother William nor the family of his brother William should have any of his property.

The will was prepared by Mr. Fuller, a solicitor at Rugby, who took his instructions from testator on his death bed, and who did not know any of the testator's relations, except the Joseph Grant who lived with him, and in giving him instructions to prepare the will, the testator said that, it was his intention that neither his brother William nor any of his family should have anything, as he had lent both him and his elder sons money, which had not been repaid, and he considered they had their share of his property in that way. He also told Mr. Fuller that he wished to give his nephew Joe, the house in which the testator lived, his stock in trade, and 500*l.* to enable him to continue carrying on the business, and wished him to be his executor. Mr. Fuller asked the testator if by his nephew Joe he meant the person who lived with him and helped him in his business, and he said "Yes, I mean him downstairs," and he wished to give him the house and business, as he had lived so long with him and helped him so much in his business. Mr. Fuller asked the testator if the person he called Joe was his nephew, and the testator replied that he was.]

The defendant, Joseph Grant, is in the possession of the messuage, dwelling house, and premises, the subject of this action of ejectment.

The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact which a jury ought to draw, and the facts stated in the parenthesis [] are so stated after protest by the plaintiff, that they should not have been inserted herein, and the question of the admissibility of the whole or any part of the facts in such paragraphs contained is reserved for the decision of the court.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the said Joseph Grant, the plaintiff, is entitled to the said messuage, dwelling-house, and premises under the above devise.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is so entitled, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for the recovery of the whole of the premises claimed in the writ with costs to be taxed immediately after the decision of the case or otherwise as the court may think fit.

If the court shall be of opinion that the plaintiff is not so entitled, then a judgment of nol pros shall be entered up for the defendant, with costs to be taxed immediately after the decision of the case or otherwise as the court may think fit.

Grove Chapman (with him Quain, Q.C.) argued for the plaintiff, and contended that the word "nephew" could mean only the son of a brother or sister, or at all events only a blood relation, and that there was only one nephew, Joseph Grant, the plaintiff, who answered that description. He cited: Wigram's Treatise on Extrinsic Evidence of Wills; Johnson's Dictionary, "Nephew:" English Version of the Bible; Miller, v. Travers, 8 Bing. 244; Hiscocks v. Hiscocks, 5 M. & W. 363; Richardson v. Watson, 1 N. & M. 575; 4 B. & Ad. 799.

Field, Q. C. (with him A. Wills), for the defendant, relied upon the judgment of Lord Penzance with regard to the personalty devised by this same will (Grant v. Grant, Weekly Notes, P. & M. Dec. 25, 1869), and cited passages in which "nephew" bears other meanings than that of a blood relation, from Shakespeare (Much Ado about Nothing, act 5, sc. 1; "Richard II.," act 1, sc. 1, and act 5, sc. 3; "Richard III.," act 4, sc. 4). That the law does not apply to the word the limited signification contended for by the other side is clear from the fact that it is not used in the Legacy or Succession Duty Acts, nor in the prohibited degrees of matrimony in the Prayer-book, nor in any law dictionary.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—BOVILL, C. J., delivered the judgment of himself, M. Smith, and Brett, JJ.—The question raised in this case has already been decided by Lord Penzance in the Probate Court in favour of the defendant; but there is an appeal against his judgment, and the plaintiff has required the decision of this court in the present action of ejectment, which affects the title to the real estate. The determination of the question really depends upon the admissibility of, and the effect to be given to the parol evidence; and this evidence is of two kinds: one class of evidence being offered for the purpose of showing that there is in the will a latent ambiguity, and the other class for the purpose of explaining and removing it. The devise of the testator was to "my nephew, Joseph Grant;" and the point at issue is whether these words apply to the plaintiff or to the defendant. The language of the will itself is clear, and free from ambiguity on the face of it; but as in most cases of wills parol evidence is necessary, and therefore admissible to identify the party intended to be described just in the same way as such evidence is admissible to identify and to show what was the subject matter devised. The parol evidence to prove that the plaintiff was the son of a deceased brother of the testator, and therefore answered the description in the will, was clearly admissible, and it is equally competent for the defendant to endeavour to prove that the words of the will may also apply to him, and this can only be done by parol evidence, which is therefore admissible for that purpose. In each case this kind of parol evidence is not admissible for the purpose of controlling, varying, or altering the written will of the testator, but is admitted simply for the purpose of enabling the court to understand it, and to declare the intention of the testator according to the words in which that intention is expressed. If such evidence establishes that the description in the will may apply to each of two or more persons, then a latent ambiguity is exposed, and rather than that the devise should fail altogether for uncertainty, the law allows the ambiguity, which is exposed by the parol evidence, to be cleared up and removed by similar evidence, provided such parol evidence is sufficient to enable the court to ascertain the sense in which the testator employed the particular expression upon which the ambiguity arises. If the parol evidence, after exposing the latent ambiguity, fails to solve it, the court cannot give effect to that part of the will.

C. P.]

GRANT v. GRANT.

Thus in Thomas v. Thomas, 6 T. R. 671, where the particular devise was "to my granddaughter Mary Thomas, of Llechlloyd, in Merthyr parish," evidence was given that the testator had a granddaughter of the name of Elinor Evans, who lived at Llechlloyd in Merthyr parish, and a great granddaughter named Mary Thomas, who lived in the parish of Llangain, some miles from Merthyr parish. No other evidence being given, it was held that, although an ambiguity was raised it was not solved, and therefore that the court could not apply the devise, that it consequently failed, and that the subject-matter of the devise went to the heir-at-law. The plaintiff's evidence in the present case clearly brought him within the description in the will. The defendant's evidence proved that he was the son of a brother of the testator's wife, and the testator having married his first cousin of the same name as himself, the defendant's name was the same as that of the plaintiff. Does then the defendant by this evidence show that the description will apply to him? It is quite true that a son of a brother or a sister is generally called and known as a nephew, and this term therefore would no doubt apply to the plaintiff, but the word nephew has no definite legal signification; and there is not anything to limit its application to the precise relationship above described; on the contrary, there are many authorities to show that it has been and may be used in a much wider sense, extending to persons in a different degree of relationship; and in its ordinary and popular sense it is frequently and commonly applied to other persons—for instance, it is commonly applied by a husband to the son of his wife's brother or sister, or by a wife to the son of her husband's brother or sister; the son of either of such brothers or sisters would commonly call the husband and wife his uncle and aunt; nor could it be said that in popular and ordinary language such a description would be unusual or inappropriate. It is the court which has to be satisfied that the description may apply to the defendant, and if it rested on this evidence alone we should be of opinion that the defendant had brought himself within the description of the will so as to create a latent ambiguity, and to let in further parol evidence as to which of the two parties was intended to be described. It is not necessary that the description in the will should be in all respects accurate or perfect, but it is sufficient if it satisfies the mind of the judge that there is a sufficient description with legal certainty. See Wigram, V.C.'s Treatise on Extrinsic Evidence, prop. 7, p. 186. For example, where a testator devises to Mary, Elizabeth, and Ann, the three daughters of Mary Beynon, and at the date of the will Mary Beynon had two legitimate daughters and one illegitimate daughter, Elizabeth, parol evidence was admitted to show that Mary Beynon had formerly had a legitimate daughter, Elizabeth, who died an infant, and, although it was considered that the legitimate daughter was prima facie the person intended, the other facts and circumstances were left to the jury to say which of the two Elizabeths was the person intended to be described: (Doe dem. Thomas v. Beynon, 12 A. & E. 431.) The present case is also somewhat similar in principle to Bennett v. Marshall, 2 Kay & John. 740, where a devise being to "my second cousin William Marshall," and the testator had no second cousin of that name, but had a first cousin named William Marshall, and a first cousin named William John Robert Blandford Marshall, it was considered by the present Lord Chancellor that as it was a common practice where a person has several christian names to call him by the first of those names only, a sufficient case of ambiguity was made out to call for parol evidence in order to ascertain which of the two parties was intended. Upon such evidence the decision in that case was in favour of the cousin with the several names, the Vice-Chancellor remarking that if the evidence had been perfectly balanced the cousin named William only would have been entitled to the preference. So here if the parol evidence were equally balanced, we might probably hold that the plaintiff would be entitled in preference to the defendant, but this cannot affect the question of the admissibility of the evidence. Another instance of effect being given to what was considered popular language used by a testator occurs in the case of Doe d. Gains v. Rouse, 5 C. B. 422, where a married man devised to "my dear wife Caroline;" and it was held that this was sufficient description in a popular sense of a person of the name of Caroline, with whom the testator cohabited, though in that case there was a person of another name who claimed to come within the description of his wife. But there is another ground upon which it appears to us that the defendant may endeavour to bring himself within the description in the will, namely, that the testator was in the habit of calling him his nephew Joseph Grant. In all cases of wills the surrounding circumstances as they existed at the time of the will, including the state of the testator's family, and the nature of his property may generally be proved in order to place the court as nearly as possible in the same condition as the testator, so that they may understand the language of his will and apply it in the same sense in which he used it; we are of opinion that evidence may be given of a testator having been in the habit of using expressions in a particular sense; though whether such evidence will affect the will or its application will depend upon the particular circumstances and the language of the devise in each case; and it would not generally be admissible to alter the natural meaning and legal effect and construction of the words, where they have a definite and clear meaning. In Richardson v. Watson, 4 B. & Ad. at p. 799, where a question arose as to what was intended under a devise of "the close in K." Lord Wensleydale said:—"Generally speaking evidence might be given to show that the testator used the word close in the sense which it bore in the country where the property was situate, as denoting a farm;" though in the particular case it was held that such evidence was not admissible, because the other parts of the will showed that the testator had used the expression in its ordinary sense, as denoting an inclosure only. This subject was much considered by the Court of Exchequer in the case of Doe v. Hiscocks, 5 M. and W. 363, and the following passage occurs in the judgment at p. 368:—"Again, the testator may have habitually called certain persons or things by peculiar names by which they were not commonly known. If these names should occur in his will they could only be explained and construed by the aid of evidence to show the sense in which he used them, in like manner as if his will were written in cypher or in a foreign language. The habits of the testator in these particulars must be receivable as evidence to explain the meaning of his will." In Crosthwaite v. Dean, L. Rep. 5 Eq. 245, where a devise was to Charlotte Lee, evidence was admitted by the present Lord Chancellor to show that a person who originally bore that name, but had married a person of the name of Antrim (from whom she afterwards separated) was habitually called by the testator by her maiden name of Lee. In Goodwyn v. Goodwyn, 1 Ves. Sen., 226, where the devise was to certain poor relations, evidence was admitted of the testator having poor relations in Salop and that he knew thereof, and Lord Hardwick thus referred to another case, "As where the testator described a legatee by a wrong name which he never bore, parol evidence was allowed by the Master of the Rolls, to show that the testator knew such a person, and used to call her by a nickname." In Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, 1 Mad. 430, the case thus referred to is said to be the case of Beaumont v. Pell, 2 P. Wms., 140, where the bequest was to Catharine Earnley, and a person named Gertrude Yardley claimed to be the person described. Evidence was admitted to show that the testator usually called Gertrude Gatty, and that whilst giving instructions for his will he spoke in so feeble a voice that the attorney's clerk might easily have mistaken the names. In Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, the bequest was "to my children the sum of pounds sterling 5000*l.* each." It was contended that this could apply only to legitimate children, and that as the testator died unmarried the legacy did not take effect. But evidence was admitted that the testator had illegitimate children born in India previous to the making of the will, that he was much attached to them, and had sent them to England to be educated. Upon this the Vice Chancellor decreed that the legacies applied to them. He says "If there is a latent ambiguity, evidence is admissible to show who the testator was in the habit of considering in the character described in the will." Where it appeared on the face of the will itself that in some parts of it the testatrix had used the term "nieces" to describe her great nieces, a similar construction was placed upon the words nephews and nieces in another part of the same will, so as to include great nephews and nieces, though in that case it did not depend upon extrinsic evidence: (James v. Smith, 14 Sim. 214.) If, then, this head of evidence be admissible, as we think it is, it distinctly appears from the case that the testator here was in the habit of calling the defendant his nephew, and, as his name was Joseph Grant, he would, in this view also, answer the description in the testator's will of "My nephew, Joseph Grant." The defendant has thus, as it seems to us, satisfactorily shown that the words of the will may apply either to him or to the plaintiff; and then, as there is nothing in the will itself, or upon the evidence to which we have hitherto adverted, to show which of those was the person intended to be described, and to whom the testator intended the words to apply, the further parol evidence as to the testator's knowledge and other circumstances became admissible; and upon such of that evidence as was properly admissible it is not disputed that the defendant was in fact the person intended to be described by the testator. Under these circumstances, the parol evidence being admissible for the purposes and in the manner which we have pointed out, we think it exposed a latent ambiguity and equally removed it; and it enables us to understand the language of the will, and to apply it as the testator is clearly shown to have intended, viz., in favour of the defendant. This view is in accordance with the decision of Lord Penzance, and we give our judgment for the defendant.

SYKES AND ANOTHER (EXECUTORS) v. SYKES AND ANOTHER.

Executor—Probate—Executor de son tort.

The executors of A., before proving the will, appointed B. to hold and manage the estate of A., as their agent.

Held, that B. could not be sued as executor de son tort of A.

This was an action brought by the executors of Ellen Sykes, deceased, against Sir T. Sykes, the sheriff of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and Love, an execution-creditor, for a wrongful execution levied on the goods of the testatrix. The declaration was in trover and trespass.

The defendant, Sir T. Sykes, pleaded the general issue and a justification under a fi. fa.

At the trial before Cleasby, B., at the last summer assizes at Leeds, it appeared that the plaintiffs were the executors of Ellen Sykes, deceased. Ellen Sykes had carried on the business of a manufacturing chemist in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and had died in March 1868. Her brother, J. H. Shaw, had managed the business during her lifetime, and at her death the executors, without proving the will, continued him in the management.

Under these circumstances, the defendant Love sued J. H. Shaw, as executor of Ellen Sykes, upon a bill of exchange. J. H. Shaw suffered judgment by default. A writ of fi. fa. was thereupon sued out by Love against J. H. Shaw, as executor of Ellen Sykes, and the defendant Sykes, as sheriff of the county, executed the writ, through his office, by seizure and sale of part of the goods of the late Ellen Sykes in the chemical factory. The plaintiffs then, after the sale, proved the will as executor and executrix of Ellen Sykes, and brought this action.

On these facts Cleasby, B. directed a verdict for the defendant Love, and as regarded the defendant Sykes, left it to the jury to say whether J. H. Shaw had been acting as the agent of the plaintiffs, or whether he had interfered in the management of the personal estate of Ellen Sykes without authority. The jury found that J. H. Shaw had acted as the agent of the executor and executrix, and the damages being assessed at 100*l.*, the learned judge directed a verdict to that amount to be entered against the defendant Sykes, reserving to him leave to move.

Field, Q.C., accordingly, on the part of the defendant Sykes, obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict for them should not be set aside, and a nonsuit or verdict for the defendant Sykes be entered.

Kemplay showed cause.—The question upon which the determination of this case turns, is whether, when the executor named and appointed in the will, without taking out probate, puts the goods of the testator into the hands of an agent to hold for him, that agent becomes an executor de son tort, so that the goods are liable to be taken in execution, at any time before the executor proves the will, on a judgment against the agent as executor. [Field, Q. C.—If the executors named in the will had proved the will, I could not possibly contend that J. H. Shaw was executor de son tort.] An executor de son tort, is defined by Swinburne as "He who takes upon himself the office of executor by intrusion, not being so constituted by the deceased, nor, for want of such constitution, substituted by the court to administer;" (Williams on Executors, 6th edit. 247, note a.) The executor named in the will may do many things before taking out probate, and amongst other things he may appoint an agent to take care of and deal with the testator's property. If he can do so, then J. H. Shaw was not an executor de son tort. In Hall v. Elliot, 1 Peake, N. P. C. 119, Lord Kenyon, C. J. held, that a man who possesses himself of the effects of the deceased under the authority of and as agent for the rightful executor, cannot be charged as executor de son tort. In Hooper v. Summersett, Wight. 16, the wife was appointed executrix, and for some time before she took out probate the husband intermeddled with and managed the testator's goods. He was held to be executor de son tort, but then he had been acting of his own authority; if it had been found that he was acting as agent of his wife, the case would have been decided the other way. In Sharland v. Mildon, 5 Hare, 468; 15 L. J., N. S., 434, Ch., the Vice-Chancellor was wrong in considering an executor de son tort as a tortfeasor, and besides, that case does not apply, as the person under whose authority Hewish acted never was executor at all. Cottle v. Aldrich, 4 M. & S. 175, shows that Cleasby, B. was quite right in the directions he gave to the jury. [BOVILL, C. J.—That case seems decisive of the question.] He cited also

Paul v. Simpson, 9 Q. B. 365;

Webster v. Webster, 10 Ves. 93;

Padget v. Priest, 2 T. R. 97;

Hill v. Curtis, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; 35 L. J. 133, Ch.

Field, Q.C. and Forbes, in support of the rule, relied mainly on the fact that the goods of the deceased were in the apparent possession of J. H. Shaw, who, according to the plaintiff's case, was acting as uncontrolled owner of them by their permission. Under these circumstances, against whom had creditors a remedy if not against Shaw? If that were not so, Sharland v. Mildon and Webster v. Webster, (ubi sup.) were clearly authorities to show that, in point of law, J. H. Shaw was executor de son tort.

BOVILL, C. J.—In the original action the defendant Love entered up judgment against J. H. Shaw, as executor to Ellen Sykes. Love issued execution, and the writ directed the sheriff to levy on the goods of Ellen Sykes in the hands of J. H. Shaw as executor. The sheriff accordingly seized and sold the goods in question. The goods were undoubtedly part of the estate of the late Ellen Sykes, and they were in the possession of J. H. Shaw. The question for us to decide is, whether, at the time of the seizure, they were in his hands to be administered by him as executor. The late Ellen Sykes had appointed the plaintiffs executor and executrix, and they had acted as such; but they did not prove the will until after the acts complained of had been done. The question left to the jury was whether, at the time of the seizure and sale, the goods of Ellen Sykes were in the hands of J. H. Shaw as agent of the plaintiffs, it being the contention of the plaintiffs that they were so, or whether he had possessed himself of them without authority, so as to make himself liable as executor de son tort. The evidence was conflicting, but the jury found in favour of the plaintiffs' contention. We must take their verdict as conclusive of that question. I am of opinion that this was the proper question to be left to the jury, according to the decision of the court of King's Bench in Cottle v. Aldrich (ubi sup.) The question there was almost identical with that which arises in the present case, whether or no the defendant had been acting as the agent of an executor who had not proved the will. The jury found that he had voluntarily interfered as executor without authority. But, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury in the present case, Mr. Field has argued that, as Shaw was in possession of the goods, he was executor de son tort, and must be treated as such. The question therefore arises, whether Shaw was in possession in that capacity. The jury have found as a fact that he was in possession as agent to the executors. If Shaw were the plaintiff in this action, he would be estopped from denying that he was executor, as he has suffered judgment in that character. No doubt, if he had acted without the authority of the plaintiffs, the defendant would have been justified in seizing the goods of Ellen Sykes in his possession. But the finding of the jury is against such a supposition. The defendant, in order to succeed, must show that the plaintiffs, before taking out probate, were wrongdoers in dealing with the goods of the deceased. If they can show that, then, as the relation of principal and agent cannot subsist between wrongdoers, J. H. Shaw was also a wrongdoer, and was consequently executor de son tort, so that the sheriff was justified. This depends then on what is the position of executors before probate. Executors obtain their title from the will, whereas administrators gain theirs from the ordinary. Executors have exactly the same powers before as after probate. Their title is just as good, and in short they have precisely the same powers in every respect, except in certain matters regarding suits, when probate is required as evidence of their title. If acts done by executors before probate are lawful acts, acts done by their agents are equally lawful. It is true that when the will is proved, a stranger, who intermeddles with the estate, cannot be charged as executor de son tort, and that if he so intermeddles before probate, he may be charged. The reason, however, is clear. If persons act as executors before probate, they cannot afterwards deny the fact of their being executors. When an executor is sued before probate he is not called executor de son tort in the writ, but he is at the trial estopped from denying that he is executor, and is called executor de son tort. But it does not follow from that, that either he or his agent is a wrongdoer. In point of fact, neither is. If his acts are lawful, the acts of his agent are equally so, if they are acts authorised by him, and such as he himself might have done. If the executor prove the will, and employ an agent to meddle with the estate, the agent cannot be treated as executor de son tort. Moreover, if a person be appointed executor in a will, he has a legal title, and can appoint an agent to act for him, and when the agent has so acted he cannot be treated as executor de son tort. In Hooper v. Summersett (ubi sup.) it was not pretended that the husband was acting as the agent of his wife. He was acting as of his own authority, and consequently was held executor de son tort. If it had been shown that he was acting as the agent of his wife, the executrix, then, although the wife did not prove the will till afterwards, the case would have been decided the other way, as appears by the case of Cottle v. Aldrich (ubi sup.) The question in the latter case was whether the defendant, who, prior to the death of J. A. (an executor who had proved) had acted as agent of J. A. in meddling with the testator's estate, and who after the death of J. A., continued to meddle with the estate, was acting after the death of J. A. of his own authority or as the agent of one Denton, another executor, who had not proved the will, but who after the death of J. A. was the rightful representative of the testator. In Hall v. Elliot (ubi sup.), it was held, that a man who possessed himself of the goods of a testator by the authority of the rightful executor, cannot be charged as executor de son tort. Where a person intermeddles in the affairs of a deceased, and his servant, by his orders and direction, sells part of the goods of the deceased, and pays over the proceeds to the master, not only the master but the servant also is liable to be charged as executor de son tort. That was decided in Padget v. Priest (ubi sup.) That rule is, however, subject to the qualification stated by the present Lord Chancellor, in Hill v. Curtis (ubi sup.), that, if an executor de son tort can prove a settled account with the rightful representative before suit, it is a sufficient answer to a bill in equity for an account. In that case, in answer to a bill for an account filed against him as executor de son tort, the defendant pleaded that he had acted as agent for the rightful administratrix, and had subsequently fully accounted to her. There Wood, V.C. said: "Here the agency did exist, supposing that the lady at that time were acting wrongfully. She was acting wrongfully, and therefore at that time there could be no agency; but the moment she acquired a rightful title, the title related back to all her intermediate acts. And why not to the appointment of agent as well as to her other acts?" It is not necessary now to inquire into what may be the rule as to the employment of an agent by one of the next of kin, before taking out letters of administration; suffice it to say that, if the rule laid down by the Lord Chancellor be correct, the agent of an executor before probate would a fortiori be justified. Mr. Field has relied mainly on the case of Sharland v. Mildon (ubi sup.) There a widow, intending to take out letters of administration to her late husband, began to collect his assets before taking out administration, and employed one Hewish to collect her husband's debts. The widow died shortly after, without ever having obtained administration. Wigram, V.C. treated the widow, and consequently Hewish, as a tortfeasor. That, however, is not the case here. The executors are not proved to have been tortfeasors at all. If that had been proved, Shaw would undoubtedly have been a tortfeasor. Sharland v. Mildon was decided on the authority of Padget v. Priest (ubi sup.) The latter case, however, was one of intestacy, and both Porter and Priest were clearly wrongdoers. Here, however, Shaw was appointed manager by the persons named as executors in the will. Sharland v. Mildon is spoken of by the Lord Chancellor as rightly decided, but he applied the doctrine of trusts to the case of an agent acting for a person, before he has obtained administration. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the executors before probate can lawfully appoint an agent to carry on their business, and that this rule must be discharged.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant Love entered up judgment by default against J. H. Shaw, as executor of Ellen Sykes, and then issued execution. The writ of fi. fa., which in terms followed the judgment, directed the sheriff to seize and sell the goods of the late Ellen Sykes in the hands of Shaw. This the sheriff did. There can be no doubt that Shaw was bound by the judgment, and if he were the plaintiff in the present action, he would be estopped from denying that he was the executor of Ellen Sykes, and that the goods in question were in his hands as executor. The present plaintiffs, however, are the real executors of Ellen Sykes, and they say that the goods, on which the sheriff levied, are their goods as such executors, and that they were in possession of J. H. Shaw as their agent, and that J. H. Shaw was in no sense an executor. The question for our determination is whether the goods in question were in possession of J. H. Shaw as executor, so as to render them liable to be seized by the sheriff under a judgment against him as executor. The jury found that the plaintiffs employed Shaw as their agent to manage the business, and that the goods were in his possession as such agent. It is, however, contended on behalf of the sheriff that, notwithstanding this circumstance, the goods were liable to be seized, because the executors had not at that time proved the will, so that they could not appoint an agent, and J. H. Shaw was consequently executor de son tort. There is no doubt that he was in possession of the goods, not as a tortfeasor, but under the authority of the executors named in the will; and unless the mere fact of executors acting before proving the will makes them tortfeasors, and consequently makes Shaw executor de son tort, the sheriff does not make good his defence. Now executors have the same power to act before as after taking out probate. Probate is only the evidence of their title, not the title itself. For instance, executors may issue a writ, and proceed with an action before taking out probate. It is quite sufficient, so long as they take out probate before the trial. It therefore follows that executors can properly dispose of property before probate. If they can do that, they can appoint agents to do it in their stead. This act of theirs cannot be treated as wrongful, nor does it make them wrongdoers. Doubts seem to have arisen as to the position of an executor before probate, and some people seem to have thought that, because an executor before probate may be treated as an executor de son tort, he must, therefore, have been a wrongdoer in possessing himself of the testator's goods. Where an executor, named in the will, is, on account of his having intermeddled with the testator's property, sued before probate as executor, he is estopped from denying his executorship. It seems to me that in such a case it would be more proper to term him executor by estoppel than executor de son tort. I think the whole misapprehension has arisen from regarding such an executor as a wrongdoer. The term executor de son tort ought not to be applied to an executor named in the will. On these grounds, I think that these goods were not in the hands of J. H. Shaw as executor, and, consequently, that this verdict must stand.

BRETT, J.—It has been contended that J. H. Shaw must be regarded as executor de son tort, rather than as the agent of the executors named in the will, because the executors, when they purported to delegate their authority to him, were wrongdoers, not having proved the will. Further it is argued that the executors must be treated as wrongdoers until they have proved the will. I am, however, of opinion that executors appointed in the will can never be treated as wrongdoers. Mr. Field was obliged to contend that the case of Cottle v. Aldrich, in which the question was left to the jury whether the defendant voluntarily interfered with the goods of C. A. without any authority, or acted merely as the agent of the executor who had not proved, was wrongly decided. In Sharland v. Mildon the conclusion was arrived at that Hewish had acted as the servant of the testator's widow. He was held to be executor de son tort; but there the widow was not executrix. That is perfectly intelligible, and perfectly consistent with Cottle v. Aldrich. Besides, there are reasons why a court of equity would decide that such a person must remain a party to the suit. On these grounds, I am of opinion that the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

Reported by H. LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Tuesday, Feb. 8.

(Before BOVILL, C. J., and MELLOR, M. SMITH, LUSH, HANNEN, and BRETT, JJ.)

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (apps.)
v. DE LANCEY (resp.)

Revenue—Legacy or succession duty—Bequest of money to be laid out on land—What duty payable thereon—Equitable conversion—Doctrine of not applicable to purposes of revenue—Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), ss. 2, 7, 19—Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 18, 30—Construction.

By will, in 1799, a testator bequeathed a sum of money to trustees, upon trust therewith to purchase land, to be settled to the use of his elder son Charles for life, with remainder to the first and other sons successively of Charles, in tail male; and in default of such issue to the use of his son James for life, with remainder to the first and other sons of James successively in tail male; and in default of such issue then to his own right heirs for ever." The testator died in 1800, leaving two sons, Charles, his heir-at-law, and James. Charles died in 1840, and James in 1857, each of them dying a bachelor and intestate. The money was never laid out in land, but the dividends arising therefrom were duly paid to Charles and James successively during their respective lives. At James's death the only surviving lineal descendant of the testator was the testator's daughter, Susan, who then became absolutely entitled to the fund in question, and who died a spinster and intestate in 1866, having always refused to receive any part of either the dividends or principal of the said fund. In an administration suit, after her death, the following facts were found and certified: that at the testator's death his heir-at-law was his eldest son, Charles; that the person now entitled to any real estate, of which the testator might have died intestate, was the respondent, a grandson of a deceased brother of the testator; that at Charles's death his heir-at-law was James; and that at James's death his heir-at-law was Susan; and that at Susan's death her heir-at-law was the respondent, who was the heir-at-law of Charles, James, and Susan respectively, and the person now entitled to any real estate of which they respectively might have died intestate; and that none of the persons who would for the time being have been entitled to any real estate of which the testator had died intestate did, while so entitled, any act with reference to the said real estate fund, amounting to, or having the effect of, an election to take it as money or land, or which might have the effect of constituting such person a new root of descent, with regard to such fund.

The Commissioners of Inland Revenue having assessed the respondent in succession duty at 5 per cent. on the real estate fund as "a succession to him derived from Susan the predecessor (of a brother of the father of whom he was a descendant)," the respondent appealed to the Court of Exchequer against the assessment, on the grounds—first, that, not succession duty but, legacy duty only at 2½ per cent. by virtue of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, was payable by him, as a descendant of a brother of the testator who died in 1800; or, secondly, that if succession duty was payable, it was payable at 3 per cent. as upon a succession from the testator, and not from Susan. The Court of Exchequer held that the assessment made by the commissioners under the Succession Duty Act was void, inasmuch as the fund, not having been laid out in land, was liable to legacy duty under sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), and succession duty did not attach, and therefore they gave judgment for the respondent.

And now, upon appeal by the commissioners from that decision, it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer Chamber (affirming the decision of the court below), that the assessment of the respondent in succession duty could not be supported. The respondent, at the time he became entitled to the fund in question was "a person entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession of the real estate to be purchased therewith," if the fund had been so laid out, and so came within both the words and the spirit of sect. 19 of the 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, and was therefore chargeable with legacy duty on the amount of the fund, under that section.

The doctrine of equity, that personalty directed to be laid out in land is to be treated as land applies as between the parties, and for the purpose of giving effect to their intention and executing the trusts, but the Crown is not entitled to avail itself of such doctrine for purposes of revenue. The explanation and application of that doctrine by Lord Langdale, M.R., in Watson v. Swift, 8 Beav. 368; 14 L. J., N. S., 354, and by Wigram, V.C. in Custance v. Bradshaw, 4 Hare 315; 14 L. J., N. S., 358, Ch., commented on and approved.

The Attorney-General v. Brunning, in the House of Lords, 8 H. of L. Cas. 243; 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 36; 30 L. J. 379, Ex., discussed and distinguished.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Exchequer, setting aside an assessment of succession duty made by the appellants upon the respondent, whereby the respondent was charged with duty at five per cent., and under section 59 of the Crown Suits Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 104), the following case has been stated by the parties for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

1. James De Lancey, by his will dated 15th Nov. 1799, gave and bequeathed unto trustees, and to the survivors and survivor of them, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the capital sum of 1000*l.*, Three per Cent. Consolidated Bank Annuities, and also all such several sum or sums of money which might be due to him at the time of his decease in Exchequer Bills, Navy Bills, India Bonds, or any other public floating securities, upon trust that they his said trustees, and the survivors and survivor of them, his executors, administrators, or assigns, should lay out and invest both principal and interest moneys therefrom arising in the purchase of lands, tenements, and hereditaments situate, lying, and being in that part of Great Britain called England, the same to be of the nature of freehold or copyhold, convenient to be held therewith, and of no other estate or tenure whatsoever, and convey, settle, and assure the said lands, tenements, and hereditaments so to be purchased as aforesaid, or cause and procure the same to be conveyed, settled, and assured, to the uses and subject to the provisos following, that is to say, to the use of his eldest son Charles Stephen De Lancey and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to his said trustees and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of the said Charles Stephen De Lancey, and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies lawfully to be begotten, successively in tail male, and in default of such issue, to the use of testator's son, James De Lancey, and his assigns for life, without impeachment of waste, remainder to his said trustees and their heirs, to preserve contingent remainders, remainder to the first and other sons of the said James De Lancey, and the heirs male of his and their body and bodies lawfully to be begotten, successively in tail male, and in default of such issue then to his own right heirs for ever.

2. The testator died on the 8th April 1800, without having revoked or altered his will, which was shortly afterwards proved in the Prerogative Court of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

3. The testator left two sons, the elder of whom was Charles Stephen De Lancey, his heir-at-law, and the younger was James De Lancey.

4. The sum of 10,000*l.* Consols and the other securities directed to be laid out in the purchase of real estate (represented by 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols) were never so laid out.

5. Charles Stephen De Lancey died a bachelor and intestate on the 6th May 1840. The dividends on the two sums of 10,000*l.* and 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*, representing the real estate fund in the will mentioned, were paid to him during his life.

6. James De Lancey, who survived his elder brother, died a bachelor and intestate, on the 26th May, 1857. The dividends on the real estate fund were paid to him during his life.

7. At the death of James De Lancey (the son), the only surviving lineal descendant of the testator was his daughter Susan De Lancey.

8. Susan De Lancey died on the 7th April 1866, a spinster and intestate.

9. Susan De Lancey did not receive, but on the contrary refused to receive either the dividends or the principal of the real estate fund.

10. Shortly after Susan De Lancey's death, the two sums representing the real estate fund, and also the dividends thereon from the death of James De Lancey the son (including the dividend of July 1857, being the next dividend which accrued after his death), to the death of Susan De Lancey (including the dividend of Jan. 1866, being the last dividend which accrued before her death) were, along with other property derived from the testator, paid into the Court of Chancery, and in certain suits instituted for the purpose of administering the said funds and property the following facts were proved, and were certified by the chief clerk of his Lordship the Master of the Rolls.

11. The heir-at-law of the testator, at the time of his death was Charles Stephen De Lancey, his elder son. The person now such heir-at-law and entitled to any real estate of which the testator might have died intestate was the respondent, who is a grandson of John Peter De Lancey, a brother of the testator. The heir-at-law of Charles Stephen De Lancey at the time of his death was his brother James De Lancey. The heir-at-law of James De Lancey at the time of his death was his sister Susan De Lancey. The heir-at-law of Susan De Lancey at the time of her death was and is the respondent. The person now entitled to any real estate of which Charles Stephen De Lancey, James De Lancey (the son), and Susan De Lancey respectively might have died intestate, and the heir-at-law of them respectively was the respondent. None of the persons who would for the time being have been entitled to any real estate of which the testator had died intestate did, while so entitled, any act with reference to either or any part of the two sums of 10,000*l.* and 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols, representing the real estate fund by the testator's will directed to be laid out in the purchase of land, which might amount to or have the effect of an election to take such several sums or any part thereof as money or as land, or which might have the effect of constituting such person or persons a new root or new roots of descent with regard to the several sums or any part thereof.

12. It was afterwards ordered by the Court of Chancery that the two sums of 10,000*l.* and 3047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* which represented the real estate fund should (subject to duty) be transferred to the respondent, and that the dividends thereon since the death of Susan De Lancey should be paid to him, the dividends thereon from the death of the said James De Lancey the son, up to the death of Susan

De Lancey, being ordered to be paid to her legal personal representative.

13. On the 3rd Aug. 1868, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue made an assessment upon the respondent, whereby he was required to pay succession duty at 5 per cent. on the aggregate sum of 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols, together with the dividends thereon, since the death of Susan De Lancey as aforesaid, on the ground of the same being a succession derived by him from Susan De Lancey (the predecessor) of the brother of the father of whom the respondent was a descendant.

14. The respondent being dissatisfied with the assessment, delivered to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue due notice of his intention to appeal to the Court of Exchequer against the assessment, and also delivered the following statement of the grounds of his appeal:—

First, that legacy duty, and not succession duty, was payable by him in respect of the said 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols and the said dividends, and that such legacy duty was payable by him at the rate of 2½ per cent. by virtue of the Act 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, as a descendant of a brother of the testator, who died in the year 1800; or, secondly, that if succession duty and not legacy duty was payable by the respondent in respect of the said 13,047*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* Consols and the said dividends, such succession duty was payable by him at the rate of 3 per cent., and not at the rate of 5 per cent., as upon a succession derived by him from the testator, and not from Susan De Lancey.

15. The Court of Exchequer, on the 2nd July 1869, gave judgment for the respondent, and by an order of that date declared that the assessment made upon the respondent on the 3rd Aug. 1868 by the appellants under the Succession Duty Act 1853, was void, and directed that the costs of the respondent should be paid to him by the appellants.

16. The question for the court is, whether the judgment of the Court of Exchequer is right. If this question be answered in the negative, the court shall give such judgment as ought to have been given by the Court of Exchequer. If this question be answered in the affirmative, the judgment of the Court of Exchequer shall be affirmed.

The Acts of Parliament, and the various sections of them upon which the questions in the case hinged, and which were cited and referred to in the arguments and judgment, are the Legacy Duty Act of 1796 (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), ss. 2, 7, and 19; and the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 18, and 30, and which, so far as they are material to this report, are as follows:

The Legacy Duty Act (36 Geo. 3, c. 52), s. 2, imposed upon every legacy of 20*l.* or more given by any will of any person out of his personal estate; and upon the clear residue of the personal estate of every person dying testate or intestate, of the value of 100*l.*, after payment of debts, &c., whether the title to such residue should accrue by virtue of any testamentary disposition or upon intestacy, the duties therein specified; e.g., where such legacy or residue should leave to a brother or sister of the deceased, or their descendants, a duty of 2*l.* per cent.; to a brother or sister of the father or mother of the deceased and their descendants, 8*l.* per cent.; and so on, specifying different rates of charge for persons in other degrees of relationship to the deceased.

Sect. 7:

That any gift by any will or testamentary instrument of any person dying after the passing of this Act, which shall, by virtue of such will or testamentary instrument, have effect or be satisfied out of the personal estate of such person so dying, or out of any personal estate which such person shall have power to dispose of as he or she shall think fit, shall be deemed and taken to be a legacy within the intent and meaning of this Act, whether the same shall be given by way of annuity or in any other form, and whether the same shall be charged only on such personal estate, or charged also on real estate of the testator or testatrix who shall give the same; except so far as the same shall be paid or satisfied out of such real estate, in a due execution of the will or testamentary instrument by which the same shall be given; and every gift which shall take effect as a donatio mortis causa shall also be deemed a legacy within the intent and meaning of this Act.

Sect. 19:

That any sum of money, or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate shall be charged and pay duty as personal estate, unless the same shall be so given as to be enjoyed by different persons in succession, and then each person entitled thereto in succession shall pay duty for the same in the same manner as if the same had not been directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, unless the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate before such duty accrued; but no duty shall accrue in respect thereof after the same shall have been actually applied in the purchase of real estate for so much as shall have been so applied. Provided, nevertheless, that, in case before the same, or some part thereof, shall be so applied any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase.

The Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51.) By sect. 2:

Every past or future disposition of property by reason whereof any person has or shall become beneficially entitled to any property or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying after the time appointed for the commencement of this Act, either immediately or after an interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and every devolution by law of any beneficial interest in property, or the income thereof, upon the death of any person dying, &c., &c., to any other person in possession or expectancy, shall be deemed to have conferred, or confer, on the person entitled by reason of any such disposition or devolution, or "succession;" and the term "succession" shall denote the person so entitled; and the term "predecessor" shall denote the settlor, disposer, testator, obligor, ancestor, or other person from whom the interest of the "successor" is or shall be derived.

By sect. 18 (the exemption clause):

No person charged with the duties on legacies and shares of personal estate, under the Legacy Duty Acts, in respect of any property subject to such duties, shall be charged also with the duty granted by this Act, in respect of the same acquisition of the same property.

Sect. 30:

The interest of any succession in personal property, subject to any trusts for the investments thereof in the purchase of real property to which the successor would be absolutely entitled, shall, so far as the same shall not be chargeable with duty under the Legacy Duty Acts be chargeable with duty under this Act as personal property; and personal property subject to any trust for the investments thereof in the purchase of real property to which the successor would not be absolutely entitled, shall, so far as the same shall not be chargeable with duty under the Legacy Duty Acts be chargeable with duty under this Act as real property; and for the purposes of this Act each successor's interest therein shall be considered to be of the value of an annuity payable during his life, or for any less period during which he shall be entitled, equal in amount to the annual produce of the actual trust property at the time of his becoming entitled in possession, whether the same shall be the real property directed to be purchased, or any intermediate investment of the personal property directed to be invested in such purchase.

The case is reported below 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58; 38 L. J. 193, Ex.; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 345.

Crompton Hutton (with whom were the Attorney-General, Sir R. P. Collier, Q. C., and the Solicitor-General, Sir J. D. Coleridge, Q. C.) argued the case on the part of the appellants, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue. In the court below, the Lord Chief Baron and Channell, B., held that the petitioner (the respondent) was liable to be assessed to legacy duty, whilst Bramwell and Cleasby, BB., were of opinion that the duty payable by the petitioner was that which the commissioners contended for, viz., succession duty at 5 per cent. The court being thus equally divided, Cleasby, B., the junior baron, withdrew, and judgment passed against the commissioners, who thereupon brought the present appeal. The important enactments bearing on the case were sects. 7 and 19 of the Legacy Duty Act of 1796 (36 Geo. 3, c. 52) and sect. 30 of the Succession Duty Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51). The first-mentioned Act, which was the Legacy Duty Act in operation at the testator's death in 1799, imposed no duty on devolutions or gifts in the direct line from parent to child; but in subsequent Acts a duty of 1 per cent. on such gifts and devolutions was imposed, and the duty on the same, as between brothers and sisters and their descendants, was raised from 2½ to 3 per cent. The fund here was not a legacy under the will within either sects. 2 or 7 of the Act of Geo. 3, inasmuch as it was not such a gift as could "by virtue of such will have effect (or be satisfied out of the personal estate of such person so dying," &c. (sect. 7). The will was exhausted immediately upon the ultimate remainder first vesting, and the subsequent takers have taken as heirs-at-law. The question before the court arises upon the ultimate limitation "in default of such issue, then to his own right heirs for ever." Being a gift of money, it would not go to the heir quâ heir, but to the person who at the testator's death filled that capacity, viz., his eldest son Charles, in whom it instantly vested, subject to be divested on either Charles or James having children capable of taking under the gift of the estate tail. It was then satisfied once and for ever, and had no further effect as part of the will. Charles might have sold or willed this away, subject to its being divested as before mentioned. In the event which happened, it went to James as Charles's heir, and not as heir of the testator; and at James's death it went to Susan in like manner as James's heir. Secondly, there was a conversion "out and out," but for which, on the failure of heirs of Charles and James, it would have become money again. But being directed to be laid out on land, equity, holding what is agreed to be done as done, treats it as land and not as money. By virtue of that equitable spell it continues as land until some one breaks the charm by electing to take it as money. [BOVILL, C. J.—It is not the character of the property, but rather the nature of the title to it, that is altered by the doctrine of the court of equity.] Paragraph 12 of the case shows that equity so regards it, by decreeing the dividends, from James's death to Susan's death, to be paid to her personal representatives, but the whole of the fund and the dividends subsequent to her death to be transferred to the respondent. [BOVILL, C. J.—Is it, in fact, anything more than that the Court of Chancery directs that the money shall be paid to the persons to whom it would have gone had it been laid out in land, according to the equitable rule you have already referred to?] Sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act of the 36 Geo. 3, bears out the argument on the part of the Crown. [BOVILL, C. J.—If your proposition be a true one generally, then that section was unnecessary.] That I contend is in the appellants' favour. That section and the proviso apply only to bequests of money to be laid out in land by virtue of a will; the words there used, "given" and "bequest" "by virtue of any bequest thereof as such," imply that. [BOVILL, C. J.—The substance and scheme of the Act is that until it is laid out in land it shall, for revenue purposes, be dealt with as personalty. By sect. 2 duties are imposed on personal property passing by will or intestacy; and sect. 19 merely declares what shall be personal estate.] But a duty cannot be imposed on a subject by equitable construction or implication. The respondent is in the position of an heir taking by descent. [M. SMITH, J.—Taking by descent from Susan, who took by descent from James, who took by descent from Charles. Was not sect. 19 intended to prevent

THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE (apps.) v. DE LANCY (resp.)

persons' so taking from escaping duty?] If so, then quod voluit non dixit. Had the Legacy Duty Act used language as clear and explicit as sect. 30 of the Succession Duty Act, which enacts that the interest of any successor in personal property, subject to any trusts for investment in the purchase of real property, shall be chargeable with duty as personal property, there would have been no doubt. [BOVILL, C. J.—The language there used was necessary with reference to other sections in that Act; but that is not so with regard to the Legacy Duty Act.] The respondent takes this as Susan's heir, and as land; and the court must recognise the equitable doctrine that for every purpose this is land. If Susan had died in debt, all this estate fund would have been chargeable with her debts; and had she left husband he would have been tenant by the curtesy of the dividends, or, if land, out of the rents. [MELLOR, J.—At the date of this Act land escaped taxation, and the Legislature were doubtless aware that money to be laid out in land escaped it also, as land, and so they determined that, as long as it was money in fact, though deemed for purposes of devolution to be land, it should pay duty as personalty.] Yes, no doubt, so long as it passed under the will. [BRETT, J.—Is not the second part of sect. 19 wrongly called a proviso? It is not a limitation, but rather an enlargement of the first part of the section, and should be read rather as "and further." LUSH, J.—Do you admit that if the case is governed by sect. 19, the legacy duty is only 2½ per cent.?] Certainly not. The learned barons, Bramwell and Cleasby, thought 5 per cent. was the duty payable. [He cited Doe d. Pilkington v. Spratt, 5 B. & Ad. 731; 3 L. J., N. S., 53, K. B., quoted in 2 Jarm. Wills, p. 77, 3rd edit., where also other cases are collected, showing that the death of the testator or ancestor is the moment or period at which the heir is to be ascertained, and the gift or remainder to him is to vest.]

Sir J. B. Karlake, Q. C. (with him was W. H. Townsend, of the Chancery Bar), contra, for the respondent. The case comes strictly within sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act of 1796, and succession duty is not payable under sect. 30 of the Succession Duty Act. It is said, on the part of the Crown, that the will was exhausted, and that everything and everybody passed and took by descent. But the will was still in operation, there was a trust still subsisting, and trustees still liable and bound to invest this money if called on by the respondent so to do. But for sect. 19 this money, being personalty, would have paid legacy duty within sects. 2 and 7. The scheme of the Act, as regards legacies, should be considered. [He read sect. 7.] If it were necessary to the argument, it would not be difficult to argue that the trustees here have (the executors assenting) a sum of money handed over to them as part of the personalty for the benefit of the legatees. It cannot be supposed when the Legislature were providing expressly for the payment of duty on personal estate, and when they were well aware of the equitable doctrine which has been referred to, as to equitable conversion exempting such property from duty, that they should have intended that such money land should go on as personalty from generation to generation, and yet escape duty altogether. The argument on the part of the appellants in the court below was that as soon as the fund "came home," or reached a person absolutely entitled to it in specie, the will was exhausted, and that was the view taken by Cleasby, B. But, as the Lord Chief Baron observed, to make that good it was necessary to interpolate words in the 19th section. That section does not say the first person, but any person who shall "become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession," &c., shall be chargeable with the same duty, and, as his Lordship said, the plaintiff is such a person, and why, when two persons successively have become entitled to such an estate of inheritance, should "either of the two more than the other be exempted from liability to this duty?" Giving the plain meaning to the words of the section which they naturally import, the argument of the appellant on this part of the case fails utterly. It is solely by virtue of the will still existing that the respondent takes; nothing having been done to alter the nature of the property, it remains a fund impressed under the will with the trust for investment. Upon the 2nd, 7th, and 19th sections of the Act of Geo. 3, the case depends, and the respondent contends that it clearly falls within sect. 19. With regard to the second point, as to the liability to succession duty. [BOVILL, C. J.—We need not trouble you, Sir Jahn, upon that.]

C. Hutton, in reply.—The question is, does sect. 19 of the Legacy Duty Act include land taken by a person as heir? As to sect. 7 of that Act it is impossible to make out, if this really be real property, that this section could attach to it, and sect. 19 clearly does not apply. The Crown, therefore, is entitled to succession duty as assessed by the commissioners.

BOVILL, C. J.—It is not disputed in this case that, if the property in question is not liable to legacy duty, it is liable to succession duty; and equally that if it is liable to legacy duty, it is not liable to succession duty. The question, therefore, really depends upon whether the property was liable to legacy duty, and whether the respondent was liable or not to be assessed to that duty. If he was, then the commissioners having assessed him to succession duty, have assessed him wrongly, and the assessment cannot be supported, and the appeal must be dismissed. The fund in question is a fund still existing as personalty in the hands of the trustees of the testator's will. It was personalty at the time of his death, and it has continued to be personalty from that time to the present; and at the date at which it is contended on the part of the Crown that duty was payable, it was, and at this moment is, personalty in the hands of the trustees of the will, and liable to the trusts therein contained. Under these circumstances, the argument on the part of the Crown has proceeded upon the ground that by reason of the provisions of the will, and the still existing trusts which required the fund to be laid out in land, it is by an equitable construction to be treated as land for all purposes, including the liability to succession duty, which duty it is contended by the Crown will attach to it as land, though it should not be liable to legacy duty. Now it seems to me that the argument with regard to property of this kind, which is directed to be laid out in land, being treated as land, has been pressed far beyond its legitimate and proper limits. It has been said that the Court of Chancery treats personalty which is directed to be laid out in land as land for all purposes; and in one sense that is true. But the language which is thus employed is simply figurative and metaphorical. That was explained very clearly by Lord Langdale, M.R., in the case of Matson v. Swift, 8 Beav. 368; 14 L. J., N. S., 354, Ch., which was before him in 1845. It is a case which is the more important on the present occasion, because it arose upon the question whether or not probate duty was payable upon moneys arising from the sale of estates, which had been conveyed by the owner to trustees upon trust for sale, to pay off certain incumbrances upon them, and to pay the residue of such moneys to the owner, his executors, administrators, and assigns, "without any claim or equity thereon in favour of his heir or real representatives, notwithstanding that the trust estates should remain unconverted at his death." That case was rather the converse of the present case, because the property there existed as land at the owner's death, no part of it having, at that time, been sold; and the Crown claimed probate duty on the purchase-moneys arising from the subsequent sale of the estates, upon the ground that by the operation of the trust deed, and the established doctrine of equity, the real estates conveyed by such deed were converted out and out into personal estate, and ought to be treated as such for all purposes; and that, if the attributes of personalty for some purposes were given to real estate, there was no sufficient reason for not making it subject to all the incidents of personal estate, and, among others, to the liability to probate duty. Now Lord Langdale, in his judgment in that case, very clearly explained the principle upon which the Court of Chancery acts in matters of that kind. It was argued there, on the same principle as it has been argued here to-day, that the estates directed to be sold had been converted "out and out" into personal estate, and therefore were subject to, amongst other incidents of personalty, the liability to probate duty; but Lord Langdale explained that where property, which is either real or personal, is directed to be converted, or where there is a contract which would change its nature, that may have the effect of inducing the court to apply to the property, in whatever state it may be found, the rules of distribution which are commonly applicable to its converted condition, and his Lordship said: "In the cases where this is done, the owner is, in figurative or metaphorical language, said to have impressed upon his real estate the character of personalty, or to have converted, out and out, the realty into personalty. This language is used, and the court has occasion to apply the rules of distribution, in the manner I have noticed, only in cases where there has been no actual conversion by the owner; and it is important to observe that such application of these rules of distribution is and can be effected only by executing the trusts, expressed or implied, which the court enforces against all persons having any legal estate interfering with the apparent intention of the owner of the property, or opposed to the rights which he meant to confer." Lord Langdale then proceeded to say that "what is meant is, that, for purposes plainly contemplated by the owner, or for purposes necessary to the accomplishment of his apparent intention, and to give effect to the rights which he, expressly or by implication, meant to confer, the court will declare, or at least will impute, trusts, and under the execution of such trusts will distribute the property as if it were personalty." And in a later part of his judgment in the same case, his Lordship said: "In cases of this sort an ambiguity may have arisen from the figurative or metaphorical language in which the equitable doctrine is expressed." That being the doctrine of the Court of Chancery, and which applies in the enforcement of trusts, expressed or implied, the court was there asked by the Crown to apply that doctrine for the payment of Probate duty in the particular case. But Lord Langdale said: "We may reasonably ask the question whether, after a conveyance of land in trust to sell, or after valid contracts for the sale of land, and the death of the legal owners, the Crown can be entitled, for its own purposes only, to enforce the equities between the parties? If the parties should release each other, could the Crown, for purposes merely fiscal, not in the contemplation of any party, and not required to fulfil the intention of any party, be entitled to the benefit of trusts which are declared or acted upon only for the purpose of giving effect to the intention of the parties?" The court, in that case, was of opinion that the probate duty was not payable upon the purchase-money—that it was subject to trusts in equity, which would be enforced as if it were personalty, but that the Crown was not entitled to the benefit of any such doctrine for the purposes of revenue. That case having been so decided in Chancery, the question came some years afterwards, before the Court of Exchequer in the case of The Attorney-General v. Brunning, 4 H. & N. 94, and 28 L. J. 125 Ex., which was a case in which a question arose as to the effect of a contract by a deceased individual to sell certain land, and in which an attempt was made to enforce the Crown's claim for probate duty upon the amount of the purchase money. In giving their judgment the Court of Exchequer concurred with the view stated by Lord Langdale as to the conversion, that the Crown could not treat the property as personalty or claim probate duty in respect of the purchase money; no doubt that decision was afterwards reversed by the House of Lords on appeal: (See 8 H.L. Cas. 243; 3 L.T. Rep. N. S. 36; 30 L. J. 379, Ex.), but the observations and opinions expressed by the learned lords in reversing the decision of the Court of Exchequer do not at all interfere with the explanation and view of the doctrine of the equitable conversion as stated by Lord Langdale, in Matson v. Swift, and approved of by the Court of Exchequer in The Attorney-General v. Brunning, for which view and doctrine alone I have cited the case in question. The ground upon which the decision in the case of The Attorney-General v. Brunning was overruled in the House of Lords, was, that the money had been actually received after the death of the testator, and that it could only have been received as personal property, and that, therefore, probate duty attached. I find that, in the course of the judgment in that case, Lord Cranworth says, "the cases relied on, before Lord Langdale and Sir James Wigram, are clearly distinguishable from the present case. In Matson v. Swift, before Lord Langdale, the estate remained real estate at the death of the testator, and was only convertible into personalty by virtue of his direction; a direction it is true, declared, not by his will, but by a previous deed, but which he might have revoked or varied by his will, if he had thought fit, and the conversion into personalty, therefore, may truly be treated as having depended on his will. In Custance v. Bradshaw 4 Hare 315; 14 L. J., N. S., 358, Ch., Sir James Wigram proceeded on the same ground, namely, that at the death of the testator, the property in question was real estate, and that, if it was ever to lose that quality, it would be by some act to be done after the testator's death, and which might never become necessary." These cases, both in the court below and in the House of Lords, are authorities for showing that Mr. Crompton Hutton, in his argument, has carried to too great a length the doctrine of the Court of Chancery as to treating personalty which is directed to be laid out upon land as land. The principle, and its proper application and limitation, are so clearly stated by Lord Langdale that I cannot suppose that any court would interfere with it. Now the distinction is made by Lord Cranworth in the case before the House of Lords that in the particular circumstances the property remained as it was at the death of the testator. That observation applies exactly to the case which is now before us; because here this personalty never has been converted into realty; it was personalty at the death of the testator, it has ever since remained, and is at this moment, personalty in the hands of the trustees, and clothed with a trust for investment in land. The whole argument on the part of the Crown rests upon the foundation of its still remaining personalty clothed with such a trust, and therefore the Crown contends that it must be treated as land. Then comes the question, whether the Legacy Duty Act has imposed upon that personalty any liability to duty? If the 19th section of the 36 Geo. 3 had not been enacted, it would have been very difficult for this personal property to have escaped the duty imposed by that Act. The duty is imposed not only upon legacies, but upon property passing upon intestacy; and whether it passed by a bequest or by intestacy if it was personalty it was equally chargeable with legacy duty by the 2nd section of the Act. When we come to deal with the 19th section, we find the first part of it very general in its terms. Its whole scope and object seem to be to define what shall be deemed personal property so as to be brought within sect. 2 which imposes the duty. It says in express terms that "any sum of money or personal estate directed to be applied in the purchase of real estate, shall be charged with and pay duty as personal estate." It may well be that it was thought right to introduce this clause in order to prevent the application of this doctrine of the Court of Chancery to the exemption from legacy duty of property of this nature. But it is said that the trusts of the will were satisfied at the time when the respondent came into possession of this property. How can that be when the trustees still hold the property by virtue of the will, and upon the trusts which it contains? And, in reality, the Court of Chancery was asked to deal with this property, and to decide the rights of the parties, upon the ground, first, that this fund did remain in the hands of trustees, and that it so remained clothed with these trusts, and was, at the time when the aid of the Court of Chancery was sought, money in the hands of the trustees directed to be laid out in land. Then, with regard to the succeeding portion of the 19th section, which, undoubtedly down to the "proviso," seems to refer to different persons in succession taking the money directed to be laid out in land, that would properly apply to Charles De Lancey, James De Lancey, and Susan De Lancey. Then comes the last portion of the section, which, although it is introduced by way of "proviso," yet, in reality, is no limitation, but, on the contrary, appears rather to enlarge the preceding provisions of the section; at least, to the extent of showing what was the intention of the language in the earlier part of it. It provides that "in case before the same or some part thereof shall be actually so applied, any person or persons shall become entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased therewith, or with so much thereof as shall not have been applied in the purchase of real estate, the same duty which ought to be paid by such person or persons if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such, shall be charged on such person or persons, and raised and paid out of the fund remaining to be applied in such purchase." Now, at the time when the present respondent became entitled to this fund, he would, if the property had been laid out in the purchase of real estate, "have been entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession" in that real estate, and therefore he is chargeable with duty thereon under that section, "as if he had become entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of a bequest thereof as such." The case comes therefore within the very words as well as the spirit of this section of the Legacy Duty Act. An attempt was made by Mr. Crompton Hutton, in argument, to establish that, because in the latter part of this proviso the words, "by virtue of any bequest" occur, therefore the operation and effect of the section were to be limited to the cases of property derived or passing under a gift in a will, and that the section did not extend to the case of property passing by descent. But it is clear that these words are part of a sentence having a totally different meaning, and having no application to the earlier portion of the section. They are a part of and must be read in connection with the words immediately preceding them, where it is said that the person "becoming entitled to an estate of inheritance in possession in the real estate to be purchased," shall pay "the same duty which ought to be paid by such person if absolutely entitled thereto as personal estate by virtue of any bequest thereof as such." This being the view which I entertain of the 19th section, and also of the application of the Act of 36 Geo. 3 generally, I am of opinion that this assessment of the respondent to succession duty was wrong, and that the present appeal must be dismissed.

MELLOR, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I have looked with attention at the case in the House of Lords, to which my Lord has referred, and I find that the judgment there carefully abstains from interfering with the view of the doctrine of equitable conversion, in cases of money directed to be laid out in land, which was taken and laid down by Lord Langdale and Sir James Wigram, in the cases before them which have been referred to. The decision of the House of Lords is put upon a ground which is quite intelligible, and shows the error into which the Court of Exchequer had fallen. It certainly does not at all touch the present case, or the ground on which the Lord Chief Justice cited the cases in equity, or the general principle on which we decide the present case.

tution of the suit. They produced the policies of insurance, which had been given up to them, and the bills of lading, and also the invoice, and a copy of the manifest, though these latter documents were not filed in court. Some questions of law arising upon these facts were referred to the court from the registrar, in a special case, in which the respective contentions of the litigants were thus stated:—"The defendants contend that "the plaintiffs should prove who were the true owners, and to whom, and on what account, the insurance moneys were paid, and should procure a discharge from the original owners of the cargo, viz., from those persons on whose behalf the same was shipped, before the registrar reports that the respective amounts allowed in respect of the cargo are due to the plaintiffs; and they further contend that, until this is done, they are unable to investigate and settle the proper value of the cargo sought to be charged as against the ship." The plaintiffs contend that "they are, by operation of law—having paid a total loss, and the cargo having been abandoned to them—and also as holders of the bills of lading of the cargo, the absolute owners thereof, and, as such, the only proper persons to give a discharge; and that they cannot be compelled to discover the true owners of the cargo at the time of shipment otherwise than as appears by the bills of lading, nor to show that the insurance moneys were paid to them, or on their account, further than is shown by the delivery up of the policies and bills of lading, and that the plaintiffs are not bound to obtain their discharge."

The case of Dickenson v. Jardine, L. Rep. 3 C. P. 639; 37 L. J. 321, C. P.; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 717, was referred to on the part of defendants. The arguments are stated in the following judgment.

March 29.--Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—That the underwriters must sue in the name of the owner in this court is a position admitted by the counsel on both sides. It is an equally incontrovertible position that where, as in this case, an abandonment by the shippers to the underwriters is proved, all that the shippers can give is passed to the underwriters. The question is, have the shippers given such a title to the underwriters as enables them to claim from the defendant the damages and costs due to the owners of cargo on board the Eureka; or, in other words, have the shippers proved that they were, or that they represent, the owners of the cargo, who are to be indemnified by the party condemned in these damages. The defendants, the obligati ex delicto, have certainly a right to be secured against the liability of a future demand from the possessors of a better title than that which has been furnished by the shippers to the underwriters. The defendants contend that they would not have this security if they paid the compensation awarded to the underwriters on the present evidence, and that they are entitled to insist on the production of a discharge from the original owners, which the underwriters cannot or will not obtain from the shippers. The underwriters maintain that they have produced all the requisite evidence; they rely on the fact of the shipment of these goods by the shippers, proved by the bills of lading, on the fact of the insurance of these goods by the shippers proved by the return of the policies, and receipt for the money paid upon the insurances, and upon the proposition of law, that the shipper is the agent of the owner so as to bind him in this matter, and to secure the defendant against any future demand from him. I have to consider whether this evidence of title to the property be adequate, and such as the defendant must accept. First, as to the bill of lading. This instrument is not per se incontrovertible evidence that the property specified in it has passed to the holders. A bill of lading is a contract of carriage, disclosing the names of shipper and consignee only, and does not prove that the shipper is the owner. These bills are usually drawn out in triplicate; in the present instance I observe that the bill of lading has these words—"In witness whereof the master or purser of the ship has affirmed to four bills of lading, all of this tenour and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, the other three to stand void." It may be that one of those bills of lading has been delivered at an earlier date to some person other than the underwriter, which other person would, on the ground of his earlier possession of the bill of lading, have a prior title to the goods—(Barber and others v. Myerstein, House of Lords, Feb. 22, 1870; Con-turier and others v. Hartie and others, 5 House of Lords' Rep. 673.) With respect to the fact of insuring, the insured may have insured as agent, or have had an insurable interest of his own in the goods, distinguishable from property in them. With respect to the receipt of the money paid on the insurance, the insurer is only concerned in ascertaining that the money is paid to the person who insured, who is not necessarily the owner of the goods. With respect to the contention that the shipper is the agent of the owner, and would bind him by his act in the matter, and therefore secure the defendant from future liability, no authority has been cited which satisfies me that this proposition of law is sound. The shipper is the agent of the owner to put the goods on board; but I am not satisfied that the insurance of the goods is within the ordinary scope of his agency, and no special circumstance is suggested in the case before me. It has also been contended by the counsel for defendant that he is entitled to the best evidence as to the value of the goods on which he is to pay. The underwriters, of course, do not know the value of the goods, and the invoice does not necessarily, furnish it. The real value may be, and often is, from various causes, not represented in the invoice; and it is urged that, if the owners were disclosed the defendant would have a means of ascertaining the true value, of which he is now deprived, and that the underwriters ought not to be allowed to stand in a more favourable position than the owner whom he represents. After some consideration, I am of opinion that the defendant is entitled to require evidence of a discharge from the original owners before the underwriter can enter upon the investigation of the amount of compensation for which he is liable. I do not mean, however, to decide that sufficient evidence of the value of the goods may not be obtained without a personal examination of the owners, and incurring the expense which such an examination, in the case of foreign owners, must entail. No order as to costs.

Under certain circumstances the court will deal with claims between a legal mortgagee and the receiver; as where the debtor, having mortgaged all his property, absconded with the money, the court ordered the property to be sold, and after payment of the principal, interest, and costs due to the mortgagee, and the costs of sale, the residue of the purchase-money to be paid into court.

The debtor carried on business as a Spanish and general foreign warehouseman in London, and in the commencement of the present year, being in want of money, he applied to a Mr. Baughan to make him an advance, which he agreed to do upon being properly secured, and accordingly on the 19th Feb. Mr. Baughan advanced to the debtor the sum of 150*l.*, taking as security a mortgage of the lease of his premises in Baker-street, Portman-square, and a bill of sale over his furniture and effects then upon the premises. Both deeds were dated the 19th Feb. 1870, the day the money was advanced. Upon the same day the debtor went to the Bank of England and changed the notes, which he received from Mr. Baughan, into cash, and absconded with the money. He subsequently wrote from Madrid to his principal creditor, a Mr. Betts, to whom he sent the key of his premises, with an intimation that he might at once take possession of the same. Mr. Betts did so, and immediately filed a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor, and was appointed the receiver under such petition. Mr. Baughan then commenced an action of ejectment against Mr. Betts, the receiver, under his mortgage security. The bill of sale was not registered until after the presentation of the petition for adjudication.

R. Griffiths now moved on behalf of Mr. Betts, to restrain Mr. Baughan from further prosecuting his action of ejectment.

The CHIEF JUDGE expressed his entire satisfaction with the bona fides of the transaction between Mr. Baughan and the debtor, and made an order that the receiver, with the concurrence of the mortgagee, should be empowered to sell the house, furniture, fixtures, stock, &c., and after payment of Mr. Baughan's claim of 150*l.* and costs, and the expenses incurred in the sale, to pay the balance of the purchase-money into court.

Public examination of bankrupt—Duties of trustees.

It is the duty of the trustee prior to the public examination of the bankrupt to examine into the accounts, and require the production of his books and all such information as may be necessary for the explanation of the bankrupt's affairs.

Public examination. The bankrupt who was a jeweller carrying on business in Pimlico and Putney, came up to pass his public examination pursuant to the 19th section of the Bankruptcy Act 1869.

Reed appeared for the trustee, and asked that the bankrupt might be ordered to file additional accounts, that is to say, a cash account for twelve months prior to his bankruptcy, and a stock account. The adjudication had been made upon the petition of the bankrupt's father, who claimed to be a creditor for 1000*l.*, the act of bankruptcy being a declaration of insolvency. Another relative, his mother-in-law, was returned as a creditor for 516*l.*; and a brother-in-law, and former partner, for 300*l.* The bankrupt had two places of business, and the creditors wished to know how the stock had been disposed of. [The CHIEF JUDGE.—Who is the trustee?] Mr. Stevens, a gentleman in the same trade as the bankrupt. The bankrupt's books were handed over to him, but they were in such a loose and imperfect condition as to be quite unintelligible. [The CHIEF JUDGE.—We must guard against the practice which prevailed under the old system of only asking for additional accounts when the bankrupt came up to pass his last examination, and which led to needless expense and difficulty. I take it that it is the duty of the trustee to call upon the bankrupt for all the explanation he requires, so that, when the bankrupt comes up for his examination, it may not be a mere form, but the trustee may be prepared either to approve or disapprove the accounts. This does not seem to have been done here.]

Griffiths appeared for the bankrupt.—The accounts were in the form prescribed by the rules and orders. [The CHIEF JUDGE.—A bare compliance with those forms is not sufficient; the bankrupt is bound to give all the information required by the 19th section of the Act. This is a mere skeleton account; but it seems that the trustee has not exercised the power he possesses of requiring further accounts.]

Mr. Stevens stated that he had required a twelve-months' account, but that his solicitor had told him it was unnecessary.

The CHIEF JUDGE.—One main object of the Act of 1869 was to place in the hands of creditors, represented by their trustee, all the powers that can properly be exercised with regard to accounts before the bankrupt passes his examination. It is the duty of the trustee in such a case to send for the bankrupt, desire the production of his books, and require him to explain whatever is obscure, or to make up the books if necessary, so that when he comes up for his examination the trustee may be able to state whether or not his doubts and scruples have been satisfied. If anything then remain to be explained it will be the subject of a special order by the court. We should commit great mischief if we were to go back to the old system. The trustee representing the creditors has all the power which the court had formerly. He may require accounts, and if the bankrupt do not furnish them, the court may properly be applied to. There can be no difficulty in the working of this part of the Act if it be properly attended to, and there will be an end of the expense which was formerly incurred by a bankrupt furnishing accounts in the dark without knowing what was required of him, thus leading to protracted examinations, and wasting the money of creditors in a way which could not be justified. It is my bounden duty to prevent trustees from wasting estates. Formerly the court was obliged to listen to the demand of assignees for additional accounts without any perfect knowledge whether the application was a reasonable one or not. Now when a man is adjudicated a bankrupt, he is bound to give to the trustee the fullest information he may require. He cannot do this till the trustee requires it; but the trustee can summon him at any time, and ask for information as to the state of his affairs. All that ought to be done, and was intended to be done, before the last examination comes on. If the information be not satisfactory, then there arises a question for the court between the trustee and the bankrupt. But it is a mistake to suppose that the trustee is to remain supine, and throw upon the bankrupt the peril of placing before the court such accounts as he thinks fit. This case must go back, and be made complete in the way suggested, the particulars of the securities and the time when they were given being stated. The trustee must satisfy himself of the truth of the bankrupt's statements either by the books or otherwise. Therefore, without making any explicit order as to additional accounts, I will adjourn this sitting, giving the bankrupt leave to amend his accounts; and I expect the trustee to assist him by pointing out what information he requires. I have no doubt that this part of the Act will work well if it be properly administered. The trustee represents the creditors; all their interests are under his protection just the same as his own are. It is his duty to require from the bankrupt an explanation of all he wishes to know about his affairs. If his books are imperfect they must be made as perfect as possible. The trustee must be satisfied that the account is a true one, or he must come to the court and state what is not correct.

Where an injunction is sought to restrain proceedings in actions brought against the debtor who has presented a petition for arrangement, the nature of the debts in the actions sought to be restrained must be set out in the affidavit filed in support of the application.

This was an application for an injunction to restrain the further prosecution of certain actions brought against the debtor, who had filed a petition for liquidation by arrangement, under the 125th sect. of the Bankruptcy Act 1869. In the affidavit filed in support of the motion it was stated generally that several actions had been brought against the debtor by creditors, naming them, for different amounts, and that such actions were then pending; but the nature of the debts for which the actions were brought was omitted to be stated.

Gover (solicitor) appeared in support of the motion.

The CHIEF JUDGE expressed his opinion that the affidavit was insufficient, and refused the injunction. The affidavit should state the precise nature of the debts over which it was proposed that the injunction should extend.

The plaintiff appealed from a decree granting probate of a will, but excluding from it the residuary clause in which she was appointed residuary legatee. A rule for new trial was obtained, which was discharged after argument, and the plaintiff applied for leave to appeal against this.

The court refused leave on the ground that the discharge of the rule, being an interlocutory order, was included in the appeal against the final decree.

The plaintiff as executrix propounded the will of Miss Atkins deceased, which, after bequeathing a few inconsiderable legacies, constituted her sole residuary legatee. The defendant, one of the next of kin, opposed the will and pleaded undue execution, incapacity, undue influence, fraud, and that the deceased did not know and approve of the contents of the will. At the trial the defendant obtained leave to amend her pleas, by pleading that the residuary clause only was obtained by undue influence. The case was tried before Lord Penzance and a special jury, and the jury found that the residuary clause was obtained by undue influence of the plaintiff. Whereupon the court decreed probate of the will, and excluded the residuary clause from probate.

A rule for a new trial was obtained, which was argued before Lord Penzance, sitting with Channell, B. and Hannen, J., and discharged.

The plaintiff appealed to the House of Lords against the decree, and now asked leave to appeal against the discharge of the rule for a new trial. The other circumstances of the case will be found stated with sufficient fulness in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—Lord PENZANCE.—In this case an application was made to appeal against a rule for a new trial discharged by the court. I think that leave ought not to be given, for the simple reason that I find on looking at the section of the Act that if parties have any such right of appeal against the discharge of a rule, it exists, under the terms of the Act as soon as the parties appeal against the final order of the court, and there is nothing now to prevent the court making its decree final. This is the section: "Any person feeling himself aggrieved by any final or interlocutory decree or order of the Court of Probate may appeal therefrom to the House of Lords; provided always that no appeal from any interlocutory order of the Court of Probate shall be made without leave of the court first obtained, but on the hearing of an appeal from any final decree, all interlocutory orders complained of shall be considered as under appeal, as well as the final decree.' Now, on looking at the registrar's minutes of what took place at the trial, I find that there was this order entered. "Whereupon the judge, on the application of counsel for the defendants by the final decree pronounced for the force and validity of the last will and testament, excepting the residuary clause of the said Eleanor Jane Atkins, the deceased in this cause, being the script bearing date July 30, 1868, now remaining in the registry of this court, and propounded in this court on behalf of the plaintiff, the sole executrix therein named. And on the further application of counsel for the defendants, we now condemn the said Emma Smith in the costs incurred or to be incurred in this cause on behalf of the defendants. And the judge directed that the said residuary clause be excluded from the probate, and further that the said probate be not delivered out of the registry before July the 14th inst." So that what the court did apparently was to pronounce for the force and validity of the will. But in order to enable the plaintiff to move the court for a new trial, it declared further that the probate should not be delivered out of the registry, that the parties might go on getting the papers in order in the registry. It could not possibly be granted until after July 13th, and on July 13th an application was made to extend the time granted. Then came the rule and then the argument before the court, and finally the discharge of the rule. All that remains now for the court to do is to remove that restriction that probate may not be delivered out. So that to-day the court orders that restriction to be removed, and that the plaintiff be at liberty, if she be so disposed, to take out probate. And if she does not so take it out within a fortnight, the defendants may be at liberty to apply to the court. Of course it is possible that she may not desire to take out probate, and it might be contended that if she did she would in some way be hampered in her appeal, which the court does not desire should take place. But at the same time, if she does not take probate the defendants ought to be entitled to go on in order to get the estate administered. However, I will not anticipate what may be said on that, but I will merely say that if she does not take out probate within a fortnight, the defendants will be at liberty to apply to the court. With regard to costs, I see, on looking at the shorthand-writers' notes, that at the time of the trial an application was made to condemn the plaintiff in costs, and the court acceded to that application. No suggestion was made as to the plaintiff being entitled to any costs as executrix for proving the will. Now, if she proves the will—quite independently of any costs she might have personally to pay to the other side by reason of the order of this court—she would be entitled by the ordinary practice to take her own costs out of the estate for proving the will in solemn form. And that there may be no difficulty upon that I should make it part of this order that on taking probate the plaintiff be at liberty to take out of the estate her costs of proving the will in solemn form. She will be placed in the same position as she would have been then.

Dr. Spinks.—As your Lordship has mentioned it, will you allow me to call attention to one point, namely, this, that all costs were incurred before the issue was put on the record on which the other side succeeded. The whole costs were incurred by the pleas against the will of incapacity, undue influence, and fraud; and it was not until all these costs had been incurred, and all the counsel in court, and all the briefs delivered, and all the witnesses in court, that the other side amended their pleas and put that plea on the record, which if it had been on the record originally, non constat there would have been no costs at all incurred. I mean that the whole of the costs were incurred by the plaintiff, as executrix, by the default of the other side in not putting the plea on the record on which they succeeded.

Lord PENZANCE.—The defendant pleaded originally that the whole will was obtained by undue influence, and then when the case came for trial, she intimated her desire to plead something less, that only the residuary clause was so obtained, that not the whole, but only a part, of the will was obtained by undue influence. If the plaintiff had been put to any additional costs by reason of the issues being thus narrowed, undoubtedly she ought to have these costs; but I cannot see how that can be. The plea upon which, as thus narrowed, the defendant ultimately succeeded, involved the whole history of the case, and the whole evidence which was necessary after the plea was thus narrowed, would have been necessary under any view of the case. If it can be shown in any form by way of detail that any such additional costs were so incurred, there is no objection to an application being made to the court that such costs should be allowed out of the estate. But in my present view of the case I cannot see that any such costs were incurred. If there were, the plaintiff ought certainly not to suffer by it.

COURT OF SESSION, SCOTLAND—FIRST DIVISION.

Wednesday, Feb. 2.

HILLSTROM v. GIBSON AND CLARK.

Charter-party—"So near thereunto as she may safely get"—Custom of port.

By charter-party it was provided that a vessel should "proceed to a safe port, or as near thereunto as she may safely get, and lay afloat at all times of tide." The master was directed to go to Glasgow, but on arriving at the Tail of the Bank, off Greenock, it was found that the vessel drew more water than she could get in Glasgow harbour at all times of the tide. The reference to the custom of the port was deleted in the charter-party:

Held, reversing the decision of the court below (diss. Lord Deas), that the master was bound to allow the consignees to lighten the vessel at the Tail of the Bank, this being reasonable and customary.

This case will be found reported in the court below in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 302, where all the facts are stated.

Millar, Q. C. and Campbell appeared for the appellants.

Shand and Orphoot for the respondents.

The following were the judgments delivered.

Lord PRESIDENT.—The vessel arrived at the Tail of the Bank on the 25th Nov., and the question then arose—Was the master bound to carry the vessel farther, or might he remain at the Tail of the Bank and deliver the cargo there, although there was no quay suitable for the purpose there? The answer to this question depends upon the construction to be put upon the charter-party. The charter-party is of the ordinary kind; but there is one peculiarity in it arising from the deletion of the words "according to the custom of the port." It is admitted if the vessel had gone to Glasgow with a full cargo on board that she could not have lain in safety at low water. Her draught of water was 17ft. 9in. at the Tail of the Bank; but at Glasgow, the water being fresh, she would have drawn 18ft. 1in. And as at Glasgow she could only have got about 16ft. of water at low tide, it is certain that laden as she was she could not with safety have come up to Glasgow. Now it is shown that the general custom in such cases is to lighten the vessel sufficiently to allow of her coming up to Glasgow. The words "according to the custom of the port," however, were deleted from the charter-party. If they had not been deleted the pursuer would have been bound to have allowed his vessel to be lightened, and then to have gone on to Glasgow. But, as it is, we must hold that the master was not bound by any custom of the port of Glasgow. He therefore refused to go up to Glasgow, or to have the vessel lightened at the Tail of the Bank. He said, if his vessel was lightened of part of the cargo there, it was giving him two ports of discharge. Now at the Tail of the Bank, where the ship was lying, there is no quay or accommodation for unloading. Large vessels lie at anchor there, and the cargoes of some vessels are unloaded there in the way the master of the Frey wished. But these cargoes are shipped into smaller vessels, which go by the Union Canal to Grangemouth. Now the Tail of the Bank is not a natural place for a ship to discharge her cargo. With a sudden gale arising there would be great risk of disaster to the ship and cargo. There is therefore nothing in the way of custom and propriety to be said in favour of the Frey delivering her cargo at the Tail of the Bank. I am not aware of any rule of law settling this case; and no case has been cited ruling the one before us. The solution of the question, therefore, is simply what is reasonable under the circumstances. It is the ordinary construction of a charter-party, a point of no difficulty. The contention of the master—that putting out some of the cargo at Greenock was giving the vessel two ports of discharge—is not worth much consideration. What took place was only unloading or lightening the vessel to the extent of one-fifth. Now custom is excluded. But if we see that it is customary to unload in part at the Tail of the Bank, we cannot exclude it from our consideration. I therefore think that it was reasonable that the shippers should have been allowed, at their own expense, to unload in part, in order that the vessel might be able to get up to Glasgow.

Lord DEAS.—This a case of novelty and difficulty; and I am disposed to come to a different conclusion from what your Lordship has arrived at. I do not see how we can come to a different conclusion from the words of the charter-party. The words are—"shall therewith proceed to a safe port, or as near thereunto as she may safely get, and lay afloat at all times of tide, and deliver the same, and so end the voyage." It is not immaterial that the words "according to the custom of the port" are struck out; and we must assume that it was purposely done. It was not unreasonable that a foreign master going to what might be a port he knew nothing about should insist on their being struck out. It is admitted when he came to the Tail of the Bank he had come as near to Glasgow as where he could lie afloat safely at all times of the tide. And it is plain he was not bound to go up in respect that it was shown to be the custom of the port to lighten vessels of part of their cargo there. But the result of your Lordship's judgment is to hold the master bound by the custom of the port to do the thing that, by deletion of the words, he was freed from the necessity of doing. The question is, was the voyage ended when he had gone as near Glasgow as he could? Your Lordship seems to attach the words "end the voyage" to the delivery of the cargo. But the delivery of the cargo takes place when the voyage is ended. The delivery does not constitute the end of the voyage, but follows it. And therefore the voyage is not to be held as not ended simply because the place happens not to be the most suitable for discharging the cargo. Your Lordship seems to hold that the charter-party is to be adhered to only so far as reasonable, and therefore that the master was bound to let his vessel be unloaded in part if he had no interest injured thereby. But his interest was injured. The voyage was lengthened, and other points were mentioned in the argument showing how materially his interest was injured. It would have been reasonable that the defenders should have complied with the pursuer's request, and paid him the 45% in respect of the difference it would have made to him in coming up to Glasgow. If it had been proved that it was the custom at all other river ports to lighten in part at the mouth of the river in order to allow the vessel to come up, then it would have been reasonable for the defenders to argue that, though this clause had been deleted from the charter-party, it should be given effect to. But this is not proved, and I do not think it is said to be the case. It is therefore presumable that it is not the case. And therefore it seems to show that it is not reasonable to hold the master so bound. Upon the whole matter I agree with the interlocutors and the very able and explicit notes of the sheriffs, and feel it therefore unnecessary to go further into the question. I have come to this result not without difficulty, but I agree with the sheriffs in the view that they hold.

Lord ARDMILLAN.—The questions raised in this case are of great importance, and of some difficulty; and we have the benefit of most able and elaborate notes from the learned sheriffs, who have very carefully considered the case, and fully appreciated the difficulties which it presented. We have also had ample and ingenious argument from counsel. I have arrived at the same conclusion as your Lordship in the chair, and am of opinion that the defenders are entitled to absolvitor. The ship Frey, of which the pursuer is master, was chartered at Alexandria to carry a cargo of beans to Falmouth "for orders." The charter-party is dated "Alexandria, 15th Aug. 1863." The defenders, Gibson and Clark, purchased the cargo at Falmouth, and gave the "orders" for Glasgow. She proceeded to the Clyde accordingly, under the order to Glasgow. She reached the Tail of the Bank, an open roadstead about twenty-two miles from Glasgow, on or about 26th Dec. 1863, with her full cargo; and the master there ascertained that she drew so much water that, with her full cargo, she could not lie afloat in Glasgow harbour at all times of tide. With reference to this position of matters, it is necessary to attend to the provisions of the charter-party under which the ship left Alexandria, and according to which she was bound to proceed, under such orders as she might receive at Falmouth. The right construction of the charter-party is the first step towards a right decision of the case. [Reads and explains charter-party.] I do this very briefly, as I agree with your Lordship in your explanations. The ship must go to the safe road, or so near as she may safely get and lay afloat at all times of tide, and "deliver the same"—that is the cargo—the whole cargo which she carries. In this charter-party two ports are mentioned—(1) Alexandria, the port of lading, where the lading or receiving is to be "according to the custom of this port," viz., Alexandria; and (2) the port to be named in the orders to be received at Falmouth, if a safe port, or as near as she could safely get and lay afloat, where delivery is to be "according to the custom of that port." The "custom" is thus mentioned with reference to the two ports, the one of lading, and the custom relating to lading, and the other the port of discharge or delivery, and the custom relating to delivery. In this instance, the second of these references to the custom, that at the port of discharge, was struck out by consent. I hold it as not here, and as intentionally omitted. In so far as any rule in regard to the mode, time, and place of delivery of the cargo, rests on any specialty in the custom of the port of Glasgow, I am of opinion that we cannot consider it. I discard it altogether. But, on a fair construction of the charter-party, with reference to the facts of the case, I am of opinion that, apart altogether from local custom of port in regard to delivery, the master was bound to consent to any moderate and reasonable lightening of the ship, which would admit of his going to Glasgow safely. If the ship as loaded could safely go to Glasgow, the master was bound to take her. A charter-party is a mercantile or maritime contract, to which the principles of equity are pre-eminently applicable. When the master took orders to go to Glasgow as the port of discharge, he, knowing what water his ship drew with her full cargo, and knowing what water could be had in Glasgow harbour, was bound to go to Glasgow and deliver there if he could do so with safety. No fair reading of the charter-party can exempt him from that obligation. The lightening the ship of one-fifth of her cargo was intended to facilitate the voyage, and undoubtedly enabled him to proceed safely, and to float at all times of tide in the harbour of Glasgow. If he had thrown, as by jettison, part of his cargo overboard, thus lightening the ship, or if by arrangement he had delivered a part at some place before entering the Clyde, so that, when he reached the Tail of the Bank the ship could have safely proceeded to Glasgow, and would have found water to float at all times of tide, then I do not think it could be seriously doubted that, being lightened so as to be safe, he was bound to proceed to Glasgow. I do not think that under this charter-party there are two or more ports of discharge. Nor do I think that the charterers or consignees could compel partial delivery or division of cargo for their own interest or convenience. But if, by a moderate and reasonable amount of lightening at the expense of the consignee, the safety of the passage to Glasgow harbour could be secured, and the great bulk of the cargo could be delivered according to contract, then I think it would be contrary to equity to permit the master to refuse to lighten, or to refuse to proceed to Glasgow after lightening. The lightening is just a mode of enabling the master safely to fulfil his contract; and the true object and meaning of the provisions for the contingency of being unable to reach the port in safety were just to secure the ship from peril. The safety of the ship was protected by the stipulations and, in point of fact, the ship was kept safe. That was secured by the lightening her of part of her cargo. Extreme cases have been put in argument. But the question is to some extent a question of degree, because it is a question of equitable obligation, and of reasonable conduct. I do not say that four-fifths of the cargo could have been out of the ship at the Tail of the Bank, or even one-half of the cargo, and then that the ship could have been required to proceed with the remainder; we must in dealing with an equitable contract consider the fairness and reasonableness of the proceeding. I speak not of custom of the port, but of the reason of the thing, when I say that delivery of the whole of this cargo in the open Firth at the Tail of the Bank, twenty-two miles from Glasgow, and where there is no quay, could not have been reasonably forced by the master upon the consignees; and, on the other hand, I think that the lightening of the ship of one-fifth of the cargo, and the proceeding in safety to Glasgow with the remainder, would have been fair and reasonable on the part of the master. It would have been fulfilment of the contract according to its just and fair meaning. I so construe this charter-party as to permit and support this fair, reasonable, and equitable procedure. I have examined the decisions and authorities quoted, and I have arrived at the conclusion that there is no authority, in point of law, to the contrary of what I have explained as the equity of this contract, and of this case. There is no decision and no institutional authority to support the proposition, that the shipowner can escape from his contract by refusing to lighten the ship to the moderate extent of one-fifth of the cargo, so as to be enabled safely to deliver the four-fifths that remain.

Lord KINLOCH.—The substantial question raised in this case is, whether the pursuer, the master of the ship Frey, was entitled to insist on delivering his cargo at the Tail of the Bank; or whether he was bound to do at first that which he did at last (although reserving all questions of right), namely, to allow his ship to be lightened by discharge of part of the cargo, so as to be enabled to lie afloat at all times of the tide in Glasgow harbour, and there to make full delivery. It was admitted at the bar, on the part of the master, that if he was legally bound to allow the ship to be lightened and to proceed with her so lightened to Glasgow, no demurrage is due, there remaining enough of running days after the demand made on him to that effect. In the opposite view, a calculation of the running and lay days would become indispensable. By the charter-party executed at Alexandria the vessel was bound, after loading her cargo, to proceed to "a safe port in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," according to the orders to be received by the master at Queenstown or Falmouth. It is added, "or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and lay afloat at all times of the tide, and deliver the same, and so end the voyage." It is said that the words "according to the custom of the port" were originally in the charter-party, and purposely deleted before the parties signed. This appears to have been the fact. But I think the fact only material to show more clearly that the shipmaster did not bind himself, as a matter of direct obligation, to conform to the custom of every port to which he might be ordered, leaving his obligation of delivery to be ruled by the common law. The case, I think, is not substantially different from what it would have been had the words never been inserted at all. If the words had not appeared deleted as they now do, I doubt if it would have been competent to prove that the parties had talked of inserting them, and ultimately resolved on leaving them out, which would just be to prove the communications anterior to the executed deed. When the vessel arrived at the Tail of the Bank, which is an open roadstead, more than twenty miles from Glasgow, it became manifest, and is not disputed, that she was too deeply laden to lie at all times afloat in the harbour of Glasgow. It does not very clearly appear from the evidence that she might not have sailed without injury a great deal nearer to Glasgow. But unquestionably she could not, with her full cargo, lie at all times afloat in Glasgow harbour. On the other hand, it was proved by the actual fact that after being relieved of a part of her cargo, estimated at the bar to amount to about one-fifth of the whole, she was enabled to lie afloat in the harbour at all times of the tide. I am of opinion that in point of law the master was bound to allow his ship to be lightened, and to proceed with her to Glasgow, as the shippers of the cargo demanded. I came to this conclusion on the simple ground that this was nothing more or less than fulfilment of the charter-party after a fair and reasonable construction. The charter-party formed a mercantile contract, and must have put on it, not a strict and technical, but a fair and liberal interpretation, consistent with equity and good faith. Nothing, I think, could be more unreasonable than to insist that all the cargo should be delivered in the month of January in an open roadstead more than twenty miles from Glasgow; which not only involved great expense to the shippers in the way of lighterage, but was attended with no little risk. On the other hand, I think the shipmaster could suggest no real or tangible injury or peril to the vessel from the opposite course being followed. The vessel was bound to go to Glasgow if to that port she could safely get. If only four-fifths of the actual cargo had been laden she must have gone on to Glasgow without a moment's delay. In the case which actually occurred, there was no legitimate interest to object to the shippers' placing her in the same position by lightening her to the extent of one-fifth. The vessel was only thereby enabled to make the voyage expressly engaged for. She was exposed to no accident which her owners did not voluntarily undertake. It is not proposed that any part of the expense of lightening the ship should fall on her owners; the shippers have discharged it all. It is admitted that the process, if followed out immediately on demand, did not extend the running days allowed for unloading more than the charter-party gave. In no point of view can it be said that the vessel incurred any loss or risk more than her owners contemplated. I am of opinion, therefore, that what the shippers demanded was just, that fair and reasonable fulfilment of the contract which every mercantile contract involves. It is a fulfilment which I think squares with the very words of the contract. The vessel was to go to Glasgow, "or so near thereunto as she may safely get and lay afloat at all times of the tide." I think the words, "as she may safely get," are reasonably to be construed to mean "as it is possible to take her with safety." And this possibility must be considered with reference to the due and usual method of accomplishing such safety. If the obstacle to her proceeding was a bar at the mouth of the harbour, which a slight lightening would enable her to surmount, I cannot think that the master would be entitled to refuse the lightening, and to insist on delivering the whole cargo in the open sea. The only interest secured to the ship by the charter-party was that she should not be required to go where she could not safely get, and should deliver no part of her cargo except where she could lie afloat at all times of the tide whilst doing so. As the shippers, by the proceeding taken by them, secured the vessel in both particulars, I am of opinion that they thereby took away from the master all ground of objection founded on these clauses of the charter-party. It was pleaded for the master that what the shippers demanded involved delivery of the cargo at two different ports or places of discharge, in place of one only. I consider this argument to be a fallacy; and to beg the question in issue. The proceeding at the Tail of the Bank was not in any sound sense delivery of the cargo; it was lightening for the purposes of navigation. Had the proposal been to take out four-fifths of the cargo at the Tail of the Bank, and to go on with the remaining fifth, the shipmaster's argument would have had a great deal more of plausibility, for in such a case a great deal may depend on the difference of more and less—it may draw that very distinction between lightening and discharging which is all-important in the case. If the ship had come up with her full cargo to the very entrance of the harbour; and had then been enabled to enter by a slight lightening it, never could have been said that this was delivery at two ports of discharge. In point of principle, I think that it can as little be said in the present case. It was further pleaded for the master that in going beyond the Tail of the Bank he would have been taking his ship, if insured, beyond the limits of the policy, because beyond her proper port of discharge; and that this affords a criterion in his favour, with reference to his obligation to go farther. In such a case it is said he would have gone up to Glasgow uninsured, which he was not bound to do. But this argument I again consider to be a petitio principii. If, on a sound construction of the charter-party, the Tail of the Bank was not the port of discharge, but Glasgow was so, and the process of lightening was nothing more than the due proceeding to enable the vessel to reach Glasgow, all argument from the supposed policy of insurance at once falls to the ground. In going up to Glasgow from the Tail of the Bank (being enabled thereto by being lightened), the vessel was only prosecuting her intended voyage towards her port of discharge; and remained throughout under the protection of the policy, if such had been taken out. This is to be said on the supposition (which is the only ground of the argument) that the terms of the supposed policy were identical with those of the present charter-party. But it is not an unimportant observation, that not only are policies in general worded very differently from charter-parties, but in estimating their effect very different considerations may come into operation. The policy in the usual case ceases to operate when the voyage, properly so called, terminates; that is, when the vessel arrives at the port of discharge, or, as is often said, 24 hours after being safely moored, and anterior to delivery of the cargo. The charter-party continues to operate until delivery of the cargo is made, and it is only then that the ship ends the voyage in the sense of the charter-party. This difference in the two instruments excludes an indiscriminate application to one of the principles applicable to the other; and warns of the exceeding peril of all arguments from analogy. I am of opinion that the judgment pronounced in the Sheriff-court should be altered, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

LEE v. HALEY.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

LEE v. HALEY.

Injunction—Title of trade—Imitation of—Actual deception—Delay in filing bill.

Where a trader believes that he has good ground for complaining of a colourable imitation of the style of his business, he is justified in waiting until he can collect a sufficient number of cases to show that the alleged attempt has succeeded, before he files his bill; inasmuch as it would not be safe for him to come into this court until he could establish actual cases of deception.

The plaintiffs, L. and Co., coal merchants, established a business in Pall Mall as "The Guinea Coal Company." The defendant had been their manager, and was known to their customers, but he left their service in Jan. 1869, and set up in the same trade in Beaufort-buildings, Strand, under the title, "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Co." In August he removed to premises in Pall Mall only a few doors from the plaintiff's premises, and in November a bill was filed by L. and Co. to restrain him from carrying on business there under that name, and they gave evidence of numerous instances in which their customers had been misled into giving orders to the defendant:

Held, that an injunction awarded by Malins, V.C., must be continued.

This was an appeal by the defendant against an order of Malins, V.C., granting an interlocutory injunction to restrain him from using the name of "The Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company," in Pall Mall, or any other name or style so framed as to be a colourable imitation of the name or style of the plaintiffs, or so as to deceive the public, or lead to the belief that the business carried on by the defendant was the same as that carried on by the plaintiffs, or in any way connected therewith.

The hearing before his Honour is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546, and there and in the judgment of the Lord Justice all the facts sufficiently appear.

Glasse, Q. C., and Nalder, supported the appeal, and contended, first, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief, inasmuch as they had sold systematically underweight, and had professed to sell Wallsend coal when really they had not done so; secondly, on the ground of delay in filing the bill; and, thirdly, that there could be no title to prevent a man from describing his business as of Pall Mall, when his place of business really was in Pall Mall—the title "Guinea Coal Company" being open to everybody, and there being at least half-a-dozen coal businesses known by that name. They referred to

Lord Justice GIFFARD (having disposed of the allegations of the plaintiffs selling by short weight and under misrepresentations):—As regards the question of delay, I think the defendant first set up in Beaufort-buildings in March last. His setting up under that name in Beaufort-buildings did not interfere, and was not calculated to interfere, with the plaintiffs, and therefore the time until he removed to Pall Mall was not material. Then we come to August, and true it is that in August he first set up in Pall Mall. But when you come to look at the question of delay, each case must necessarily depend upon its particular circumstances and its own particular nature. Now the first thing which is to be observed in cases of this description is this, that it would not be safe for any plaintiff to come into this court until he could establish actual cases of deception, because you would be for ever trying hypothetical cases; and you would have a number of people brought forward to say, and probably truly, that the thing done was not calculated to deceive. That being so, I think the plaintiffs were quite justified in waiting until they could collect a sufficient number of cases to prove to the court that there had been a case of deception. But beyond and besides that, we must consider this. I have heard a great deal of argument to this effect, that if this injunction stands, a trade will be stopped. That is not so. The trade will not be stopped in the least. The only thing that will be done is this, that the defendant will be restrained from selling under this particular name. He may sell in Pall Mall coals at a guinea per ton to his heart's content, but the only thing he may not do is to use a name which is calculated to induce customers to come to him under the supposition that they are going to the plaintiffs. Therefore the injunction is one with reference to which I do not think, in the first place, there has been any delay which is not sufficiently accounted for, because the plaintiffs were bound to bring forward cases of deception; and, in the second place, when you come to the nature of the injunction, I do not think it material.

The actual facts of this case are very simple and plain, and depend upon principles which are well known, which this court has asserted again and again, and I trust always will assert. The case is that the plaintiffs have carried on business in Pall Mall, for a series of years under the name of the Guinea Coal Company, and there is evidence to show, as one would suppose, that they were well known as the Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company. The defendant first of all sets up as the Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company in Beaufort-buildings. That was not found, and, indeed, was not calculated, to induce persons to deal with him, under the supposition that they were dealing with the plaintiffs. All persons, of course, going to Beaufort-buildings would know perfectly well that they were not dealing with the persons carrying on their business in Pall Mall. Then it is said, there are a number of other companies who call themselves Guinea Coal Companies, some with prefixes, and other Guinea Coal Companies with no prefixes at all; but all of them carry on business in such a way as that they could not be mistaken for the Guinea Coal Company carrying on business in Pall Mall.

Then it is said, for that and other reasons, that there can be no property in the name of the Guinea Coal Company. I quite agree that there can be no property in the name, and the principle which these cases proceed upon is, that there is no property in the use of the word; that even in a trade mark there is no property, so to speak, but the principle upon which the court interferes is, that it is a fraud on a person who has established a trade, and carries it on under a given name, that some other person should assume the same name, or the same name with a slight alteration, in such a way as to induce his customers to deal with him under the supposition, and in the belief that they are dealing with the others. There is accumulated evidence of persons who have been deceived. Many persons have been deceived, and where we see exactly what the defendant did, I certainly do not acquit him of an intention to deceive, and that I must say emphatically; what he does is this: he goes first of all to Beaufort-buildings, and adopts the name of the Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company. The circular which he sends out when he removes from Beaufort-buildings to the customers of the old firm is this:—"Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company offices," and pasted over so that you cannot see where the original place was, "removed to 46, Pall Mall." I say that was calculated, and I believe intended to induce the persons to believe that it was this very coal company removed from one part of Pall Mall to another.

For these reasons I am clearly of opinion that this injunction was properly granted, and there is no objection to it upon the ground that it is confined to the particular street of Pall Mall; it is quite right that it should be so confined, because in all probability if the same name was used in some other street, it would lead to no mistake or deception.

Re THE NORTHERN ASSAM TEA COMPANY.

[CHAN.]

I think this injunction has been granted, and properly granted, upon the well-known principles of this court, which are applicable to all cases of this description, viz., that it is a fraud on the part of a defendant to set up a business under such a designation as is calculated to lead, and does lead, other people to suppose that his business is the business of another person. That being so, this application must be refused with costs. If the defendant chooses to have an undertaking as to damages he can, but it will make no difference as to the costs. I understand that was not pressed in the court below. I think it is the right of every defendant to have such an undertaking if he chooses, but it is not put in as a matter of course, nor unless it is asked for.

Re THE NORTHERN ASSAM TEA COMPANY.

Winding-up—Practice—Official liquidator—Appointment of—Rules on which court will act.

The rule laid down and acted upon by some branches of the court, that, ceteris paribus, the nominee of the person upon whose petition a winding-up order has been made will be appointed official liquidator, disapproved; the court being bound also to consider the wish of the persons, whether members or creditors, who have the main interest in the liquidation.

No hard and fast rule can, however, be laid down on the subject, but the court stated those considerations which should guide the court in making such an appointment, and in dealing with the costs of applications for that purpose.

This was an appeal motion on behalf of Mr. Galsworthy, a shareholder of the company, to discharge an order of the Master of the Rolls, whereby his Lordship had appointed a Mr. Samuel Barrow to be official liquidator of the company in preference to a Mr. James Gibbons, whose nomination the appellant had supported.

The case at the Rolls is reported in 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 483, and it is only necessary to add to the circumstances there stated that on the balance-sheet prepared so considerable a deficiency of the estate was apparent that shareholders had really no interest whatever in the winding-up, which was simply a matter for the creditors; and that Mr. Barrow had since his appointment given the necessary security and entered upon his duties.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q. C., Roxburgh, Q. C., and Graham Hastings supported the appeal, contending that the rule laid down by Malins, V. C. in Re the General Provident Assurance Company, 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 45, was not salutary, and ought not to be followed, and referring to two unreported cases:

Re the Accidental Death Assurance Company;
Re the Agriculturist Cattle Insurance Company.

Jessel, Q. C., Swanston, Q. C., and Higgins supported the order, relying on the case first mentioned and Re the International Contract Company, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 523; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843;
Re the London, Bombay, and Mediterranean Bank, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 525; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 843; Re the Brighton Hotel Company (not reported);
Sects. 91, 92, 93, 133, 135, and 149 of the Companies Act 1862 were also cited.

Roxburgh, Q. C. having replied,

The LORD CHANCELLOR said.—I desire, in the first instance, to join my complaint to that which has been expressed by several judges, among others Malins, V. C. and Lord Cairns, as to there being contests of this description at all brought before the court, occupying the public time, and exhausting the funds of those interested in the discussion of such matters, whereas, in reality, in nine cases out of ten, the same persons who create the expenses have not a particle of interest. That is the case on the present occasion. The only legitimate purpose of those who are acting is to discharge their debts properly, but, nevertheless, they think it necessary that there should be a contest upon this matter in which the shareholders and creditors have not one particle of interest. It is very unfortunate that any such cases should be brought before the court, and, therefore, the Master of the Rolls, as well as Malins, V. C., have desired, as no doubt every judge must desire, to see how they could best take a course which would stop so ruinous and disastrous, and, I may say, discreditable a contest.

I do not, however, think that the rule laid down by Malins, V. C. attains the object he desires, and I should hesitate very much, I confess, if this case depended wholly upon that question, to follow even the authority of the Master of the Rolls, added to that of Malins, V. C., in laying down a rule such as I understand has been laid down, viz., that not merely ceteris paribus there is to be a preference given to the person who first brings forward the application for the winding-up, he being the petitioner who has the charge of the order made upon the winding-up; but it is this, if I understand the rule laid down by Malins, V. C.; and I think it follows from the words of the Master of the Rolls, who adopts that view altogether, that, with regard to the cetera paria, you are to look only to the character of the two parties proposed, and see whether they are equally competent for the discharge of the duty, and you are not, at least according to the rule as laid down, to have regard to the other circumstances of the case, viz., whether or not the shareholders, if they be the persons who have the main interest, or the creditors, if they be the persons who have the main interest, concur in the wish of the person who has the carriage of the order to appoint a particular person to be named by him. I cannot help thinking the very instance read to us by Mr. Jessel of the Brighton Hotel Company would be a warning and a beacon against laying down, by way of definite rule, that if two persons are equal as to their character, without regard to who may or may not elect them, the court ought to select (as in the case of ordinary suits in this court), by preference, him who is proposed by the person having the carriage of the suit; because that case of the Brighton Hotel Company, as read by Mr. Jessel to us, was a case referred to by the Vice-Chancellor in the judgment cited, and he says that, in that case, there was a company that had a small surplus which would have paid every creditor without any winding-up whatever; but yet, because there was a body on which those who come as birds of prey might feast, it was necessary that that body should be so dealt with. Is not that the strongest possible case for showing the disadvantage that might arise from giving to the person presenting the petition the carriage of the order, and the appointment of official liquidator and solicitor? Of course, if you add to the other encouragements which may exist for bringing these cases before the court, that of invariably giving to the person who has been the first in the field to present a petition for winding-up, the appointment of official liquidator also, you are adding very much to the temptation which exists among those persons, who do not consider anything except their own interests, to take proceedings unnecessarily for the winding-up of companies with a view to the creation and payment of costs. I think it would be very hazardous to lay down any such rule as that.

Re THE NORTHERN ASSAM TEA COMPANY.

It is very difficult to lay down any rule whatever. The only guiding star for one's course is this, to see how far these contests can possibly be prevented. The Act of Parliament, I am bound to say, does seem to throw upon the court, although it is only put in a permissive form, by the 91st section, the duty of paying attention to the views of the shareholders and creditors; and where those views are clearly and distinctly expressed, and the majority is clear and distinct, and they have a plain common object in view, which must be made apparent by evidence to the judge before whom the case is brought, I should say that would be a safer guide by far than saying that the matter is to be entrusted to the first person who presents a petition.

But the Lord Justice Giffard has mentioned a rule which, I think, might be a salutary one, although one incurs great risk in laying down fixed rules on subjects which must be subjects of discretion, and I should be very far from desiring to lay down any hard and fast rule whatever; but the rule which Lord Justice Giffard applied in chambers with advantage and efficacy was that of refusing every person but the person who carried his official liquidator their costs, and by allowing the person who did carry the person he nominated only the ordinary costs, and not costs as between solicitor and client. Some such course of proceeding as that seems to me, I am sorry to say, the only mode in which these contests can be effectually stopped.

I do not think the present contest is one which, on behalf of the applicants, presents a very favourable aspect, because the applicant is Mr. Galsworthy, a gentleman who is a shareholder. It is quite manifest from the balance-sheet, made out by Mr. Gibbons, who appears to be a gentleman of high credit and repute, and, as far as I can see from anything in the case, to have conducted himself with perfect propriety, that this is clearly and distinctly a creditors' winding-up, and that there is not a shadow of interest left in any of the shareholders. There appears to be a deficiency of 40,000*l.* made out by Mr. Gibbons in reference to the winding-up. The company is a limited company, and the interest of the shareholders is extinguished. Mr. Galsworthy is a shareholder, and a shareholder only, and has really no interest in the concern. Therefore when he now comes forward to take matters in hand, one must look a little carefully to see what right or title he has made out to put himself in that position. As regards the quantity of support, which, as I have said, one should pay some regard to, which has been afforded to Mr. Gibbons as official liquidator, you have to consider how many creditors support him as contrasted with the other gentleman brought forward, Mr. Barrow; because, as I said before, the shareholders are wholly out of the question. They have not the slightest interest in the matter. As regards the creditors they seem to preponderate on Mr. Barrow's side. I say "seem," because there is some degree of controversy as to the state of the matter. As to the 30,000*l.* claimed with reference to the sale of the estate, that is wholly out of the question, and is one instance to show how unwisely we should act if we hastily gave credit to what is said to be the condition of the shareholders and creditors in a matter of this description; because, whereas there was indorsed on the brief of one of the counsel appearing for creditors before the Master of the Rolls that he appeared for a creditor for 30,000*l.*, it turns out now, from Mr. Gibbons's own statement, that that is a claim which has been settled with for 1000*l.*, and for 1000*l.* alone that gentleman is a creditor. That being so, I say I am not going to weigh accurately in nice scales what the state of the poll is as to these creditors; but it is enough for me to say that Mr. Gibbons has certainly not the preponderating number. Whether or not, had this case come before me originally, I should have thought there was any reason for displacing Mr. Gibbons, who was in the position of temporary official liquidator, it is not necessary for me to say; but he has been displaced, and the gentleman who has been put in the position of official liquidator, Mr. Barrow, has given security, has entered on the duties and functions of his office, and seems to be, as is agreed on all hands, upon an equal footing with Mr. Gibbons as to his capacity for management. There does not seem to me to be any preponderance, putting it in the mildest form, of creditors, in support of Mr. Gibbons. The shareholders, as I said before, have no voice in the matter, and, under all these circumstances, I think one can safely say that the conclusion which the Master of the Rolls has come to, although the reason he has given for that conclusion is not altogether satisfactory to my mind, and although it appears to me he has not altogether exercised, to the full, his discretion with reference to the subject, because he has extended the rule of Malins, V.C., and given a sanction to that rule, which rule, I think, is scarcely sufficient to guide the judgment of the court; yet when the whole matter comes to be investigated, I can see no reason for differing from the judgment he has given. I should not have considered it for a moment if I thought it a matter of discretion, and of discretion generally, because nothing can be more mischievous than to allow an appeal on the ground that it is a matter of discretion for the judge who investigated the question. But, now investigating it, and finding that, irrespective of the question of whether or not any such hard and fixed rule ought to be adopted as that which has been suggested, there is adequate reason for retaining Mr. Barrow, and therefore I think the appeal motion must be refused, and in consequence of its being the appeal motion of Mr. Galsworthy, who has no particle of interest in the matter, I think it ought to be refused with costs.

Lord Justice GIFFARD said.—I quite agree that you can lay down no hard and fast rule in cases of this description; and, as far as I can see, certain I am it is not desirable to lay down any such rule as appears to have been laid down—namely, that the nominee of the petitioner should have a preference. I think that is very undesirable, because, to my mind, it would be throughout an additional bait for trafficking in petitions of this description, in which, unfortunately, there is at present trafficking enough. I think it would be far better to lay down as a rule, although I do not say an universal rule, that no one should have the costs of the application for the appointment of official liquidator, but he who applies and succeeds, and then only the ordinary costs of an ordinary application. Three-fourths of these contests and applications are for costs, and I believe if that rule were acted on we should see but very few of them. I may add besides, that the position of a petitioner in a winding-up is very different from that of a plaintiff in a suit. A plaintiff in a suit, although a receiver may be appointed, still remains dominus litis and has the carriage of everything, whereas when an official liquidator is appointed, he becomes dominus litis, and the petitioner is wholly displaced. There is, therefore, no analogy between the position of a plaintiff (and it may be, and I have no doubt in many cases is, a very salutary rule that he should have the preference in the appointment of a receiver) and the position of a petitioner in the appointment of an official liquidator.

With respect to the present case, I must say I think it was very wrong on behalf of those parties who examined or cross-examined witnesses on a contest of this kind. I think it is a very ill-advised and improper proceeding, unless there is a case of fraud alleged, to examine witnesses on such subjects as sending a circular and matters of that sort, for it is nothing more nor less than waste of the time of the examiner, and a waste also of the time of the court. Be that as it may, Mr. Barrow has been appointed, and has given his security, and it would lead to very much additional expense if he were now displaced. Therefore, independently of that the fact that the Master of the Rolls has to some extent exercised his discretion would be a reason why he should be retained, and the appeal dismissed; but I must say if Mr. Galsworthy had been an appellant who had a real interest, I should have been very much disposed not to have refused his appeal with costs. Being of opinion, however, that he has no real interest whatever in this company on this question, and that it is neither more nor less than an official liquidator's application, I think it right to dismiss the appeal with costs.

ROLLS COURT.

Reported by HENRY PEAT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 6 and Aug. 6, 1869.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WAX CHANDLERS' COMPANY.

Will—Construction—Charitable bequests—Devise of real estate for the intent and purpose and upon condition to pay charitable bequests out of the rents—Increase in value—Application of increase.

K. by his will, made in the year 1558, gave certain freehold houses in the city of London to his son and to the heirs of his body, and for default of such issue it was his will that the W. Company and their successors should have the said houses for this intent and purpose, and upon this condition, that they should yearly distribute 8l. in the following manner, namely, 7l. 15s. amongst several charities in the will specified, and the other 5s. to the master and wardens for the time being equally; and it was the testator's will that the rest of the profits of the said houses should be bestowed on the reparations thereof. And if the company and their successors should leave any of the things specified in his will undone, then it was the testator's will that his next of kindred should enter into the said houses, and them have and hold unto him and his heirs for ever, upon condition that he and they should do all the things specified in the will.

At the date of the will the property was worth about 9l. a year, and now, with a small piece of land purchased by the company, its annual value had increased to the sum of 330l., out of which the company paid the sums specified in the will, and retained the residue for their own use.

On an information being filed praying that the company might be declared to be trustees of the property for the charities named in the will:

Held, that the charities could not take more than the specified annual amounts given to them by the will, and that the company were entitled to the property beneficially subject to the payment of the specified annual amount, and upon condition that they kept the property in repair.

William Kendall, by his will dated the 31st Jan.

1558, duly executed and attested as then by law required for the devise of freehold estates, gave unto William Kendall, his son, all his houses and tenements in the Old Change, in the parish of Mary Magdalen, in London, at Old Fish-street, to have and to hold unto the said William, and to the heirs of his body lawfully begotten, and for default of such issue the testator's will was, that the Master and Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of the Wax Chandlers of the City of London, and their successors should have the said housings and tenements for this intent and purpose, and upon this condition, that they should yearly distribute 8l. of lawful money of England after this manner (that is to say), to the poor inhabitants of the parish of Mary Magdalene aforesaid, at Old Fish-street, 4l. lacking 2s., in gowns for men and women, and coals, at the discretion of the churchwardens of the said parish, to be given and delivered unto the said poor inhabitants in the month of December yearly, and the said 2s. to the churchwardens of the same parish for their painstaking, and to distribute yearly to the poor inhabitants of the parish of Bexley, in the county of Kent, 38s. of good and lawful money in England, and to be given and delivered yearly about the third and fourth days of Nov. yearly, by the discretion of the churchwardens and chief inhabitants of the said parish of Bexley then being, and 2s. to the churchwardens of the said parish of Bexley for their great pains, and 35s. to be distributed unto the poorest men and women of the Company and Mystery of Wax Chandlers of London, and the other 5s. to be distributed to the Master and Wardens of the Wax Chandlers for the time being equally; and the testator's will was that the rest of the profits of the said houses and tenements should be bestowed upon the reparations of the said houses and tenements. And if the Master, Wardens, and Commonalty of the Mystery of Wax Chandlers of London and their successors did leave any of those things undone above rehearsed, then it was the testator's will that the next of kindred unto him should enter into the said tenements and them have and hold unto him and unto his heirs for ever upon condition that he and they and every of them should do all those things above rehearsed in all points, as it was above rehearsed by him, the testator.

The property comprised in this devise consisted at the date of the will of a freehold messuage called the King's Head, and four other freehold messuages and a warehouse situate in Old Change, and which in the year 1550 were let at rents amounting in the whole to 9l. 4s. per annum. This property, which has since been rebuilt, together with a small piece of land surrounded on all sides (except where it abuts on the street) by the land comprised in the will, which was purchased of one Deborah King by the Wax Chandlers' Company in 1790 (it was alleged) out of moneys derived from rents and profits of the premises devised by the testator's will, now consists of three houses, Nos. 17, 18, and 19, Old Change, together with certain warehouses and workshops in the rear thereof, which are let to several tenants at rents now amounting to about 330l. per annum.

The testator's son, William Kendall, died without issue on the 5th Nov. 1563, and the defendant company thereupon, by virtue of the testator's will, came into possession of the property, and they have ever since been and are now in possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the property, out of which they have regularly paid the several sums, mentioned in the will, amounting to 7l. 15s. annually, and have appropriated the whole of the remainder of the rents and profits to their own private benefit; and they claim to be entitled absolutely for their own use to the whole income of the property subject only to the annual payments amounting to 7*l.* 15*s.* specified in the will.

In consequence of this claim the charity commissioners certified the matter of the charity to the Attorney-General, who accordingly filed the present information, praying that it might be declared that the defendants were not entitled for their own benefit to the whole income of the property devised by the will of the said William Kendal subject to an annual charge of 7*l.* 15*s.*, but that the defendants were trustees of the said property, and of the whole income thereof for charitable purposes subject to the specific payment of 5*s.* annually by the said will given to the master and wardens, and to such increased allowance (if any) as might be proper to be made in respect of such last-mentioned specific payment; that it might be declared that the aforesaid small piece of land purchased of Deborah King in the year 1790 was subject to the trusts of the said will, and formed part of the property of the charity; that the defendants might account as trustees on the above footing for the income of the said property received by them, and the application thereof during such period as the court should think fit. The information also prayed for the appointment of a receiver, for the settlement of a scheme for the regulation and management of the charity, &c.

Jessel, Q. C. and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Attorney-General, submitted that as the testator by his will substantially exhausted the income of the devised property in charitable bequests, the increase which had taken place in the income of the property was applicable to the charitable purposes. They cited

6 H. of L. Cas. 310;

Thetford School case, 8 Co. 130;

Attorney-General v. The Coopers' Company,
3 Beav. 29.

As to the small piece of land purchased by the company in 1790, and which could not now be distinguished from the property comprised in the devise, they submitted that the company, as trustees, must take the consequence of having mixed their own funds with the trust funds, and must hold the entire property in trust for the charities; at most, they might be allowed a fair price for that piece of land. They cited

White v. Wakley, 26 Beav. 20;

Cook v. Addison, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 466;

Andrews v. Hailes, 2 Ell. & Bl. 329;

Kinsmill v. Millard, 11 Ex. 313.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and C. Brown for the company, contended that as the testator at the date of his will had not exhausted the rents of the property on the charities, the intention to give the surplus to the company must be inferred. They cited:

Attorney-General v. Master and Wardens of the Skinners' Company, 2 Russ. 407;

Attorney-General v. The Cordwainers' Company,

Attorney-General v. Brazenose College, 2 Cl. & F.
295;

Attorney-General v. Corporation of South Moulton,
14 Beav. 361; on appeal 5 H. L. Cas. 1.

Jessel, Q.C., in reply, argued that the direction to apply "the rest of the profits" on the repair of the houses, left no surplus undisposed of; if the words had been out of the profits, it would have been different. In order to give this property to the company beneficially, two things were requisite, viz. (1.) there must be an indication or intention in the gift itself that the benefit shall be given; and (2.) there must be no trust; here there was no indication of the intention, and there was a distinct trust. He cited:

Attorney-General v. Trinity College, Cambridge

Hayter v. Trego, 5 Russ. 113;

As to the intermixed piece of land, he cited:

Dann v. Spurrier, 7 Ves. 235;

Powell v. Thomas, 6 Hare 300.

Ang. 6.—Lord ROMILLY.—This is an ex officio information, instituted by Her Majesty's Attorney-General, against the Wax Chandlers' Company, praying: [His Lordship stated the prayer of the information as above set forth.] The question depends upon the proper construction to be put upon the will of William Kendall. [His Lordship stated the will, and the death of the testator and his son.] The Wax Chandlers' Company then took possession of the property, and the value of the property, which at the death of the testator appears to have been 9*l.* 6*s.*, at the time when they took possession of it appears to have been 16*l.* a year, beyond all reprises. The Wax Chandlers' Company have since that time down to the present enjoyed the property, which is now of the value of 330*l.* per annum, paying thereout the various sums specified in the will, amounting in the whole to 8*l.* per annum. In the year 1790, the company bought a small piece of land for the sum of 350*l.*, which was surrounded by the land comprised in the said devise of William Kendall. The money for this purchase was advanced by one of the members of the company, and was repaid to him out of the general income and assets of the company, but there is no evidence before me to identify the purchase-money with any of the proceeds arising from the devised estate of William Kendall, and as in these cases strict proof is necessary in order to take property away from a company, or a person, which has been enjoyed by them for nearly seventy-seven years before the information was filed, I am of opinion that, as regards this piece of land, the information fails. As regards the devised tenements, this depends upon the construction of the will, and raises a point which, so far as I am acquainted with the cases upon the subject, is new. It is this: a testator possessed of real property producing more than 8*l.* a year, gives the property to the Wax Chandlers' Company, and their successors to this intent and purpose, and on this condition—that they pay divers sums for charitable purposes, amounting in the whole to 7*l.* 15*s.*; he then gives 5*s.* to the master and wardens of the company, and goes on thus: "And the rest of the profits of the said houses and tenements I will shall be bestowed upon the reparations of the said houses and tenements." Does this direction infer a benefit to the company? If they perform the obligation of keeping the property in repair, is the company entitled to take the rest, or to whom does it go? This, in my opinion, is clear—that if it had been given to the company, or to any stranger, to be held merely with a condition of keeping the premises in repair, the whole would go to that person, provided he performed the condition and kept the property in repair. It is clear also, that more than is required for the purpose cannot be expended in repairs, that is, it cannot be expended properly in repairs, it would be only wasted. It is clear that at the time of the death of the boy (the testator's son), when the income of the property was 16*l.* per annum, clear of all repairs, the surplus was far more than was necessary for the repairs of the houses. There are, in my opinion, three sets of persons who may claim this surplus. It is necessary to consider which set has the best claim. The first claim is that of the charities which are named in the will. The second is that the surplus is undisposed of, and belongs to the heir of William Kendall; and the third is that it belongs to the company itself. I am of opinion that the charities cannot claim more than the specified annual amounts given to them. I have searched in vain in the books for a case of this description—viz., a devise in these words: "I give my farm of Whiteacre to A. and his heirs for ever, on trust out of the rents to pay 100*l.* for ever, to St. George's Hospital" (a perfectly good devise, because the trustees of St. George's Hospital can take property in mortmain), "and to apply the rest of the rents in the erection of farmhouses." The rents far exceed the whole of the sum required for the purpose. Is there any disposition of the residue? Is the heir of the testator disinherited, or can the charity say, "We are entitled to take the whole?" Does the charity stand in any better position in this respect than any private individual would do? I apprehend that it does not; but, if it does, then it is to be observed here that the whole of the property here is not, properly speaking, given to the charity. This circumstance strikes me, how does the gift of the 3*l.* 18*s.* to the poor of St. Mary Magdalen, and 1*l.* 18*s.* to the poor of the parish of Bexley, differ from the 5*s.* given to the Master and Wardens of the Company? It is true that the two first payments are charitable, and that the last is a personal gift to the persons who from time to time fill the offices of Master and Wardens, for it is important to observe that the 5*s.* is not given to the company. The commonalty are nowhere mentioned as partaking of any part of it. It is a personal legacy to be divided annually amongst the persons who may fill these offices. If the whole income is to be distributed pro ratâ, the Master and Wardens must take such a share of the increased income as 5*s.* at the date of the testator's death bore to the then existing income of the property. I think that it is impossible, by saying that the rest shall be bestowed upon the reparation of the houses to hold that this is a gift to charity, even if all the rest of the income were devoted to charity, which it clearly is not, for the 5*s.* to the Master and Wardens is not, properly speaking, a charitable gift. I am clear that I must read the residuary gift in one of two ways; either just as if the testator had said this: "I give what may be required for the repair of the property, and I give the rest to nobody;" or, secondly, as if he had said, "I give this, and I require as a condition inseparable from the devise I have made that the devisee shall out of the rents keep the property in repair;" and I am of opinion that the proper mode of reading the will is to read it as if this were a condition appurtenant to the devise already made, and not as a separate and independent devise. My principal reasons are to be found in the will itself. It is obvious to me from the whole scope of the will that the testator intended to benefit the company. In the beginning of the will he recites that he is a member of the company. In the next place the devise to the company is complete, that is to say, to the master and wardens and their successors. If he had gone on to say, "on this condition," no question would have arisen upon it, but it goes on thus: "for this intent and purpose and upon this condition." I am as little entitled to convert the whole devise into a trust upon the two first words, as I am entitled to reject the two first words, and treat it as an absolute devise solely on condition. I think that the fair way of reading it is to read the words as distributive—that the devise is upon the intent and purpose of making the payments after stated, and upon the condition afterwards stated—that you keep the property in proper repair, and that on failure of the performance of those trusts and conditions you are to deliver it over to my kindred. Another proof of his wishing to benefit the company is this, that he gives thirty-five shillings to the poorest men and women of the company, and a third is a gift which he makes to the master and wardens. Observing all this in the will, and observing that he himself was a member of the company, he gives no benefit to the company qua company, unless it is to be obtained by the surplus rents. That the testator considered that the persons who performed his wishes or carried his bequests into execution ought to receive some return is obvious from his gift of the 2*s.* to the churchwardens of the parish of St. Mary Magdalene and the parish of Bexley, and yet he gives the company, as I have observed before, in words absolutely nothing. Another circumstance also impresses me strongly. Unless some benefit were to be derived from doing all that the testator required, what inducement was there for the company to undertake the trusts at all, or what terror was there in the threat of forfeiture if the company did not perform them; and, further, what motive could be found for his kindred to undertake a troublesome trust that would do them no good? The company would lose nothing. The 35*s.* to the poor men and women of the company, and the 5*s.* to the master and wardens would be paid by the kindred exactly the same as before. But the circumstance which presses on me most strongly is this. I think that it is plain and to be inferred from the will that the testator intended that his kindred should stand in the place of the company, in the event of their failure to perform what he told them to do. The kindred clearly took the property beneficially, not only because unless they did so they could not be induced to take an onerous burthen; and it is expressly given to them on condition that they do the things above rehearsed in all points. What possible reason can be assigned for the testator intending the charities to take the whole of the property if the company administered the estate, but only the exact sum specified by him if his kindred took it? What appearance is there that the testator preferred the kindred to his own company in this matter? Then the testator gave the property to the company, subject to a trust and upon a condition. This condition is clearly expressed when the gift over to the kindred takes effect. My opinion is that the kindred are merely substituted for the company, and the company and the kindred have like powers and interests. If the company do not perform the matters entrusted to them, then the kindred, as the testator doubts not, will do so. It is always to be remembered in these cases that it is a question of intention to be gathered from the whole of the will, and the question upon this will is, did the testator intend that the whole of the property, which, judging from the accounts of the rental, must have left a surplus at his death after providing for the repairs, to be distributed among his legatees, or did he intend that his company should derive some advantage from his devise? I think the latter. I think that the information fails, and that it must be dismissed.

BUBB v. YELVERTON.

BUBB v. YELVERTON.

Bond—Consideration—Racing debts.

A member of the Jockey Club incurred considerable racing debts, and was unable to pay them. Being threatened by his creditors with proceedings, which would have resulted in his expulsion from the club, and in various losses which he would have sustained thereby, he entered into a compromise by which he paid a certain sum down, and gave his creditors a bond for 10,000l. :

Held, that the bond, having been given not to pay racing debts, but to avoid the consequences of not having paid them, was perfectly good, and could be proved against the obligor's estate.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by Mr. Henry Steele and Mr. William Nicholls for leave to prove against the estate of the late Marquis of Hastings, which is in the course of administration in the above suit, for 10,000l., upon a joint bond given to the applicants by the Marquis of Hastings and the Earl of Westmoreland under the following circumstances :

In the early part of the year 1868 the Marquis was indebted to various persons connected with the turf, amongst whom were Steele and Nicholls, to the amount of nearly 50,000l., which sum consisted almost entirely of bets lost on horseracing. The creditors threatened to enforce against the Marquis the rules of the Jockey Club, under which they could have prevented him from attending or running his horses at the various races during the season of 1868, and the Marquis would thus have become liable to pay a considerable sum in the shape of forfeit in respect of the horses which he retained, as well as of the other horses which he had sold; and he would moreover have become liable to actions by the purchasers of the horses, and to expulsion from certain sporting clubs of which he was a member. To obviate these inconveniences an arrangement was effected in June 1868 under which the Marquis paid 10,000l. down, and gave his bond for 10,000l., payable in six months after date, to Steele and Nicholls, the Earl of Westmoreland joining in the bond as surety. In pursuance of the arrangement Steele and Nicholls paid a composition to the various creditors whose claims were thus adjusted, and the Marquis was enabled to run his horses in the races for which they were already entered, and won large stakes by doing so. The Marquis died before the expiration of the six months, and the above suit was instituted for the administration of his estate. Steele and Nicholls took out a summons for leave to prove to the amount of the bond, and the summons was adjourned into court. It was admitted that the arrangement had been duly carried into effect by Steele and Nicholls, and the only question was whether the proof could be admitted in the present state of the law as to securities given in consideration of any contract arising out of wagers on horse-racing and gaming in general.

By the first section of 9 Anne, c. 14, it is provided that "from and after the 1st May 1711, all notes, bills, bonds, judgments, mortgages, or other securities and conveyances whatsoever given, granted, drawn, or entered into, or executed by any person whatsoever, where the whole or any part of the consideration of such conveyances or securities shall be for any money or other valuable thing whatsoever won by gaming or playing at cards, dice, tables, tennis, bowls, or other game or games whatsoever, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as do game at any of the games aforesaid, or for the reimbursing or repaying any money knowingly lent or advanced for such gaming or betting as aforesaid, or lent or advanced at the time and place of such play to any person or persons so gaming or betting as aforesaid, or that shall, during such play so game or bet, shall be utterly void, frustrate, and of none effect to all intents and purposes whatsoever."

By the first section of 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 41, it is enacted that so much of the 9 Anne, c. 14, and several other Acts therein recited, "as enacts that any note, bill, or mortgage shall be absolutely void, shall be and the same is hereby repealed; but, nevertheless, every note, bill, or mortgage which, if this Act had not been passed, would, by virtue of the said several lastly hereinbefore mentioned Acts or any of them, have been absolutely void, shall be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed, for an illegal consideration, and the said several Acts shall have the same force and effect which they would respectively have had, if, instead of enacting that any such note, bill, or mortgage should be absolutely void, such Acts had respectively provided that every such note, bill, or mortgage should be deemed and taken to have been made, drawn, accepted, given, or executed for an illegal consideration."

By the 15th section of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, the rest of the Act of 9 Anne, c. 14 was repealed.

Sir Roundell Palmer, Q.C., Southgate, Q.C., and W. W. Knox, in support of the claim, contended that the bond was not given in consideration of any contract arising out of wagers on horse-racing, but to escape the consequences with which the Marquis was threatened; and that even if it were given in consideration of such a contract it would be good in the present state of the law, and that the applicants were therefore entitled to prove for the amount. Jessel, Q.C., and Rowcliffe, for the executors, took no part in the argument.

Sir Richard Baggallay, Q.C., and Pemberton, for Lord and Lady Marsham and their infant children, the residuary legatees under the will, contended that the claim could not be admitted, as it was substantially a claim to recover money lost by wagers on horse-racing, which is rendered irrecoverable by the 18th section of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. Lord ROMILLY.—I will not trouble you, Sir Roundell Palmer, to reply in this case because I have no doubt that the bond is a perfectly good bond, and can be recovered and proved against the estate. I do not mean to express any opinion, whatever I may think upon the subject, whether, if a person incurs debts in racing, and gives a bond for payment of them, that bond can be proved against his estate. But there was a perfectly good consideration quite ulterior to, and independent of that in this case, and it is impossible to read the evidence of Mr. Steele and Mr. Padwick and the cross-examination, and the evidence of Lord Westmoreland, without seeing clearly that it was given not to pay racing debts, but to avoid the consequences of not having paid them which the creditors were determined to enforce—a course which would have been very serious for the Marquis, and which would have cost him a very considerable sum of money; not that the Marquis (and it is just to his memory to say so) ever intended to avoid paying these debts, but he had not the means of doing so at the time; he had got into very great difficulties, and when Lord Westmoreland assisted him, he gave the bond. But it was pressed upon him by the circumstance that Mr. Steele and Mr. Nicholls would have taken steps which would have been exceedingly painful to him, and which would have involved him in very serious and considerable pecuniary liabilities in the shape of forfeiting stakes, in the shape of having to answer actions by persons who had bought horses from him under the promise and faith that they had engagements which they could fulfil, but which by reason of his misconduct they were unable to perform. I am of opinion, therefore, that the obligees on this bond are entitled to prove the bond against the estate, and that they are entitled also to prove for the costs of this proceeding.

Reported by EDWARD WINSLOW, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Dec. 8, 13, and 20, 1869.

WALLINGER v. WALLINGER.

Power—Invalid appointment—Will—Residuary gift.

A testatrix who, by her husband's will, had a power to appoint to any one or more of her children certain property which, in default of appointment, was to be divided among her children equally, and who also had, under her marriage settlement, a general power of appointment over certain other property, by her will, which was expressed to be made in pursuance of every power, authority, direction, estate, or interest in anywise enabling her in that behalf, made an appointment of part of the first mentioned property in favour of her son J. and his children, and afterwards "appointed, devised, and bequeathed all her real and personal estate not therein specifically and absolutely appointed or bequeathed unto and to the use of her daughter A. absolutely for her own or separate use."

Held, that the appointment to J. and his children was invalid; and that all the property over which the testatrix had any power of appointment, whether under the will or the settlement, was absolutely and well appointed to A.

The question in this case turned upon the validity of an appointment which had been exercised under these circumstances. Serjeant Wallinger, by his will, dated the 15th April 1858, after disposing of certain bequests and legacies, gave the residue of his property to his brother, the Rev. W. Wallinger, and his nephew, C. J. Fisher, on trust to pay the income to his wife for life, and on her decease to pay the principal to or among his children, as she should by deed or will appoint, in such shares and proportions, and whether to one only, or to some or all, as she should direct, and in default of appointment then to his children equally.

The testator died in April 1860, leaving three sons, Henry, James, and Arnold Wallinger, and one daughter, the plaintiff, Amelia Anne Wallinger.

testator's widow, by her will, dated the 24th

May 1867, after reciting that it was made in pursuance of every power, authority, direction, estate, or interest in anywise enabling her in that behalf, and appointing her daughter, Amelia Anne Wallinger, and the said C. J. Fisher, her executrix and executor, appointed and bequeathed certain personal property, part of the testator's residuary estate, unto her said daughter and C. J. Fisher, upon trust during the life of her son, James Wallinger, to pay and apply at such times and in such manner as they in their absolute discretion should deem proper, such parts as they should think fit of the annual income of the property for the personal use of the said James Wallinger, or his child or children by his first or second marriage only, or any or either of such children; and subject as aforesaid that they should hold the property and the income thereof in trust for all or any of the children of the said James Wallinger by his first or second marriage only, or any or either of such children, for such interests, in such proportions, and in such manner in all respects as her said son should by will appoint; and in default of such appointment, in trust for the said Amelia Anne Wallinger absolutely. Then came the following clause;—"And I appoint, devise, and bequeath all my real and personal estate not hereinbefore specifically and absolutely appointed or bequeathed unto and to the use of my said daughter, Amelia Anne Wallinger absolutely for her own sole and separate use."

The testatrix died in Jan. 1869. Under her marriage settlement the testatrix was entitled to considerable personal property, over which she had a general power of appointment, and which in default of appointment was to go to the children of the marriage.

Upon the death of the testatrix, this bill was filed for administration of her estate by her daughter, Amelia Anne Wallinger.

The questions, as stated by the bill, were these: First. Whether the will of the testatrix was not invalid so far as it purported to be an appointment in favour of her son for life, and for his children, and to give to trustees a discretion as to the application of the income. Second. Whether the residuary disposition contained in the will of the testatrix comprised such interests, if any, as such will purported to appoint to her son's children, but which were not thereby effectually appointed, or whether such interests were subject to the trusts contained in the testator's will in default of appointment? Third. Whether the residuary disposition contained in the will of the testatrix comprise such of the testator's residuary estate as was not comprised in the specific appointments to the testatrix's son James Wallinger? Fourth. Whether a case of election was raised by the said residuary disposition?

Dickinson, Q.C., and Charles Hall for the plaintiff, contended that the appointment to James Wallinger and his children was clearly bad, and that the property so appointed therefore went under the last clause in the testatrix's will, which was sufficient to convey everything to the plaintiff.

Karslake, Q.C. and Dumergue, for the defendant Arnold Wallinger, argued that the words used by the testatrix did not amount to an appointment. The power was limited, and it was essential to the due execution of such a power that the intention to appoint should be manifest. There having been, therefore, a failure in the exercise of the power by the testatrix, the property remained subject to the trusts of the testator's will. They cited,

Greene, Q.C., and Waller, for the defendant James Wallinger, submitted that the intention of the testatrix could alone be regarded. The court could not suppose that by one and the same instrument the testatrix intended to make two different appointments of the same property, or that she considered her first appointment as bad. He referred to Hope v. Hope (sup.);

Clogstoun v. Walcott (sup.).

Freeman, for the children of James Wallinger, submitted that the case involved a question of election. The plaintiff took large benefits under the testatrix's settled property, and could not be permitted to defeat the appointment to the children of James Wallinger without election. He referred to Dickinson, Q.C. in reply.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—No doubt there is a great degree of difficulty in this question, but putting the fair construction upon the ultimate words of absolute appointment of all that had not been specifically appointed, it seems to me impossible to say that this lady left unappointed any part of the property included in her will or under her settlement over which she had a power to appoint. There is no doubt about the principles which govern the case. Mr. Karlake was quite right in saying that this, like every question on the validity of appointments depends upon the question of intention. There is also great room for the argument that this lady having appointed to James Wallinger and his children certain specific parts of the property, the natural inference would be that when she came to appoint or dispose of the rest of her property, she could not intend either to dispose of or appoint what she had previously appointed in express terms. But after all it comes to a question of construction, because nobody can argue that the words about ultimate appointment of all that had not been before appointed, could be so general as to include everything, whether previously well-appointed or ill-appointed. What was well appointed could not be included; what was ill-appointed must be included if the words are absolute and universal, as in my opinion they are. It is impossible to say that the plaintiff is not absolutely entitled to the whole of the appointed property, but only to that part of the property which was well appointed. As to the argument the case involves a question of election, it proceeds upon a complete misapprehension of the principles on which the case of Whistler v. Webster (sup.) was decided. Here nothing is left unappointed, nothing is claimed in default of appointment, and there is no room for raising a question of election. Upon the whole, therefore, the declaration of the court must be that the appointment to James Wallinger's children is invalid, and that upon the true construction of the will and appointment of Mrs. Wallinger, all the property over which she had any power of appointment under the settlement or under the will, is absolutely and well-appointed to the plaintiff.

WOTHERSPOON v. CURRIE.

Trade-mark—Imitation—Rival advertisements.

The plaintiffs had been for many years the manufacturers at Glenfield of starch, which was described on their packets as "Glenfield Starch," and which had acquired a considerable reputation under that name. In 1868 the defendant commenced manufacturing, also at Glenfield, starch which was made up in packets labelled "C. and Co., Starch Manufacturers, Glenfield," in consequence of which several persons had been induced to purchase the defendant's starch, under the impression that they were purchasing the "Glenfield Starch."

Held, that, notwithstanding that the defendant manufactured his starch at Glenfield, he was not entitled to use that name so as to avail himself of the reputation of the plaintiffs.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the defendant, John Currie, his servants, workmen, and agents from applying the word "Glenfield" to or in connection with starch manufactured by or for him, and from using the word "Glenfield" in or upon any labels affixed to packets of starch manufactured by or for him, and from in any other way representing the starch manufactured by or for him to be "Glenfield Starch," and from selling or causing the same to be sold as "Glenfield Starch," and from doing any act or thing to induce the belief that starch manufactured by or for him was "Glenfield Starch," or starch manufactured by the plaintiffs. For many years previously to the year 1847, Messrs. Fulton and Co., of Glenfield, near Paisley, in Scotland, manufactured a species of powder starch, which they called by the name of "Glenfield Patent Double Refined Powder Starch," but which was commonly called and known in the trade and by the public as "Glenfield Starch."

In Jan. 1847 the plaintiff, William Wotherspoon, purchased of Messrs. Fulton and Co. their business and works at Glenfield, and the exclusive right of manufacturing starch in the manner in which it had been manufactured by them, and selling the same under the name or description of "Glenfield Patent Double-Refined Powder Starch," and for some time after such purchase the plaintiff Wotherspoon continued to manufacture starch at the works at Glenfield, but he afterwards removed his manufactory to Manwelton, near Paisley; such manufactory had ever since been known as the "Glenfield Starch Works," and the starch manufactured there still bore the original name of "Glenfield Patent Double Refined Powder Starch," or more shortly, "Glenfield Starch," and was manufactured by the plaintiffs under the style or firm of "Robert Wotherspoon and Co." The starch so manufactured was made up into packets of various sizes, each packet being enclosed in blue paper, upon which was pasted a green label bearing the words, "Glenfield Patent Double Refined Powder Starch."

In the year 1869 the plaintiffs ascertained that the defendant, John Currie, who kept a shop in Paisley, and had been originally a workman in the employ of Messrs. Fulton and Co. at Glenfield, was making and selling starch enclosed in blue paper with green labels, bearing the words "Royal Palace Starch, Currie and Co., Starch Manufacturers, Glenfield;" the word "Glenfield" being printed in large and conspicuous letters, and that such starch was being sold by retail dealers as "Glenfield Starch." It appeared that the defendant, about the end of the year 1868, hired of Messrs. Fulton and Co. a small building belonging to them at Glenfield at a rent of 12*l.* a year, with a view to commencing the manufacture of starch, but that only two or three hands were employed by him there for the purpose, and it was alleged by the plaintiffs that the sole object of the defendant in hiring this building was to give colour to the use of the word "Glenfield" on his labels.

It also appeared that Glenfield was neither a town, a hamlet, nor a village, nor had it a post office, but that it was merely a field in which two or three manufactories were situate, and the directory gave the names of about fifty persons as residing there. The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs furnished several instances in which persons had asked at different shops for "Glenfield Starch," and had been supplied with the defendant's starch. On the other hand the defendant alleged that he had no fraudulent intention in hiring the building at Glenfield; that he had hesitated whether he should set up his manufacture at Glasgow, Renfrew, or Glenfield, but that he selected Glenfield because there was a spring of water there particularly suitable for the manufacture of starch; that the word "Glenfield" on his labels was merely used as an advertisement, and that his starch had attained a celebrity quite independently of the word "Glenfield" being used in connection with it. It also appeared that it was the custom of the trade to enclose powder starch in packets of the description used both by the plaintiffs and the defendant.

Glasse, Q.C., and Fischer for the plaintiffs, contended that the defendant had adopted the name of "Glenfield" upon his labels for the purpose of getting his starch purchased in the market as "Glenfield Starch," which was the plaintiffs' manufacture; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to the exclusive use of the word "Glenfield" in connection with the manufacture and sale of starch.

They referred to

Seixo v. Provizende, L. Rep. 1 Ch. App. 192; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 314.

Glenny v. Smith, 2 Dr. & Sm. 476;

Rodgers v. Nowill, 6 Hare 325.

Cotton, Q.C., and Freeling for the defendant, contended that the word "Glenfield" was used by him merely as an advertisement or statement where his starch was manufactured, and that his labels were not calculated to mislead purchasers acting with ordinary caution into the belief that they were purchasing the plaintiff's starch. No person can acquire a monopoly in the name of a place, so as to prevent any other person, who is bona fide carrying on his business at that place, from putting the name of the place upon his goods. The defendant simply advertises himself as a rival manufacturer. They referred to

Leather Cloth Company v. American Leather Cloth Company, 11 H. L. C. 523; 12 L. T. Rep. N.S. 742;

Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896.

London Assurance v. London and Westminster Assurance Corporation, 32 L. J. 664, Ch.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 497.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I only wish to hear you, Mr. Glasse, as to the right of the defendant, to use the word "Glenfield" on his labels.

Glasse in reply. The fundamental rule is that one man has no right to pass off his goods as the goods of a rival trader, and therefore he cannot use a name which has become associated with the goods of another person, so as to induce purchasers to believe that he is selling the goods of that other person. This is not a case of rival manufacturers as in Leather Cloth Company v. American Leather Cloth Company, 11 H. L. C., see pp. 538, 540.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—All these questions depend upon the particular circumstances of each case. The question here is, has everything been done bona fide? Has there been an intention to mislead or not? Now I am much struck with that part of the defendant's evidence in which it is said that he hesitated whether he should set up his manufacture at Renfrew, Glasgow, or Glenfield, but that he decided on Glenfield, because there was a spring of water there particularly suitable for the manufacture of starch, and he denies that he so decided, because of any advantage that might be derived from the use of the word "Glenfield." If this was the case, why did he not sell his starch without using the word "Glenfield" on his packets? He puts in a quantity of evidence at great expense in order to maintain his right to use the name, and yet he says the name is of no advantage. What object then has he in using the name? His packets are labelled "Currie and Co., starch manufacturers, Glenfield," but they do not state where Glenfield is. Glenfield is neither a town, a hamlet, or a village, nor has it a post-office. How then is a letter to find the defendant? Why is the word "Glenfield" placed by itself, and in such conspicuous letters? The fact is this: The plaintiffs' starch has gained a reputation, and is well known as "Glenfield Starch," and the defendant thinks that he can make use of this reputation. It is clear from the evidence that several persons have in fact been induced to purchase the defendants' starch under the impression that they were purchasing "Glenfield Starch." [The Vice-Chancellor then went through the evidence bearing on this point, and continued:] Now one man may adopt or imitate the label or trade mark of another with the most innocent intention possible, but the law has settled that if his imitation is such as is calculated to mislead purchasers into the belief that he is selling an article manufactured by that other, this court will interfere. But in this case it appears that the defendant had for twenty years known the plaintiffs' starch was sold as "Glenfield Starch." What could have been his object in putting the word "Glenfield" so conspicuously on his labels? If it had been a place well known, I could quite understand his doing so, but to what am I to attribute all this anxiety on his part to use the name? I am satisfied that his object was to make use of the reputation of the plaintiffs. The case is precisely similar to the case lately before me of the Guinea Coal Company, Lee v. Haley, L. Rep. 4 W. N. 258, 268; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 546. The sole object of the defendant in that case was to avail himself of the connection and reputation of the plaintiffs, as I am satisfied the object of the defendant in this case is to avail himself of the connection and reputation of the plaintiffs, and thereby to induce the public to buy his starch as the starch of the plaintiffs. Whatever words or description he used on his labels, he should not have used the one word the use of which would prove injurious to the plaintiffs. I am satisfied that this was a deliberate and fraudulent intention on the part of the defendant to palm off upon the public his starch as the plaintiffs', and such a proceeding this court will not for one moment tolerate. The reason given by the defendant for setting up his works at Glenfield—namely, that there was a spring of water there particularly suited to the manufacture of starch, is, my opinion, a frivolous pretence. But the defendant contends that, as he is carrying on his business at Glenfield, he is therefore entitled to use the name on his packets, and that the plaintiffs do not possess an exclusive right to the name; but I think that the court, in coming to a conclusion on cases of this kind, should look at all the surrounding circumstances of the case, and endeavour to ascertain what is the intention and object of the defendant. The case here is analogous to that of a man selling goods under his own name, when the same class of goods has been previously sold by another man under the same name, and so have acquired a reputation in the market. I quite agree with what is laid down by Mr. Kerr in his work on Injunctions, p. 477, where he says, "The mere user by a man of his own name is of itself no evidence of fraud, but there may be other elements in the case, showing that the name has been fraudulently used for the purpose of reaping the benefit of the reputation which another has already acquired. It is in each case a matter of evidence, whether or not the use of the name has been fraudulent. The principle on which the court proceeds in cases of this sort is accurately laid down by Lord Langdale in Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66; there he says, "A man is not to sell his own goods under the pretence that they are the goods of another man; he cannot be permitted to practise such a deception, nor to use the means which contribute to that end; he cannot, therefore, be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia, by which he may induce purchasers to believe that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person. I own it does not seem to me that a man can acquire a property merely in a name or mark, but whether he has or not a property in the name or the mark, I have no doubt that another person has not a right to use that name or mark for the purposes of deception, and in order to attract to himself that course of trade, or that custom, which, without that improper act, would have flowed to the person who first used, or was alone in the habit of using, the particular name or mark." The case of the Leather Cloth Company v. American Leather Cloth Company (sup.), turned entirely on the imitation not being colourable, so that the common run of mankind could not have mistaken the one trade mark for the other. The case of Seix v. Provisende (sup.), is exactly applicable to this case. There the court acted on the principle that a man whose goods have obtained a reputation in the market is entitled to all the advantages of that reputation. [The Vice-Chancellor referred at length to that case, and continued:] Looking, then, at the whole of the circumstances of this case, I feel satisfied that the defendant, in printing and exhibiting the name "Glenfield" so conspicuously on his labels without any address did so with the idea that he could gain some profit for himself out of the celebrity of the plaintiffs; and I think it is conclusively shown by the conduct of the defendant throughout that it was his deliberate intention to get his starch known as "Glenfield Starch," under which title the plaintiffs' starch was extensively known. On all these grounds, I am clearly of opinion that an injunction must be granted in the terms of the notice of motion.

Re CHAWNER'S WILL.

Mortgage—General power to mortgage—Power of sale.

A testator directed his trustees to raise a sum of money by mortgage, as they thought fit, and subject to such mortgage devised the estate to certain persons:

Held, that the direction to mortgage gave the trustees power to insert in the mortgage a power of sale.

This case came on upon a petition presented by the trustees of the will of Edward H. Chawner, dated in Aug. 1868, whereby he devised a certain estate to the petitioners, to whom he gave a general power, by mortgage, out of said estate, to raise a certain sum of money, in their discretion. And the estate, subject to such direction, was given in a certain manner, and upon this no question turned. The trustees were uncertain whether, in mortgaging the estate under the power given by the will, they could insert in the mortgage-deed a power of sale, and they now petitioned under Lord St. Leonards' Act (22 & 23 Vict. c. 35) for the advice and opinion of the court upon that question.

Wingfield in support of the petition. It was always considered that a mortgage should, to make it perfect, contain a power of sale. No doubt the cases were conflicting. In Clark v. Royal Panopticon, 4 Drew, 26, Kindersley, V.C. held that a power to mortgage did not include a power of sale; but then came Lord Cranworth's Act (23 & 24 Vict. c. 145), which by sect. 11 makes a power of sale essential to a mortgage; and that was also held by the Master of the Rolls in Bridger v. Longman, 24 Beav. 27; also in Cook v. Dawson, 29 Beav. 123. Here there was, moreover, a direction with an absolute discretion.

Streeten for the devisees.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I consider that a power to mortgage includes a power of sale, that is, that a power of sale is a necessary incident to such power. When a testator directs money to be raised by mortgage, he means in the ordinary way, and that the mortgage deed should contain what such deeds do generally contain—that is, a power of sale. I quite concur in the opinion expressed by Lord Romilly in Cook v. Dawson, where he says that a power to mortgage includes the power to give to the mortgagee all such remedies as he ought to have, one of such remedies being a power of sale. I consider, therefore, and I express my opinion to be, that these trustees being directed to raise a sum of money by mortgage of the trust estate, as they shall think fit, have power to insert in the deed a power of sale, but only with six months' notice.

Practice—Declaration of Title Act—(25 & 26 Vict. c. 67), s. 6.

Where, upon a petition presented under the above Act, the petitioner proves such possession and states such title as, if established, would entitle him to a declaration under the Act, a reference will be ordered to chambers to establish the title.

This was an unopposed petition, presented in the matter of the Declaration of Title Act 1862, by Thomas Roberts, an infant, by his guardians, praying for a declaration that under the provisions of the above Act, the petitioner was entitled to one moiety of a house, No. 41, Windmill-street, near the Haymarket, for an absolute inheritance in fee simple in possession, free from incumbrance, subject only to a lease, in the petition mentioned, to one John Proger.

The petition stated the will of Robert Hendy, dated the 31st May, 1806, whereby the house was devised to James Badham for life, remainder to his two daughters Elizabeth and Caroline, their heirs, and assigns, as tenants in common; the death of the testator and of James Badham; the marriage of Elizabeth Badham; the marriage of Caroline Badham to John Roberts; various leases of the property; the death of John Roberts and of Caroline Roberts, she having duly received one moiety of the rents up to her death; and that John Roberts, the eldest son and heir of his mother Caroline Roberts, died in May 1865, leaving the petitioner his heir at law; also that no solicitor was called in or consulted by Caroline Roberts, in reference to any will or testamentary disposition by her, that the petitioner had been informed by some of Mrs. Roberts's children that she was often requested by them to make a will, but refused to do so, invariably stating, that the premises would go under her settlement equally amongst her children; that diligent search had been made, but no trace could be found of the existence of the title deeds or of any settlement. That no such settlement was ever registered in Middlesex; and alleged that the petitioner was entitled to the moiety in fee. It was stated at the foot of the petition, that it was not intended to serve the petition on any person; nor had it been.

The petition was supported by the affidavits of the solicitor and of a member of the family.

W. H. Terrell, for the petitioner, referred to the 6th section of the Act 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR, being satisfied that the petitioner had proved such possession, and stated such title as, if established, would entitle him to a declaration under the Act, ordered a reference to chambers, in conformity with the 6th section.

Re BURRELL;

BURRELL v. SMITH.

Administration—Equity of redemption in copyhold—Legal or equitable assets—3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104—Insufficient estate—Costs of plaintiff as between solicitor and client.

In the administration of the estate of anyone dying before the 1st Jan. 1870, the equity of redemption of copyhold estate is legal assets.

Where a plaintiff in a suit for administering an insufficient estate for the benefit of others, had commenced the suit in the least expensive way possible, he was allowed his costs as between solicitor and client.

The question raised on this adjourned summons was, whether the equity of redemption of a copyhold estate was applicable to the payment of specialty debts in priority to simple contract debts; in other words, whether it was legal or equitable assets.

The testator, Thomas H. Burrell, who died in 1863, by his will appointed the defendant Smith and his (testator's) sister, Louisa Burrell, his executors, and devised to them all the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for the persons therein named, but he did not charge any part of his property with, or devise any part of it subject to, the payment of his debts.

As the whole of the real and personal estate was devised in trust for sale, an administration suit was commenced by one of the residuary legatees against the executors by summons.

It was found that the testator at his death was possessed of some copyhold property in mortgage. This was sold under an order in the suit, the mortgagees paid, and the balance, amounting to 259l. 16s., was now in court.

From the chief clerk's certificate, it appeared that if the specialty creditors were to have payment in priority, they alone would swallow up the whole of the assets.

The cause, which was adjourned out of chambers into court, now came on for further consideration, on the question of whether the 259l. 16s. representing the sale of the copyholds, was not equitable assets.

Cozens Hardy for the plaintiff.—The question turns upon the construction of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 104. We say that by that statute all real estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or customaryhold, is first made assets for the payment of all creditors—so far as the assets are equitable; but then comes the proviso at the end, which says that creditors by specialty in which the heirs are bound are not to lose their priority. If it be necessary, the point is decided in

Foster v. Handley, 1 Sim. N. S. 200; 15 Jur. 73;

F. H. Colt, for specialty creditors, supported the same view, and referred to Cook v. Gregson, 3 Drew. 547;

Cummings v. Cummings, T. & L. 64;

Boyle for the defendants, as representing the simple contract creditors.—It is admitted on the other side that by the former part of the statute this property is made equitable assets. Then as to the proviso it is contended that all it means is that creditors by specialty in which the heirs are bound are to have the same priority as they had before the Act. But before the Act creditors by specialty, in which the heirs are bound, could not go against copyhold estate; copyhold estate was never assets before the Act for any creditors whatever. Consequently, this is made by the statute equitable assets.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said it appeared to him the question was substantially governed by the authority of Foster v. Handley: (1 Sim. N. S. 200.) In that case the same sort of argument that had been used in this case with regard to an equity of redemption in copyholds was urged before Lord Cranworth with regard to an equity of redemption in freeholds, and was overruled by him. Indeed, according to one of the reports, Lord Cranworth, whether necessarily or not, actually ruled that an equity of redemption in copyholds was within the proviso, i.e., that it was legal assets. Accordingly he must hold that the specialty creditors must be paid in full in this fund also, before any of the simple contract creditors were paid.

Cozens Hardy asked for the costs of the plaintiff as between solicitor and client; and referred the court to Burkitt v. Ransom, 2 Cols. 536, followed by Weston v. Clowes, 15 Sim. 610; and see Morgan and Davey, on Costs, p. 136. The plaintiff began and carried on the suit in the least expensive way.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR held that the plaintiff in this instance was entitled to his costs as between solicitor and client.

CORBETT v. HILL.

Trespass—Contiguous houses—Projecting room—Right to space above the projection.

Plaintiff, the owner of two contiguous houses in the city of London, conveyed one of them to the defendants by a deed which correctly marked out on a plan the ground site of the house conveyed. Over this site there projected on the first floor, a room of the plaintiff's house, which was supported by the other house :

Held, that the right to the vertical column of air over the projection was determined by the ground site, and hence belonged not to the plaintiff, but to the defendants.

This was a motion for decree.

By a deed dated the 23rd April 1866, a messuage, warehouse, and hereditaments, numbered 15, Philpot-lane, "as the same were then in the occupation of" certain tenants, and another messuage, warehouse, and hereditaments, situate and being No. 34, Eastcheap, in the city of London, "as the same were then in the occupation of Joseph Prime" were conveyed to such uses as the plaintiff Charles Joseph Corbett should appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of the plaintiff for life, remainder to uses to bar dower, remainder to the use of the plaintiff in fee.

By an indenture dated the 26th June 1866, the messuage, warehouse, and hereditaments at 34, Eastcheap, "as the same was then lately in the occupation of Joseph Prime, and then of said Joseph Corbett," was conveyed by the plaintiff and another to the defendants Thomas Rowley Hill and Edward Bickerton Evans, their heirs and assigns.

On each indenture there was a plan drawn on the margin.

Shortly after June 1866, the defendants began pulling down the house and premises No. 34, Eastcheap, and the plaintiff then discovered that one of the rooms on the first-floor of his house, No. 15, Philpot-lane, projected into and was supported by the defendant's house. He also discovered that a cellar or vault belonging to his house No. 15, Philpot-lane projected under the basement floor of the defendant's house; and that, on the other hand, a cellar or vault belonging to the defendant's house, No. 34, Eastcheap, projected under the basement of the plaintiff's house.

Neither of these three projections appeared in the plans, which were of the ground-floor. The projecting cellar belonging to the plaintiff's house was in part virtually under the projecting room belonging to the plaintiff's house.

The defendants in rebuilding their premises No. 34, Eastcheap, manifested an intention of building over the roof of the projecting room—in other words, of entering upon the vertical column of air above the projecting room, and they claimed the right to do this.

The plaintiff, on the other hand, claimed the column of air above the projecting room usque ad cælum, and the soil below the projecting cellar usque ad inferos; and, after a correspondence, filed the bill on the 3rd Oct. 1868.

On the same day the Master of the Rolls granted an ex parte injunction to restrain any further erection; but the defendants nevertheless proceeded on the 3rd, and up to twelve o'clock on Monday the 6th Oct., when a notice to commit was served. By this time the walls of the building-over the projecting room were finished but not roofed in.

On the 3rd Dec. 1868 the defendants moved before Giffard, V.C., now Lord Justice, to dissolve the injunction, when his Lordship dissolved the injunction, but reserved the costs to the hearing.

The bill as amended prayed for a declaration that the projecting room was not comprised in the hereditaments conveyed to the defendants by the deed of the 26th June 1866, and for an injunction to restrain the defendants from erecting, or building, or placing any erection or structure over or on the roof of the projecting room, or any part thereof.

Amphlett, Q. C. and Lindley for the plaintiff.—The bill is filed to prevent not a mischief, but a perpetual trespass. They cited

Doe v. Burt, 1 Tr. 701;

Press v. Parker, 2 Bing. 456;

Martyr v. Lawrence, 2 De G. J. & S. 261;

Kerslake v. White, 2 Starkie, 508;

Kay, Q. C. and Bovill, for the defendants, were not called upon.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case the plaintiff seeks an injunction to prevent the continuance of a building which has been erected over a certain property, which, but for two rooms that I am about to refer to, would be a court-yard into which there would be an opening into the house 34, Eastcheap. The plaintiff conveyed that house to the defendant. He conveyed it by a plan which carefully delineates the site of the house. The ordinary rule of law is that whoever has got the solum—whoever has got the site, is the owner of everything up to the sky and down to the centre of the earth; but that ordinary presumption of law no doubt is frequently rebutted, particularly with regard to property in towns, by the fact that other adjoining tenements of a joint ownership or from other circumstances protrude themselves over the freehold; and the question is, whether the protrusion is a diminution of so much of the freehold, including the right upwards and downwards, or whether the protrusion is not merely the right to that horizontal stratum limited by the ceiling on one side and the floor on the other, that is to say, a flat. In my opinion this protruding room here was simply a protrusion of that extent and that limited character. It was a protrusion which the plaintiff has retained as part of his freehold in Philpot-lane. According to the cases to which Mr. Amphlett referred, a man may have a solum or soil which may be apparently in another man's house. My opinion is as clear as anything can be that that room remains part of the house in Philpot-lane. But being part of the house in Philpot-lane does not carry with it anything above or anything below; that is, subject to the exception which has been obtained or made by reason of the protrusion, the owner of the house in Eastcheap still remains the owner of everything, including the column of air over which the supposed trespass has been made. That being so, the plaintiff has failed. The decree will be: "The court being of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to the column of air over so much of the projecting room as projects over the site described in the plan, dismiss the bill with costs; but without prejudice to any question as to the ownership of the room."

Re THE MERCHANTS' AND TRADESMEN'S ASSURANCE SOCIETY.

Mutual assurance company—Transfer of business—Policy-holder—Novation of contract.

By the deed of settlement of an assurance society dated in 1847, it was provided that the subscription capital should be subject to be paid off as therein provided; and in the mean time was to be deemed a guarantee fund. The general funds of the society other than the guarantee fund were to be called the assurance fund. In 1855 the subscription capital was paid back to the subscribers with interest and a bonus, and the guarantee fund was put an end to, the shareholders mutually releasing each other. In Feb. 1858, the society transferred all their goodwill, premiums, and effects to an association; and it was agreed that all the liabilities of the society in respect of the policies should be borne by the association; that the association should indemnify the society and its members; and that all claims in respect of policies should be paid and satisfied out of the funds of the association. In Oct. 1858, the business of the association was transferred to the Albert Company.

A policy having been effected in 1850 with the directors of the society, and the life having dropped in 1863, since which time the Albert Company and the association had both been ordered to be wound-up, the holders of the policy presented a petition to wind-up the society.

Held, that the agreement in 1858 effected a complete novation of the original contract between the assured and the society; and petition dismissed.

Semle, after the payment off of the subscription capital of the society in 1855, the society could no longer be the subject of a winding-up order.

This was a petition by Thomas Stephens, executor of Joseph Laycock, deceased, for the common order to wind-up The Merchants' and Tradesmen's Mutual Life Assurance Society.

By the deed of settlement of the society, dated the 9th March 1847, and made between the shareholders of the first part, the directors of the second part, the auditors of the third part, the trustees of the fourth part, and a covenantee for the society of the fifth part, after reciting that the immediate subscription capital of the society was to be 100,000*l.*, in 2000 shares of 50*l.* each, which was to be paid off, with interest, and a bonus as soon as such an amount of profits should have been realised as to make its continuance unnecessary, the parties thereto of the first, second, third, and fourth parts covenanted with the covenantee, amongst other things, as follows:—

The subscription capital of 100,000*l.*, in 2000 shares of 50*l.* each, was to be subject to be paid off as thereafter provided, and in the mean time was to be deemed a guarantee fund. The general funds of the society, other than the subscription capital, were to be called "the assurance fund," and were to consist of all premiums, fines, and other moneys or payments to be received for policies.

Clause 22 provided that as soon as it should appear that the net profits of the assurance fund should be equal in amount to double the amount of the bonuses, it should be lawful for the directors to convene an extraordinary general meeting, and lay before it a statement of the debts, assets, and liabilities of the society; and, subject to the direction of the meeting as to the time and place of payment, the amount paid up by each shareholder in respect of his shares, with a bonus of 5*l.* per cent., should be paid and returned to him, thereupon the guarantee fund should be discontinued and wound-up; the shareholders should be acquitted and discharged, as respected the society, and indemnified by the society against strangers, from all further obligations, liabilities, and transactions of the society in respect of their shares, and from all the covenants and stipulations of the deed of settlement, except as to any previous breach; thereupon the clauses and provisions therein contained, so far as the same were applicable to shareholders, should be considered at an end as respected shareholders only, and the balance then standing to the credit of the assurance fund should thenceforth form the assurance fund of the society, and be the only fund for receiving and paying all moneys on account of its business and affairs.

By clause 25 "the bonus apportioned to members in respect of any policy" fallen due since the last apportionment was to be paid forthwith, or (clause 28) be allowed in reduction of premium.

By clause 186 all sums to be claimed under any policy were to be paid out of the funds of the society; and by clause 189 all shareholders and members of the society were to be entitled to the same remedies against the society for the recovery of any policies, annuities, or bonuses as they would be entitled or subject to as assured if not shareholders or members.

By clause 193, the directors were empowered to make sale of or transfer, on sufficient indemnity, any portion of the business, policies, or contracts of the society to any other society or company of the like nature.

Clause 239 provided that if at an extraordinary general meeting a resolution, already passed at a special meeting of directors, should be passed, for dissolving the society, and the same should be confirmed, then from the time of such confirmation the society should, except for the purpose of winding-up the affairs thereof, be dissolved, and the business concluded, "and save by the means aforesaid no dissolution shall be had of the society."

Clauses 240 and 241 were as follows:

240. Immediately upon the dissolution of the society the directors shall, out of the funds and property of the society, pay and satisfy all immediate demands from or in respect of assurances, annuities, endowments, or other contracts or engagements, and shall, if practicable, obtain from other assurance companies, an undertaking to pay and satisfy the remainder of such claims and demands, and in consideration thereof shall cause to be transferred to such other assurance company, or as the directors thereof shall appoint, so much of the funds or property of the society as shall be agreed upon between the contracting parties as sufficient, and shall cause to be done and executed all such contracts, acts, deeds, matters, and things as in the opinion of the directors shall be necessary or advisable for carrying the said arrangement into effect, and if any funds or property of the society shall remain, after answering all claims on the society and other the purposes aforesaid, the directors shall cause so much thereof as shall not consist of money to be converted into money, and shall then cause the clear moneys or funds of the society, if any, to be divided, paid, and distributed in such manner as the directors shall think fit amongst the shareholders and members thereof for the time being, according to their right and interest therein.

241. Notwithstanding dissolution of the society, the deed of settlement and duties of the shareholders and members—including the powers to call and hold extraordinary or general meetings, and the powers to call for and enforce the payment of further instalments on shares, or contribution from the members—shall, until all claims and demands shall have been respectively satisfied and provided, and until a final division shall have been made of the residue (if any) of such moneys or funds as aforesaid, remain in full force so far as the same may be necessary for discharging the liabilities of the society and winding-up the affairs thereof.

On the 4th June 1850, Joseph Laycock effected a policy with the society on his own life for 200*l.* The policy was executed by three of the directors; and it was agreed that the sum assured should be paid "out of the funds of the society."

By a deed dated the 1st Nov. 1855, and made between the shareholders of the society of the one part, and the directors of the other part—after reciting that it had been ascertained by the directors that the net profits of the society were then equal to double the amount of the bonuses directed to be paid to the shareholders by the deed of settlement; that the directors had that day, in pursuance of a resolution duly passed to that effect, paid to the several shareholders the amount of the capital actually paid-up by each of them in respect of his shares, with a bonus of 5*l.* per cent.; and that, pursuant to the same resolution, the guarantee fund had been discontinued and wound-up—the parties thereunto mutually released each other from all claims and demands for or on account of any matter or thing in any wise relating to the society. The directors also covenanted to indemnify the shareholders.

By an agreement, dated the 25th Feb. 1858, and made between the society of the first part, the directors of the second part, the directors of the Bank of London and National Provincial Insurance Association of the third part, and the trustees of the association of the fourth part, after reciting that the directors of the society had proposed to dispose of and transfer the business of the society to the association, and the directors of the association had agreed to purchase the same for considerations stated in two several agreements, bearing even date therewith, it was witnessed that the society and its directors thereby disposed of and transferred to the association all the goodwill, benefit, and advantage of the society, and all the premiums which, as from the 5th Dec. 1857, might or would be payable, with the lease and all the estate, effects, and credits of the society.

The trustees and directors of the association thereby agreed to enter into all necessary covenants (but so as to be binding upon the assets of the association only, and not upon themselves personally in their respective assets) for payment of the rent and covenants in the society's lease, and for indemnifying the society from the same.

The agreement also contained the following clauses:—

2. The risks, engagements, and liabilities of the society, upon or in respect of the said policies respectively, and also upon or in respect of all other the affairs and business of the society whatsoever, and notwithstanding the omission of any such risk, engagement, or liability in the account or statement hereinafter provided for, shall be undertaken and borne by the association; and the association, by their trustees and directors on their behalf, shall and will indemnify the society and the directors thereof from and against all such the aforesaid risks, engagements, and liabilities respectively, and from and against all costs, charges, and expenses in respect of the present agreements, and the carrying of the same into effect or otherwise in relation thereto.

3. All claims whatsoever which shall be made or become payable upon policies of the society in respect of the deaths of persons assured by them, and also upon all other the affairs and business of the society as aforesaid, shall, subject to such lawful exceptions as the directors of the society might have made, be paid and satisfied by and out of the funds of the association.

8. The directors of the society, as far as they reasonably can, will procure the several persons holding or entitled to policies or other engagement in the society, to accept in exchange for or renewal thereof, policies or engagements of the association. And in all cases, whether such exchange or renewal shall or shall not be made, the association will indemnify the society and their directors against all liabilities whatsoever in respect of such policies and engagements, so long as the same shall respectively remain in force.

13. The society shall not, after the day of the date hereof, enter into any engagement, or incur any liability whatsoever (other than such as may be necessary for carrying on the ordinary business of the society), without the consent and approval of the board of directors of the association.

The Bank of London Association was not a registered company, and the liability of the shareholders was not limited, except by the terms of the life and other policies granted by the association.

By another agreement dated the 7th Oct. 1858, the business of the association was transferred to the Albert Life Assurance Company, and the agreement was confirmed by the shareholders of the association on the 20th Oct. following.

On the 29th Sept. 1868, Joseph Laycock died. In Sept. 1869 the Albert Company was ordered to be wound-up; the Bank of London Association was also in liquidation.

Mr. George Thomson, who was manager of the society from its commencement until Feb. 7, 1858, deposed that under the circumstances which he stated, namely, the agreement and resolutions above mentioned, there are "no shareholders in" the society, and the society "has no capital, stock, money, funds, or assets of any description."

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It appears to me that if I had seen the deed of Feb. 1858, I should have stopped the argument in limine, that is to say, I should have endeavoured to stop it without the great waste of time, which seems to me to have occurred since the matter was first mentioned on Saturday. The matter seems to me almost too plain for anything that can be called argument. The society was a mutual society, I think, in 1855, with nothing but an insurance fund; and there was a right to have payment out of that fund when the event occurred in 1858, by a transaction to which the petitioner, or the person whom the petitioner represents, was a party, that is to say, by a general meeting of the society all the members of the society entered into an arrangement, by which, in fact, the mutual association was effectually put an end to. And by a deed by which they are all bound, all the assets of the company, including that fund, were handed over to another society. That other society entered into these stipulations, by that same deed. The risks, engagements, and liabilities of the society, upon or in respect of the said policies respectively, and also upon or in respect of all other the affairs and business of the society whatsoever, and notwithstanding the omission of any such risk, engagement, or liability in the account or statement hereinafter provided for, shall be undertaken and borne by the association; and the association, by their trustees and directors on their behalf, shall and will indemnify the society and the directors thereof from and against all such risks, engagements, and liabilities respectively, and from and against all costs, charges, and expenses in respect of the present agreement, and the carrying of the same into effect, or otherwise in relation thereto, all claims whatsoever which shall be made or become payable upon policies of the society in respect of the deaths of persons assured by them, and also upon all other the affairs and business of the society, shall, subject to such lawful exceptions as the directors of the society might have made, be paid and satisfied out of the funds of the association." After that bargain on the part of this man, it is impossible for him to say that there is anything to be done. He has no right to call on any of his brother policy-holders to pay him anything. He has no right whatever to have any funds distributed between him and them. He has his remedies, and whatever those remedies may be it is not for me to point them out, against the society which undertook to pay this policy with his consent. If there ever was a case of novation (supposing that there originally was a creditor and debtor, which there would not be here) this seems to be the most complete novation that could possibly be conceived. Whether there has been any subsequent novation as between the Bank of London and the Albert is not a matter now before me to consider. The petition must be dismissed with costs. The two companies will take their costs out of their own funds respectively. His Honour added that one or other of the companies ought to pay the petitioner.

BOWES v. LAW.

Buildings—Covenant not to erect—Boundary wall—
Vinery—Damages—Injunction—Parties—Costs.

Plaintiff bought a piece of land, bounded on the south by a road, from a vendor, who covenanted by the conveyance that "no buildings," except dwelling-houses of a definite building cost, should be erected on the land on the other side of the road. Defendant afterwards contracted to purchase from the same vendor the land on the other side of the road, which he also agreed to fence in by a railing or walling from 4ft. to 7ft. high. Defendant also agreed to enter into a covenant with the vendor similar to that which the plaintiff had entered into.

Defendant afterwards turned the land which he had agreed to purchase into part of his pleasure ground, and built a boundary wall running along the road, 8ft. 6in. high, except at one spot, where he raised it for a few feet in length to 11ft. high, in order to support against it the roof of a vinery, which he also built on the land agreed to be purchased by him:

Held, that the building of the garden wall to the height of 8ft. 6in. was not a breach of the covenant:

Held, further, that the raising of the wall to the height of 11ft., and the building of the vinery, were breaches of the covenant.

The court refused to order the defendant to pull down the wall and vinery, and gave the plaintiff 40s. damages.

The plaintiff having made the vendor a defendant, was ordered to pay his costs, he being an unnecessary party.

By an indenture dated the 29th Oct. 1866, the defendant George Allison conveyed to the plaintiff Thomas Bowes a piece of land, bounded on the south by a street or road called Carlton-terrace, being part of the Mard End Estate, in the parish of Croft, near Darlington, Yorkshire. By the same deed Allison covenanted with Bowes that "no building, except dwelling-houses to front with Carlton-terrace, should be erected or built on any of the lots numbered 30 to 47, both inclusive, on the plan thereinbefore referred to, and should not be of a less cost than 200l. for each house on each lot."

In 1869 George Allison contracted with the other defendant, the Rev. Frederick Henry Law, rector of Croft, for the sale to him of these lots, numbered 30 to 47, and other adjoining property; and by the agreement Mr. Law stipulated to make a permanent fence around the premises, to the satisfaction of the vendor or his agent, either by railing or walling from 4 to 7ft. high. He also agreed that he would enter into a covenant with the vendor, similar to that stated above, and indemnify the vendor against any breach of the same.

Mr. Law proceeded to throw this land into the pleasure ground adjoining the rectory, and he built along Carlton-terrace a wall, 8ft. 6in. high throughout, except at one part where he raised it 11ft., and built inside it a vinery with a roof leaning against the wall.

The plaintiff, in May 1869, filed the bill for an injunction to restrain the defendant, Mr. Law, from continuing the erection of this wall and vinery.

A mandatory injunction was moved for on the 11th Nov. last, and was ordered to stand to the hearing, on the defendant's undertaking.

Kay, Q.C. and Dewsnap, for the plaintiff, contended that both the wall and the vinery were "buildings," and so within the restriction. They cited

Tipping v. Sokersby, 2 K. & J.;

Coles v. Sims, 6 De G. M. & G. 1;

Childs v. Douglas, 5 De G. M. & G. 739.

Amphlett, Q.C. and Kekewich, for the defendant Law, argued that a wall was not a building within the meaning of this covenant; that a wall of 8ft. 6in. in height, and in a small part of it 11ft. high, could not damage the plaintiff to any appreciable extent, and was far more advantageous to him than a row of houses built for 200l. each; and that a vinery, even if a building, could not be a breach of the covenant, as it was actually out of sight. They cited

Morish v. Harris, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 155;

Keates v. Lyon, L. Rep. 4 Ch. 218; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 258.

Kay, in reply, on the question of the wall only. It is not necessary to show pecuniary damage when it is sought to restrain the breach of a contract.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts).—Now the word "buildings" is perhaps an ambiguous expression, and certainly in its ordinary use does not signify a wall. I certainly think that the repairing or reinstating of buildings would include the repairing or reinstating of a garden wall, or of a wall inclosing or defining some portion of a field, as is to be found in some parts of the country. It may be that in a covenant of this kind the word "buildings" may have a more restricted meaning; but I observe that in Child v. Douglas (Kay 560; 5 De G. M. & G. 739) the word "building" was held to apply to the erection of a very high wall, rising to some fifteen feet. A difference of opinion certainly was expressed by one of the learned judges (Knight Bruce, L.J.), and no concurrence of opinion was expressed by the other (Turner, L.J.); and even the learned judge who decided the point said that whilst he was of opinion that a wall fifteen feet high would be an infringement, he doubted whether the covenant would prevent the erection of a wall five feet high; and he was satisfied that a wall two feet high with an iron railing upon it, was not at all events such a "building" as the court would interfere with. In this case, sitting as judge and jury, I have to consider whether the erection of a boundary wall, including the portion of it of increased height where the vinery is placed, is a breach of the covenant. The lower portion of the wall is 8ft. 6in. high, which is not an unusual or improper height, or different in these respects from a wall two feet high and surrounded by a railing, as suggested by the Lord Chancellor in Child v. Douglas. I am of opinion that such a wall as this, built bonâ fide as a boundary of a garden, is quite as proper and justifiable as the wall four feet high with the iron railing upon it, referred to in the judgment in that case. Therefore, I am of opinion as regards the wall, that as to that part of the prayer which asks that the defendant be ordered "to pull down and remove any wall or walls from the same premises," the suit has failed; and I may observe that the draftsman has been obliged to add the words "wall or walls," wishing to bring them within the terms of the injunction, though the covenant has the word "building" only. I think that the suit, so far as that goes, has failed; but I am of opinion that the erection of a vinery and the making of the wall of a greater height at that spot is a clear infraction of the covenant against "buildings," except of the specified class. If this were allowed merely because the roof of the vinery is constructed by way of slope against the wall, the plaintiff might be deprived of the benefit of his covenant, by the erection in a similar way of a stable, a cowhouse, or anything else which might be built against the wall, and which might cause the very injury to the property sought to be provided against, viz., the erection of some offensive or injurious building, instead of or in addition to the erection of houses of the value of 200l. or upwards. The plaintiff, therefore, it appears to me, was well founded as far as regards the vinery; and the question for the court is, what ought to be done; whether a mandatory injunction ought to be granted, or whether the alternative jurisdiction should be resorted to, which has been given to the court by recent legislation. I am of opinion, having regard to all the circumstances, and considering that no substantial annoyance or injury has been occasioned to any right of the defendant's, that a declaration will be sufficient for the purpose of protecting the title, and I do not think it necessary to give to the plaintiff the power of doing such an unreasonable and unneighbourly act as that of taking down this vinery, which is a great convenience to the defendant without affording to the plaintiff, himself, any benefit. I propose, therefore, to declare that the erection of a boundary wall on the piece of ground is no breach of the covenant in the bill mentioned; but that the raising of the wall for the purpose of placing, and the placing against it of a vinery, are breaches of the covenant. But, under the circumstances of the case, the court doth not think fit to order the removal thereof, and doth assess the damages in respect thereof at 40s. Then there must be an injunction to restrain the defendant Law from making any further addition to the wall or vinery, further than putting a coping to the wall, or from committing any other breach of the covenant; and the defendant Law must pay the costs of the suit, except the costs of the defendant Allison, who was not a necessary party, which must be paid by the plaintiff.

REGISTRATION APPEAL.

Friday, Jan. 21.

WALLIS (app.) v. BIRKS (resp.)

Registration—County vote—Perpetual curate—Equitable freeholder.

A. being perpetual curate of B., land within the parish of B. of more than 40s. annual value was conveyed in accordance with the statute in that behalf, to A. and his successors, in exchange for other lands of equal value. The perpetual curacy had never been augmented out of Queen Anne's Bounty. On the death of A., C. was made perpetual curate of B. in his stead:

Held, that C. had at least such an equitable freehold interest in the land in question as to entitle him to have his name inserted on the list of voters for the parish of B.

At a court, held before the revising barrister appointed for the revision of the list of voters for the parish of Burwell, in the county of Cambridge, William Wallis duly objected to the name of the Rev. Thomas Rawson Birks being inserted in the list of voters for the said parish.

The Rev. Thomas Rawson Birks (the respondent) was the incumbent, as the perpetual curate, of the parish of the Holy Trinity, Cambridge. He was licensed upon due presentation thereto on the 5th Jan. 1866, "to perform the office of perpetual curate or incumbent of the church of the perpetual curacy of the Holy Trinity, Cambridge" (as appeared by the instruments which were set out in the case.) He claimed to be on the register of voters in respect of land at Burwell, in the county of Cambridge, of more than the clear annual value of 40s., which was taken in exchange for other land attached to such perpetual curacy.

By a certain indenture of exchange, bearing date the 2nd Sept. 1856, and made between Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson, therein described of the first part; the Right Rev. Thomas, Lord Bishop of Ely, ordinary and patron of the vicarage of the parish of Holy Trinity, in the borough of Cambridge, of the second part; and the Rev. Chas. Clayton, clerk, Fellow of Caius College, Cambridge, in the University of Cambridge, incumbent of the said vicarage, of the third part; whereby it is amongst other things recited that, by indenture bearing date the 5th April 1855, and made between Frederick Randall of the first part, William Wilson of the second part, John Eadon of the third part, and the said Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson of the fourth part, and for the valuable considerations therein mentioned, the piece of land situate at Benwell aforesaid, hereinafter particularly described, was conveyed and assured to such uses as the said Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson, or the survivor of them, his executors or administrators, should at any time before the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of such survivor, by any deed or deeds appoint, and in default thereof and subject thereto, to the use of the said Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson, their heirs and assigns for ever. And whereby it is further recited that, by virtue of an Act of Parliament passed in the 55th year of the reign of his late Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act to enable spiritual persons to exchange the parsonage or glebe houses or glebe lands belonging to their benefices, for others of greater value or more conveniently situated for their residence and occupation, and for annexing such houses and lands so taken in exchange to such benefices or parsonage, or glebe house and glebe lands, and for purchasing and annexing lands to become glebe in certain cases, and for other purposes," it was lately agreed between the said Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson that the said Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson should give to the said Charles Clayton and his successors, the pieces or parcels of land thereinbefore mentioned, and thereafter particularly described, in exchange for a piece of land situated in the parish of St. Andrew-the-less, in the borough of Cambridge. And whereby it is further recited that the several directions in the said recited Act had been complied with, and that in pursuance of the said recited Act, and the said proceedings taken by virtue thereof, the said recited agreement for the said exchange had been and was thereby ratified and confirmed by the said Thomas Lord Bishop of Ely, as ordinary and patron, and by the said Charles Clayton as incumbent of the said vicarage. It was thereby witnessed that, in pursuance of the said recited agreement, and in consideration of the said piece of land in the parish of St. Andrew-the-Less, in the borough of Cambridge, so agreed to be given in exchange, they the said Thomas Morland and Conrad Wilkinson, by and with the consent and approbation of the said Thomas, Lord Bishop of Ely, as ordinary and patron of the said vicarage, upon the acceptance of the said Charles Clayton as incumbent, by and with the consent and approbation of the said ordinary and patron testified as therein mentioned, did grant, bargain, sell, and exchange unto the said Charles Clayton and his successors, vicars of the said vicarage for the time being, for ever (inter alia), all that piece or parcel of land situate, lying, and being in Burwell aforesaid, containing by admeasurement 2a. 1r. 15p., then or late in the occupation of James Scott, together with the appurtenances thereto belonging, to hold the same with the appurtenances unto and to the sole use and benefit of the said Charles Clayton and his successors, vicars of the said vicarage of Holy Trinity aforesaid, for the time being, for ever, in exchange for the said piece or parcel of land and appurtenances, situate in the said parish of St. Andrew-the-Less, in the said borough of Cambridge.

No proof was given of any augmentation from Queen Anne's bounty of such curacy.

The following is a copy of the claim:—

Reverend Thomas Rawson Birks.	7, Trumpington Road, Cambridge.	Freehold Land.	Broad Hedges.
-------------------------------------	---------------------------------------	-------------------	------------------

The revising barrister decided that such incumbency being a perpetual curacy conferred upon Mr. Birks a sufficient freehold estate in the property at Burwell (he receiving the rents thereof), as to entitle him to vote in respect thereof, and he allowed his vote accordingly.

If the court should be of opinion that the respondent had a sufficient freehold interest in the said land, his name was to be retained on the register, but if otherwise, then his name was to be erased.

O'Malley, Q. C., for the appellant.—The statute 1 Geo. 1, stat. 2, c. 10, s. 4, provides that where any minister of any church, curacy, or chapel shall receive a grant from the Queen Anne's bounty, he and his successors shall be deemed a body politic with perpetual succession by such name as in the grant of such augmentation shall be mentioned. The grant of the land, in respect of which the respondent claims, was made to Mr. Clayton (the former perpetual curate), and his successors; but as it is found in the case that no grant was ever made out of Queen Anne's bounty to this perpetual curacy, the perpetual curate was not and is not a body corporate, and the respondent is not in point of law Mr. Clayton's successor. The respondent is nothing but a stipendiary curate, and cannot take land in succession. He cited

[WILLES, J.—Who then is entitled to the land?] Possibly Mr. Clayton, or else it reverts to the grantor. That, however, is another question. [WILLES, J.—If the land reverted to the grantor, that would hold good in equity as a trust for the benefit of the successive incumbents of this curacy. In any case, the present curate has an equitable right by the conveyance. He is thus at all events the equitable freeholder, and that is quite sufficient.]

YGLESIAS AND OTHERS v. THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

Costs, taxation of—Commission to examine witnesses abroad—Costs of sending out a barrister from England—Master's discretion.

In a case of great intricacy and importance, a commission was obtained to examine witnesses in the Canaries, and the plaintiff sent out, as one of his commissioners, an English barrister. In taxation of the plaintiff's costs, the master allowed a large sum for the fees and expenses of the barrister, and the court refused to interfere.

This was an action on a policy of insurance on a cargo of cochineal from the Canary Islands. The defendants pleaded, in substance, that the plaintiffs had not shipped a cargo of cochineal, but of barley, and had subsequently jettisoned it. They had also taken criminal proceedings in the Spanish courts against the shippers and the captain of the ship.

The plaintiffs, before the trial, obtained a commission to go to the Canary Islands to examine witnesses. Three commissioners were appointed by the plaintiffs, two of whom were mercantile men, residing on the spot, while the third was Mr. Underdown, an English barrister. The defendants also sent out a barrister to cross-examine the witnesses. The commission sat for twenty-two days, and Mr. Underdown was engaged twenty-three days besides in travelling.

At the trial before Bovill, C.J., a verdict was found for the plaintiffs. The master, on taxation of costs, allowed the sum of 575*l.* 9*s.* 8*d.* as the fees (at the rate of ten guineas a day) and travelling expenses of Mr. Underdown.

Watkin Williams for the defendants now moved for a rule to review the taxation, on the ground that the allowance for the plaintiffs' commissioner was excessive. He relied on the case of Potter v. Rankin, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 76, where the court had declined to interfere with the decision of the master, who had refused to allow for expenses of this character.

J. C. Mathew for the plaintiffs showed cause in the first instance. Under the circumstances, the employment by the plaintiffs of an English barrister was a necessary and reasonable step. Potter v. Rankin shows that this is a matter for the discretion of the master, and that when he has exercised it the court will not interfere.

BOVILL, C. J.—It is impossible to lay down any rule of universal application in these cases. In a general way, the master would, I should say, refuse to allow for the expenses of an English barrister sent out from this country to conduct a commission. At the same time there may be cases of such great importance, that each party might feel bound to avail himself of the services of counsel, and I am not aware that there is any inflexible rule against allowing their expenses. Whether they are to be allowed or not must of course depend upon the nature of the case. Now, it cannot be denied that this was a case of very great intricacy and importance. Charges of gross fraud were made, and even criminal proceedings instituted against the shippers. More than 800 questions were put by the defendants' commissioner and the issue of the trial, which took place before me, and lasted for five days, turned mainly upon the answers to the interrogatories. The defendants had, as one of their commissioners, a gentleman well versed in mercantile matters, and well able to conduct an inquiry of this kind. They had also a barrister to represent them. All these matters must be taken into consideration. They must be decided by somebody, and I know no one who has better means of deciding them than the master, who has the briefs before him. Knowing what I do of the case, I certainly cannot say that I think the master has used his discretion wrongly; indeed I think, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that he was quite right in deciding as he did. I think the court ought to follow the rule laid down in Potter v. Rankin, and refuse to interfere.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. A question of this description must always depend upon the special circumstances of the case. It is impossible to lay down any inflexible rule upon the subject, or to say that expenses, such as these, shall never be allowed. A discretion is left to the master to allow or disallow these expenses as he may see fit. His discretion is always considered final, and the court will never interfere, unless either he appears to have proceeded on an erroneous principle, or to have exercised his discretion in a manner that is palpably wrong. It cannot be said here that the master has fallen into either of these faults. After what I have heard from my Lord, I think that the defendants themselves have shown the necessity for the course taken by the plaintiffs. I think that it might be better, in most cases, to settle beforehand, whether a commissioner should go out from this country or not; but that, I believe, has never been the practice.

BRETT, J.—The many discussions we have had during the last term on the subject of costs, satisfies me more than ever of the propriety of the rule, that the master's discretion is not in general to be interfered with. At the same time it would, I think, be a great injustice if we were to hold as a rigid rule, that the exercise by the master of his discretion should in every case be final unless a principle were involved. In the present instance, I must say that the master appears to have properly considered the importance and the difficulty of the case, and that it has not been shown that he was wrong in deciding as he has done.

VICKERY AND WIFE v. LONDON, BRIGHTON, AND SOUTH COAST RAILWAY COMPANY.

Writ of inquiry—Taxation of costs—Good jury.

Upon a taxation of costs in a writ of inquiry before the Secondary, a guinea each was allowed by the master for a good jury. An order for a good jury had been previously obtained by the plaintiffs, and the jurors had been summoned from the special jury list:

Held, upon a rule to review the taxation, that this payment was a just and reasonable remuneration for the jury's services, and was properly allowed as costs against the defendants.

On the 14th Jan., Lopes, Q. C., on behalf of the defendants, obtained a rule nisi calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of the plaintiff's bill of costs in this cause in respect of the allowance of two counsel and matters incident thereto, the allowance of a good jury, and the amount paid to them.

The following was the affidavit of the defendant's attorney, upon which the rule was granted:

This action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages from the defendants in respect of certain injuries sustained by the plaintiffs at New Cross, on the 23rd June 1869, while travelling on defendants' railway.

The defendants suffered judgment by default, and a writ of inquiry was instituted before the Secondary of the City of London on the 18th Dec. last, and the damages were assessed by the jury at 180*l.*

The said writ of inquiry was executed by a good jury in pursuance of an order of Master Kaye, dated the 7th Dec. last, and made in consequence of a summons taken out by the plaintiff's attorney in that behalf, and the said order was silent as to costs.

On or about the 3rd Jan. last the plaintiffs' costs in this action were taxed by one of the masters of this honourable court.

The defendants object to the allowance of the following items in the bill of such costs so taxed against them:

Dec. 14th.—Two fair copies of brief with declaration, &c., folios 190 each	6	6	8
„ Two copies correspondence, equal to three B.S. each	1	0	0
„ Two copies particulars plaintiffs' claim folios 16 each	0	10	8
Dec. 16th.—Fee to Mr. Prentice, Q. C., and clerk, with brief	22	0	0
„ Attending him	0	13	4
„ Fee to him on consultation	2	19	6
„ Attending him to appoint	0	6	8
„ Fee to Mr. Thesiger, and clerk, with brief	16	10	0
„ Fee to him on consultation	1	3	6
Dec. 18th.—Paid jury	12	12	0

The defendants objected, as I am informed and believe, to the allowance of such items on the said taxation by the master.

No certificate by the said Secondary of the City of London of the said writ of inquiry being a fit and proper one to be determined by a good jury, was produced and shown to the master on the said taxation of costs.

An application was made by summons at chambers by defendants' attorneys for an order to stay proceedings in this cause for such time as should be sufficient to enable the defendants to apply to the court upon the question of costs, and thereupon by an order of the Honourable Mr. Justice Willes, dated the 10th of Jan. instant, it was ordered that all proceedings herein should be stayed until the 3rd day of next term, inclusive.

Affidavit of plaintiff's attorney in answer:

I have perused a copy of the rule in this cause, dated the 14th Jan. inst., and also a copy of the affidavit of defendant's attorney, upon which such rule was granted.

The writ of inquiry in this cause was executed before Mr. Secondary Potter and a good jury on the 18th Dec. 1869, and the hearing of the said cause occupied from eleven o'clock in the forenoon until past five o'clock in the afternoon, when the jury assessed the damages of the plaintiffs at 180*l.* beyond a sum of about 31*l.* already paid to plaintiffs by defendants.

The execution of the said writ of inquiry was attended by two counsel on behalf of the plaintiffs, and also by two counsel on behalf of the said defendants, and the brief for the said plaintiffs consisted of thirty sheets of paper, and contained the evidence of eleven witnesses; and nine witnesses were examined on the part of the said plaintiffs, and five on the part of the said defendants.

During the time occupied by the said jury retiring to consider the amount of damages to be assessed, I was applied to by the officer of the court for the court fees, and also for the fees for the jury, and I accordingly paid the sum 4*l.* 1*s.* for court fees, &c.; and on my asking the said officer what I was to pay the jury, he demanded of me one guinea for each of the said twelve jurymen, which I accordingly handed to him.

The Secondary of the said city of London duly certified on the writ of inquiry that this was a fit case to be heard by a special jury, and that such writ of inquiry, with the said certificate duly indorsed thereon, was produced to the master on the taxation of said costs. The circumstances under which the same was so produced are as follows:—On my applying for the return of the said writ of inquiry, and the finding of the jury indorsed thereon, I was informed by the said Secondary that he had not certified for a special jury, but if it was required he would do so, as he considered it a fit cause to be tried by a special jury; and on attending the said taxation of costs on the 3rd Jan. inst. I so informed the said master who allowed the costs of the said special jury, subject to the production of the said certificate of the said Secondary, and on the 14th Jan. inst. I, in company with defendant's attorney's clerk, again attended the said master, and produced to him the said certificate for a special jury, and he thereupon gave his allocatur for the amount of the said taxed costs.

During the progress of the said taxation the defendants objected to the master allowing two counsel, when I informed the said master what length the brief was, how many witnesses were examined, and how long the inquiry lasted; the said master then examined the brief, and stated that in his opinion, and he had had thirty-five years' experience, a brief with eleven witnesses was sufficient to warrant the attendance of two counsel, and he should exercise his discretion and allow them; the defendants then submitted to the said master that if he allowed two counsel the fees were excessive; but the said master, upon argument, decided the fees were not excessive, and allowed them.

I say that I, on behalf of the said plaintiffs, attended the said summons on the 10th Jan. inst., for a stay of proceedings to enable the defendants to apply to this honourable court for an order for the master to review his taxation of costs herein, and the endorsement made thereon by the honourable Mr. Justice Willes was as follows:—"Order until the 3rd day of term not inclusive. I express no opinion."

I have consulted with counsel as to the advisability of applying to this honourable court to set aside the said writ of inquiry, and obtaining a new writ on the ground of the insufficiency of damages, and upon such consultation counsel was of opinion that the said damages were quite inadequate to the injuries received, but thought the plaintiffs could not succeed in setting aside the said writ of inquiry, and that the court would not interfere with the finding of the said jury.

By desire of the court, inquiry was made as to the manner in which juries were summoned upon writs of inquiry, and the following certificates were procured:—

From Mr. Secondary Potter:—

Previously to the passing of the Jury Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 50), there was a list of respectable tradesmen in constant attendance at the sheriff's office to try all writs of inquiry, which writs were then taken daily. If the parties required a better jury, an order was obtained for a good jury, and the jurors were of the same class of persons as formed the common jury trying causes in the Superior Courts. After the passing of the Jury Act, the jury in constant attendance at the sheriff's office was discontinued, and all juries were composed of common jurymen taken out of the same list of persons as composed the common juries for the Superior Courts, and, consequently, a good jury under that name no longer existed. Afterwards, when the sheriffs received an order for a good jury, it was treated as an order for a special jury, and the jury were nominated and treated as a special jury, and in court received one guinea each in each case. This has been the invariable practice in London since the passing of the Jury Act, no matter in which of the courts the action was brought, and until the present time, as far as I understand, has always been allowed.

From the Under-Sheriff of Middlesex:—

The practice in Middlesex with regard to good juries is identical almost with that of the City of London, viz., that a good jury has usually been nominated and summoned from the special jury list, and that in all cases where a writ of inquiry is executed before such a good jury they receive one guinea each, no distinction being made in this respect between a good and a special jury, unless the party who obtained the order chooses to have the jury selected from the common jury list, in which latter case they receive 10s. 6d. each.

Prentice, Q. C. and Thesiger showed cause against the rule. The allowance of one or two counsel is a matter for the discretion of the master. [The defendant's counsel abandoned this ground of the rule.] As to the fees for a good jury, the statutes, rules of court, and practice have all agreed in summoning and paying a good jury as if it were a special jury:

- 24 Geo. 2, c. 18;
- 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, ss. 34, 35, 52;

Lopes, Q. C. and Laing supported the rule.—There is no authority whatever as to the amount of the fees to be paid to a good jury, and there is no incident in common to a good and a special jury. Besides, the practice is not invariable:

Calvert v. Gordon, 3 M. & R. 124.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—The judgment of the court (Bovill, C. J., M. Smith, and Brett, JJ.), was delivered by Bovill,

C. J.—An application was made for a review of the taxation of costs in this case, first, with reference to the number of counsel allowed by the master, which point was disposed of in the course of the argument; and, secondly, on the ground that the master had allowed the costs of a good jury, and the fees paid to the special jurors upon the execution of a writ of inquiry. The defendants had suffered judgment to go by default; and the plaintiffs then applied for and obtained a judge's order for a good jury. The sheriff accordingly summoned such jury from the special jury list, and the sum of one guinea was paid to each jurymen, which payment has been allowed by the master. The practice of ordering a good jury existed long before the passing of the Acts which regulate special juries. Those statutes do not relate to writs of inquiry; and by the rules of court a good jury cannot be had without the order of a judge. The judge exercises his discretion as to whether it is a fit case for a good jury; and, if he makes the order, it has long been settled that the costs of the good jury are to be allowed on taxation: (Wilkinson v. Malin.) The principal object in obtaining an order for a good jury, since the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, has been that the jury should be selected from the special jury list, instead of from the common jury list (see Price v. Williams), and the practice of the Secondaries in the City of London ever since the passing of that Act has been, when such an order is made, always to select the jury from the special jury list, and the jurymen have invariably been paid one guinea each for their attendance. The practice in Middlesex has been somewhat different, as the Under Sheriff has given the party who obtained the order the option of having the jury selected from the special jury list, or from amongst a superior class of tradesmen on the common jury list. If the jurymen were selected from the common jury list, they were paid 10s. 6d. each; but, if taken from the special jury list, they have, as in the City of London, invariably been paid one guinea. In the present case the jury were selected from the special jury list, and were paid one guinea each, in accordance with that practice. The usual fee of a special juror has undoubtedly been one guinea ever since the passing of the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 50, which required a separate list to be made of special jurors; and by the 35th section of that Act it is provided that no juror shall be allowed to take more than the judge shall think just and reasonable, and which shall not exceed 17. 1s., except in case of a view; and this statute, therefore, seems to recognise one guinea as a proper fee. If the practice had existed and been sanctioned by the courts only since the passing of that Act (a period of nearly forty-five years), we should have been very loth to interfere with it; but, upon looking to the earlier statute of 24 Geo. 2, c. 18, it is clear that the fee of one guinea to special jurors was at that time also recognised by the Legislature; so that there is every reason to believe that for upwards of one hundred years the fee of one guinea has been adopted and approved by the courts. *In the Act of 24 Geo. 2, c. 18, after referring to the previous statute as to special juries, sect. 2 begins with a recital that complaints were frequently made of the great and extravagant fees paid to jurymen returned under the former Acts, and then prohibits the taking of more than the judge shall think just and reasonable, not exceeding one guinea, in the same terms as the subsequent Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 50. The previous statute relating to special jurors was the 3 Geo. 2, c. 25; and sect. 15 of that Act, after reciting that doubts had been conceived touching the power of the courts to order special jurors to be summoned, except for trials at bar, expressly empowers the courts to order juries to be struck for
